Nor shall said court have jurisdiction of any claim against the United States which is now barred by virtue of the provisions of any law of the United States.

They have no means of legal redress, and we are seeking now to afford them the means of redress to which they are justly entitled. Now, striking out those words prevents the prosecution of the war claims to which we are all opposed in that tribunal, while it permits the claims we desire to have considered to be considered in that tribunal.

Mr. BOWMAN. I think there is no objection to that amendment.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. In the first place it makes the loyalty of the claimant a question that shall be determined first by the court as a jurisdictional question. That bars out the claims which frighten my friend from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] while it admits the just claims of men who have been too long trifled with by this Congress and by the Government.

Mr. PEELLE. I will withdraw the amendment which I offered and give way to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BUTTERWORTH.]

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Then, if I am recognized to do so, I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] by striking out the following words:

Nor shall said court have jurisdiction of any claim against the United States which is now barred by virtue of the provisions of any law of the United States.

Mr. BRIGGS. I am afraid this House is trying to do something which under the Constitution of the country we cannot do. In the first place, why are your calendars thronged with bills? Because the Constitution of your country says to all its citizens, if you have a grievance against the United States, you have the right to petition. That right you cannot take away. Now, if you had provided a tribunal, none of these claims would have been here. You are trying to do that by this bill.

The amendment suggested by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] proposes that a certain class of cases shall not be referred to the Court of Claims or any other court; that Congress shall still retain jurisdiction and control over those claims. I believe that the position occupied by the gentleman from Indiana is right. I believe it is in accordance with the public sentiment of this country.

Why, sir, the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH] strikes down your statute of limitations, and every single war claim to-day is barred by those statutes. Do you propose to do that? If you do I cannot go with you. I have the statutes of limitations here applying to these various claims. They have all had their day in court. That day is passed and gone, and I ask you if you propose to renew it?

I have an amendment to propose to this bill which will obviate all these objections. It will not give these claims a day in court, but we can under it provide a tribunal to settle some claims and relieve Congress. By the amendment which I have suggested I propose to modify this bill so that no claim which accrued prior to August 20, 1866, the date when the proclamation took effect, shall be sent to the Court of Claims, but that such claims shall be left where they are.

I know it is said that will not relieve Congress. That is true, but I tell you if you pass this bill and without these restrictions, without these limitations, strike down all the statutes that stand to-day as a bar against them, you will have a bill to relieve the Treasury of the United States rather than to relieve members of Congress.

Mr. HOUK. And it ought to be relieved long enough to pay the honest debts of the Government.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the hour allowed by the House for the introduction of amendments and debate thereon has expired. The Chair has made due allowance for the time given by unanimous consent to two members of the House; so that there has been occupied in all one hour and ten minutes in the discussion of amendments.

The first question is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH] to the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.] The Chair will state that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOWMAN] is entitled to take his hour to close the debate at this time, or he can do so after the pending amendments have been voted on.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I ask that my amendment may be read.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out of the first paragraph of the amendment of Mr. HOLMAN the following words:

"Nor shall the said court have jurisdiction of any claim against the United States which is now barred by virtue of the provisions of any law of the United States."

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. How will the amendment read if my amendment shall be adopted?

The Clerk read as follows:

The jurisdiction of said court shall not extend to or include any claim against the United States growing out of the destruction of or damage to property by the Army or Navy during the war for the suppression of the rebellion, or for the use and occupation of real estate by any part of the military or naval forces of the United States in the operations of said forces during the said war at the seat of war.

The question was taken on the amendment to the amendment, and it was not agreed to; upon a division—ayes 28, noes not counted.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.] A division of the question has been demanded, and the question will first be taken on the first proposition of the amendment, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. —. The jurisdiction of said court shall not extend to or include any claim against the United States growing out of the destruction or damage to property by the Army or Navy during the war for the suppression of the rebellion, or for the use and occupation of real estate by any part of the military or naval forces of the United States in the operations of said forces during the said war at the seat of war; nor shall the said court have jurisdiction of any claim against the United States which is now barred by virtue of the provisions of any law of the United States.

Mr. SPRINGER. That is susceptible of further division, and I ask that a separate vote be taken on the last clause.

The SPEAKER. The House has just voted on a motion to strike out that clause and refused to do so.

Mr. BRIGGS. Is it in order for me to offer a substitute for that amendment?

The SPEAKER. No additional amendment or substitute is now in order.

Mr. TYLER. I desire to ask a parliamentary question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TYLER. I wish to ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] if his amendment should not come in after the second section instead of after the first section?

The SPEAKER. That is the proposition of the gentleman.

Mr. BOWMAN. I believe that the hour has commenced which is allotted to me under the rules to close the debate on this bill. I would inquire of the Chair if it is not in order for me to yield two minutes of that time to the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. BRIGGS,] and for him to use that time to offer an amendment or do whatever else he may please?

The SPEAKER. It is not in order for the gentleman to yield at this time for the purpose of allowing amendments to be offered. It is in order for the gentleman to take his hour now, and to yield to whomever he pleases for debate only.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HOLMAN. My point of order is this: certainly we on this side of the House, at least members in my immediate neighborhood, understood that the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOWMAN] was that after the previous question was ordered an hour was to be taken for the introduction and discussion of amendments under the five-minute rule. Was it the understanding that in addition to that hour there was to be another hour to close the debate on this bill?

The SPEAKER. It was expressly stated by the gentleman from Massachusetts that after the hour for amendments was exhausted he would take the hour allowed him under the rule to close the debate, and he stated that he would make an equitable division of that hour among members of the House. The gentleman is now recognized for his hour under the rule.

Mr. BOWMAN. I ask consent of the House for the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIGGS] to offer an amendment to perfect the bill, to be taken out of my time.

Mr. HOLMAN. If that consent is general I will have no objection.

Mr. HOUK. I object.

Mr. BUCK. I desire to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. It is not now in order.

Mr. BUCK. Is it not in order by unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. It can be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. BUCK. Then I ask unanimous consent to offer an amendment at this time.

Mr. BOWMAN. I must object now.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts will proceed.

Mr. BOWMAN. I yield ten minutes of my time to——

Mr. BUCK. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BUCK. I submitted this amendment yesterday, and I understood from the ruling of the Chair that under the order of the House all amendments then offered were to be considered as pending.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. BUCK] has fallen into some error on that point. The Chair expressly stated yesterday that the understanding was that the amendments presented were simply propositions which gentlemen designed to offer when occasion offered. To remove any doubt about the matter, the Clerk will read from the RECORD what was said by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROBINSON] and by the Chair.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I infer that my colleague, recognizing the importance of this measure, does not expect to have a final vote on the proposition to-day. I therefore suggest that the different propositions to amend may be printed in the RECORD. I do not care about their being offered now, because that would trespass upon the matter of parliamentary practice, but they can be printed for information in the RECORD.

This is a complex matter; we want to proceed safely; and I hope that, without any rights being waived, the House may give consent that gentlemen may send up their amendments to be printed, so that we may see them in the morning.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROBINSON] asks unanimous consent for the printing in the RECORD of such amendments as gentlemen may propose to offer. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. HASKELL. I ask unanimous consent to offer this amendment, which relates entirely to Indian affairs—Indian treaty stipulations—an amendment which has been agreed to by the Committee on Indian Affairs, and by the committee having charge of this bill. It is not an amendment of the class which the House has been debating. It refers merely to the investigation of Indian claims under treaty stipulations. I ask that it may be considered as pending.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the introduction of the amendment at this time?

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I object, unless I can offer an amendment.

Mr. HASKELL. This amendment has the approval of two committees.

Mr. BOWMAN. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. RAY.]

Mr. RAY addressed the House. [See Appendix.]

Mr. BOWMAN. I now yield for five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BUTTERWORTH.]

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Mr. Speaker, the object of the committee, at least one of the committees having this subject in charge, was to present a bill which would authorize the reference of all claims pending before Congress to a proper judicial tribunal in order that they might be heard and determined. It was the object of the committee, also, to prevent the prosecution in that Court of Claims by any claimant who was disloyal during the late rebellion. That they have attempted to do. Now, the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] if adopted in its present shape, thoroughly and effectually defeats the object and purpose of every bill pending before this House which looks to the transfer of claims now pending before Congress to the Court of Claims. I therefore oppose it. Nine-tenths of the claims prosecuted before Congress originated during the war and grew out of the war in some way or other. Whether a majority of those claims are just or not I do not pretend to say, but I do say, and I know I have the sympathy of both sides of the House in saying, wherever there is a just claim it ought to be adjudicated and the claimant paid. The bills pending before Congress seek to accomplish precisely that thing.

My friend from Indiana offers an amendment which seems to be generally acceptable to what appears to me to be a majority of this House, but which absolutely defeats the object and purpose of every bill introduced looking to the establishment of a tribunal for the adjudication of these claims, because his amendment provides, as does the bill of my friend from New Hampshire, [Mr. BRIGGS,] that no claim arising prior to August, 1865, shall be considered by the Court of Claims, and yet 90 per cent. of the claims pending before this House to-day and now in the several committees arose before that date. And it is for the purpose of transferring those very claims to the court that the several pending bills were introduced.

Now, in order that the Government may not be imposed on, we propose that no disloyal claimant shall be permitted to prosecute his claim in the Court of Claims, making his loyalty a jurisdictional question, to be heard and determined in the preliminary stages of the case. If he is disloyal he goes hence without day; if loyal, his claim shall be adjudicated as it ought to be.

It is urged by gentlemen that because many of these claims have been pending a long time they should not be paid; that inasmuch as justice has been long delayed it shall be withheld altogether. Strange proposition, that we shall plead our own wrong as an apology for committing a greater wrong.

There should be some tribunal to hear and determine wherever there is a wrong to be righted or an outrage to be redressed. The fact that Congress has so long refused a tribunal where men could prosecute their claims is a sad commentary upon the justice of Congress.

Mr. BRIGGS. Have they not had a tribunal?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Not at all. Wherever the claimant had a tribunal he has presented his claim. The only reason men come here for relief is because the legal tribunals were powerless to grant them relief.

You have a Pension Bureau which is authorized, according to the forms of law, to grant pensions; and yet on every Friday night you pass bills granting pensions to parties who were refused by the Commissioner of Pensions. Why? Because the established tribunal is not competent under the law to do justice. And thus it is with reference to other claims which are prosecuted before Congress. Our object and purpose is not to pay the claims of disloyal men, but to establish a tribunal to which these claims may be sent and sifted and examined, assorting the claims of loyal men and of honest men, and separating them from the claims of disloyal and dishonest men. The honest claims of loyal men will, as they ought to be, be reported favorably; while such as are not of that character will be rejected and thrown out. And the Government is justly censurable if it omits to accord to all men who have claims against it the same rights which are accorded to an individual to prosecute his claim against his neighbor.

And now I only want to say that I think it would be well to adjourn, as there seems to be a misunderstanding of this question, in order that gentleman may have an opportunity to thoroughly consider it in all of its bearings before final action is taken upon it.

Mr. DWIGHT. A single word. It seems to me that we ought not to adjourn. I have tried as others have tried here to get an opportunity of saying something about the bill for the last two days, and have been shut off. Now, after discussing it clear through, it is proposed to adjourn. I object to that and hope it will not be done.

Mr. ROBESON. That would not prevent the gentleman from being heard. This would simply come up as unfinished business and the time would be reserved.

Mr. BOWMAN. I only want to call the attention of the House to a few facts in connection with the discussion that has taken place, and then I will yield, if the House desires it, for the motion to adjourn. [Cries of "No, let us finish the bill!"]

Mr. Speaker, every one has been saying and the newspapers have been complaining and clamoring that we need some relief from the pressure of private claims upon Congress. The committee which I represent come in here for two days, and bring in a bill which is debated and thoroughly discussed, and I may be permitted to say that I am utterly astonished at the misstatements concerning the bill and the misapprehension which seems to exist in the minds of gentlemen as to its results.

I hear members around me asking what jurisdiction the Court of Claims shall have, and what parties must come within the jurisdiction of that court. I hear other members saying that this bill strikes down the statute of limitations, and I hear others inquiring whether we part with our powers; and when I look at this little, simple bill, with very few provisions in it, I must confess that I am unable to see whence arises all of this misunderstanding. On this side of the House, as well as on the other side, a multitude of amendments and substitutes, which create confusion of ideas and prevent an understanding of what principles are involved, have been offered. Now, what is the bill which I have reported? It simply says this, and not one single other thing: it says, for example, in effect, if a committee of this House have for investigation a claim and they feel that the case is too complicated to enable them to give the time necessary to investigate it, they may say: "We have not time to look at the evidence; we cannot take the evidence properly; what will we do in such a case? Why, here is a bill by which we can send this case to the Court of Claims. We will ask that court to hear the evidence and report the facts existing." That is all there is of it.

I do not believe that there has been a single argument against the real provisions of the bill. That is all there is in the bill; and I would like to ask what objection there can be to that. You have the committees of Congress and you have the departments of the Government for the consideration of claims; they have the testimony, which they may not be able to examine as thoroughly as they should examine it, and they simply refer it to the Court of Claims. We do not allow the court to enter judgment. We do not allow the court to express an opinion. We do not allow the court to report a bill, but simply ask the court to report the facts, and that is all they can do. The facts are found and reported to Congress. These statements contain every answer to every question and argument that has been made, namely, that a committee which does not feel competent to examine the facts simply refers the matter to the Court of Claims to find the facts for them after hearing both sides, and that is all there is in this bill.

Why, the gentleman from New Hampshire says it strikes down the statute of limitations. It does not strike it down. It simply says that the court shall examine and report the facts.

Mr. BRIGGS. I would ask the gentleman to point out that section.

Mr. BOWMAN. Yes, sir; I point the gentleman to the section that says they shall report the facts. And now I ask the gentleman from New Hampshire to point out to me the section that strikes down the statute of limitations.

Mr. BRIGGS. Give me time to answer, and I will do it.

Mr. BOWMAN. The gentleman will not find the section.

Mr. BLAND. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. BOWMAN. Certainly.

Mr. BLAND. I wish to ask the gentleman what is gained by this bill? Do not the committees now examine cases, and are not our calendars filled with cases reported to us—cases which we will never reach? What is the use of referring these cases to the court? You cannot consider those which you now have on the calendars; why undertake to swell the number by setting another tribunal to try cases in the same line?

Mr. BOWMAN. I tell you what we gain. For example, I spent in the last Congress a whole fortnight in reading the depositions and evidence and writing a report upon a case which, if the facts had been before me, I could have decided in three hours.

Mr. BLAND. That is very true; but that is not the point. The committees have now examined and reported a large number of claims. The Calendar is full of them and the House never considers or passes upon them. My question is, What do you gain by instituting another tribunal to give you another report? If that court does not determine anything it merely gives you another calendar, when you do not dispose of the calendars you now have.

Mr. BOWMAN. In a great many of the cases, like that of restoring the record of a soldier the other day, or like the case last week of the record of a man as to disloyalty, the debate here for hour after hour is on the question of facts. Men get up and assert and deny facts and argue the facts back and forth. But when a case comes in here with a concise statement of facts from the Court of Claims, where they have been judicially ascertained, I think Congress can dispose of such a case as quickly as it disposes now of the pension cases.

Mr. BLAND. The committee now make their reports to the House of the facts.

Mr. BOWMAN. We spent two private bill days, if I remember aright, in disposing of one case, and almost the whole argument was on disputed questions of fact. We spent the last private bill day in discussing one case, and the whole argument was on a question of fact.

Mr. BLAND. But the committee had reported those cases, and it would be just as competent to act upon their report as on the report of the court. The whole question would still be open in any case, notwithstanding the report of a court.

Mr. BOWMAN. We have probably in the Committee on Claims a thousand cases to-day that cannot be even examined or the evidence read; and many of them are probably quite as just as any that have passed Congress.

Mr. BRAGG. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. BOWMAN. I claim my time. I beg the gentleman's pardon. Yesterday when I spoke I, with I believe my usual amiability, allowed the gentleman from Wisconsin to ask me questions, and everybody else who wished, and I tried to answer all those questions with politeness. And when this morning the gentleman, waving his arms toward me, said, "Does the gentleman from Massachusetts dare to say so and so?" and I got up and said I would like to reply, the gentleman very kindly said he would not allow me to say a word.

Mr. BRAGG. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I think I yielded to the gentleman for a question this morning once, twice, three times; and I offered to yield again for a question, but I declined to yield when the gentleman wished to make a speech.

Mr. BOWMAN. That is all there is in this bill, and I ask members to remember it. When a committee finds the facts in a case too complicated; when it has not the time; when it thinks it ought not to decide on partial evidence; when it wants the facts to be fully and properly tried, that committee of the House shall be allowed to ask a court with its officer, the Attorney-General, to find the facts. That is everything there is in this bill.

I heard the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] object to it; and it would be amusing, if it was not exasperating, to hear some gentlemen state their objections to this bill. I cannot answer the arguments of the gentleman from Wisconsin. I acknowledge it. There is no reply to them; for we have no common ground for the basis of argument. The gentleman from Wisconsin goes on the assumption that every one interested in or having anything to do with a claim intends to defraud the Government. He says this bill will defraud the Government. The assumption is that members of Congress are rascals; the examining committees are rascals; the Court of Claims are rascals, and the Attorney-General is a rascal. And when I said to him that we first examine these claims in the committee he, in substance, said, "Oh yes; I know how it is in committees; that is no protection." And when I said that we send it next to the Court of Claims he answers, "They will admit only ex parte testimony, and we cannot trust them; they will not hear the case as judges do in a court of law. But when I say there is another safeguard, that the Attorney-General shall be present in every case, the gentleman answers, "Oh yes, I know about the Attorney-General, and you cannot trust him." We have nothing now but Congress and committees, and when I say "we will get the additional safeguard of the Court of Claims and the Attorney-General," he says the object is to defraud the United States; and that those of us who favor this bill for additional safeguards will be buried under mountains of remorse and reproach, or will pray for the mountains to come down and cover us, or something of that sort.

Now, I turn away in despair from the search for an honest tribunal. I think the gentleman may be right. I cannot answer him. The Congress, committees, Courts of Claims, judges, and the Attorneys-General are all combined in gigantic fraud to cheat the United States whenever they can. I turn in despair to the gentleman from Wisconsin, and, hunting like Diogenes with his lantern, in vain for an honest man in Congress, in committee, in the Court of Claims, among the judges, in the Attorney-General's Department, I say to him in utter despair "Whom can we trust; where, oh, where can we find an honest man?" And that gentleman, pointing with pride to his manly breast, says "Behold me; gaze upon the very model of virtue, the only monument of honesty in a wicked Congress. Look upon me, the only genuine and original watch-dog of the Treasury." [Laughter and applause.]

For he himself has said it;
And it's greatly to his credit
That he is an honest man,
That he is an honest man.

Now, if we can only draft a bill here, leaving all these claims to the only honest man in Congress or the courts or the Departments, the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. BRAGG,] making him supreme and only judge in all these cases, I will cheerfully vote for that bill, because I shall feel so happy to know that we can get rid of all responsibilities and throw them into the arms of the only honest man, the only man who redeems the wickedness of the Court of Claims and its judges, of the Attorney-General's Office, of members of committees, and of all members of Congress. [Laughter.] If it is as he says, that we can trust no one, then I have nothing to say for this bill. But we now have to trust the committees of this House and of the other House; we have to trust Congress, and all I ask for this bill is that it may be passed as an additional safeguard—to obtain the opinion of the Court of Claims on the facts only, and nothing else in regard to these claims.

The question of limitation, I tell the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. BRIGGS,] and he knows it, the question of limitation comes right back here to be decided again. He knows that the question of limitation is to be reported here to Congress. Do we not decide that finally? Do we not say finally whether any claim is a Southern claim; whether any claim is barred by limitation? There is not a single fact that we are precluded from deciding under this bill any more than we are in the first examination of these cases. And when gentlemen say the opposite, I say they are trying to envelop this bill in such a fog and cloud, to so hide the true features of it, that it shall be defeated here by the influence of unfounded passions and unfounded prejudices. Nothing can be simpler than this bill. I ask gentlemen to look at the Holman amendment. That Holman amendment provides, as to the great majority of cases, that only such claimants may go to the Court of Claims under this bill as can go to it already without coming to Congress. I presume that nine-tenths of all the cases before this Congress or in our committees are cases which can be barred out by the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana.

Now, I say it is but fair and honest to our committee who has reported this bill to stand up here and meet it fairly and squarely, and not dodge behind any little amendment which is intended to take the bowels out of the bill, and enable members to tell the country that they wanted to send all claims to the Court of Claims, but there was a little amendment made to the bill of such a character that they were obliged to vote against the bill itself.

As has been suggested, Mr. Speaker, the bill of the Committee on Claims is for relief of Congress and committees. It does not take away one safeguard, not a single safeguard, in relation to the laws of limitation, or in relation to anything else you please. It does not take away one single safeguard, but in addition to the present barriers, over and above the present barriers, we propose to erect two additional barriers—that of the Court of Claims and that of the Attorney-General. And yet gentlemen have the audacity to get up here and say that while we have now two fences to keep off these claims, one in Congress and the other in its committees, we, who favor this bill, are conspirators against the Government, seeking to defraud it, because we propose to put up two additional fences.

Having said heretofore to southern and other claimants, "You shall not obtain one cent of your money until you pass Congress and until you pass the committees of Congress," (that is the way it is now,) we propose to say to those claimants in the future, "Gentlemen, you have to pass Congress and its committees just as before, and you must also pass that one-headed Cerberus from Wisconsin, [laughter,] who goes against almost every claim, good, bad, and indifferent; you have now to pass the three barriers—Congress, its committees, and the member from Wisconsin." And then we say to them, "You must also pass two other barriers which you have never had to pass before. You must pass the judges of the Court of Claims, and see what they say; and if they sit heavily down on you, you can never breathe again. Besides that, you must pass the Attorney-General, and we say to you that if he sits down on you, you cannot breathe again or recover your claim." Yet gentlemen have the huge, sublime, colossal audacity to stand up here and say that we are breaking down the sacred safeguards which have been erected around the Treasury of the United States.

Now that, gentlemen, is all there is in this bill. This bill does not hinder the passage of any general law, any law of limitations, any law you may please to pass for further safeguards. And I do ask this House, if it does not now understand this bill, if members do not believe what I have said, if they have not read this bill in order to see if I state the exact and simple truth in every respect, I ask this House to adjourn and go home, and on Sunday read the bill and perhaps pray over it, if any are of Puritanic stamp. [Laughter.] And then they can come back here on Monday with their minds cleared by needed recreation and worship, and give this bill a good, honest examination and support it, pure and simple, just as it is. Then afterward they can try all the experiments they please about laws of limitation, southern claims, jurisdiction of the Court of Claims, or about sending cases to the district courts or anywhere else.

But I submit that we cannot justify ourselves before the country if we do not pass at least a simple measure like this, without any wrong in it; pass such a bill as this, against which no honest objection has been raised on this floor to-day; against which no single objection has been made that has any foundation whatever, either in fact or in law.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. Will the gentleman allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. BOWMAN. Certainly.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. There is now remaining of your time some twenty-five minutes. It is now getting late, and we would all like to get our bearings upon this matter before voting. With the permission of the gentleman I will move that the House now adjourn.

Many MEMBERS. Oh, no.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield for that motion?

Mr. BOWMAN. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. Then I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken upon the motion to adjourn, and upon a division there were—ayes 54, noes 73.

Before the result of this vote was announced,

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

So the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

Mr. BOWMAN. Mr. Speaker, I have but a word more to say. All I ask here is fair treatment. I ask the members of this House to look this bill squarely in the face, and either take it as it is or vote it down.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. Will the gentleman please answer the question of the gentleman from Missouri—how this bill can furnish the House any relief?

Mr. BOWMAN. Mr. Speaker, I thought I had answered that question two or three times. In the first place, it will afford the committee relief; and that is worth something.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. That is not needed.

Mr. BOWMAN. The gentleman will excuse me; it is needed. If the gentleman had served upon the Committee on Claims in two Congresses—had worked night and day; had spent weeks in writing reports upon bills which are never reached—he might take a different view.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. I do not mean to intimate that the committees have not hard work to do; but they do more work than this House can dispose of.

Mr. BOWMAN. A committee like the Committee on Claims does not do any work, I might say, as it ought to be done. Every member must know that it is no satisfactory kind of work to take up letters, certificates, ex parte affidavits, and, because you can get nothing better, decide a case in that way, and then call it legal work.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. One other question. Is it the intention of the gentleman that the House shall take the reports of the Court of Claims and pass all these claims without examination, as 1,300 were passed the other day in one bill?

Mr. BOWMAN. That was not the judgment of a court.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. My point is this: if it is your purpose to examine these reports when they come from the Court of Claims, no relief will be afforded. If we are not to examine the reports of the court, but its adjudications are to be taken as a final settlement of the facts reported upon, then I am opposed to the bill. I say it ought not to pass.

Mr. BOWMAN. I will answer the gentleman by saying that the committees would do as they do now. Every member according to his conscience would decide as to what extent the case should be re-examined. I ask the gentleman whether it is not safer, even if we do not go behind the judgment of the court, to pass the measure upon the faith of that examination, than to undertake to decide cases here upon ex parte affidavits without any cross-examination of witnesses, or anything approaching a judicial investigation?

Mr. BUCKNER. I rise to a point of order. I understood it was unanimously agreed by the House that the time given to the discussion of this bill should be equally divided.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman that there was no agreement as to the division of time. There was a statement as to how this hour would be divided.

Mr. HOUSE. Mr. Speaker, I certainly understood that the hour was to be equitably divided.

Mr. BOWMAN. It was.

Mr. HOUSE. I desire not to consume time unnecessarily but to show the distinctive difference between my substitute and the bill of the gentleman from Massachusetts. His bill, in my opinion, will give this House no relief whatever.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOWMAN] yield?

Mr. BOWMAN. How much time have I?

The SPEAKER. Sixteen minutes.

Mr. BOWMAN. Mr. Speaker, I said that this hour would be equitably divided. I meant to divide it among gentlemen who might hand me their names—not to claim it all myself. How much time does the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUSE] want?

Mr. HOUSE. How much of the hour remains?

The SPEAKER. Sixteen minutes.

Mr. HOUSE. I do not want any more than that. [Laughter.]

Mr. BOWMAN. I will reserve six minutes, yielding the residue to the gentlemen from Tennessee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee is recognized for ten minutes.

Mr. HOUSE. Mr. Speaker, at this late hour in the evening and in the present mood of the House I shall not undertake to go into anything like an extended discussion of distinctive differences between my substitute and the bill of the gentleman from Massachusetts. In the first section of the substitute it is announced as the policy of Congress to pay no more money from the public Treasury on ex parte testimony. It is then provided that every claimant desiring to do so may, without first coming to Congress, file his petition in the Court of Claims and have the facts of his case judicially investigated—of course at his own expense—so that when he enters Congress with his claim he can exhibit the facts as judicially established in a court where he has had a chance to produce his evidence and the Government has had the opportunity to cross-examine his witnesses.

The bill further provides that every private claim now in the committee-rooms of Congress requiring an investigation of facts shall be sent to the Court of Claims to be investigated. The gentleman from Massachusetts said yesterday that we proposed to send the carts up here and take all these claims out. Yes, I say take them out. They have the dust of ages on them. A ray of sunlight or a breath from heaven has not visited them for years. Take them down to the Court of Claims and all the honest claimants will there have their facts judicially investigated. And my word for it, nine-tenths of them will never be heard of again.

That is what Chief-Justice Drake's opinion is. He says that when the Court of Claims was established in 1855 cart-loads of papers were sent down there, but in some mysterious way they disappeared. Why? Because the fraudulent claimant now before you under cover of ex parte affidavits never will dare to have the light of judicial investigation turned upon his claim. Send them all out of here.

The bill of the gentleman from Massachusetts says that a committee of the House may have the privilege of sending them. The committee has to investigate the case before they know whether or not it should be sent there. Your committee-room will be as much crowded in the future as in the past.

What do you want with them here? You are not going to give relief on ex parte testimony. Then let them all go there, and men who have honest claims will continue to prosecute them and have their proof taken, and the court will report back to Congress.

In my humble opinion, if this substitute is adopted, you will get rid of this great evil and burden now pressing upon Congress. The gentleman from Massachusetts took occasion to say, yesterday, that the Court of Claims had examined his bill and given it their approbation. I will state that my substitute has been carefully examined by every member of that court, and that it meets their approbation, and will, in their opinion, relieve Congress and relieve the honest claimants.

I believe, if the House will adopt this substitute, you will get rid of the burdens which now press upon you; that honest men will have an opportunity to be decently heard in prosecuting their claims against the Government, and that dishonest men will find it impossible to perpetrate a fraud upon it.

I would like to go through the sections of this substitute, Mr. Speaker, but I did that to some extent yesterday and I have no time to do it now.

Now, in the consideration of this substitute the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service invited all the committees of this House having charge of bills of this character, and there were deputations from the Committees on Claims, War Claims, Judiciary, and perhaps some others, and I understood this substitute met the approbation of all of them.

I do not pretend to say it is perfect; I do not pretend to say in its practical operations imperfections may not be developed which will be required thereafter to be corrected; but I believe it is a step in the right direction, and that if adopted honest claimants will have a chance to obtain relief and these private claims will cease to clog our committee-rooms and our Calendar to the exclusion of the public business. [Applause.]

Mr. BOWMAN. I now yield for two minutes to the gentleman from New Hampshire.

Mr. RAY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a remark or two in answer to the question put by my excellent friend from Michigan, [Mr. BURROWS.] I admit if Congress should not act on the reports of the Court of Claims made in cases referred to it pursuant to the provisions of this bill, not much good will come to honest claimants through its adoption. When a reference is made to that court by a committee to find and report the facts in a given case, the witnesses will be subjected to direct and cross-examinations by opposing counsel, and their testimony taken down in writing; then that evidence will be heard and considered by the court, aided by the arguments of counsel, after which the court's record of the facts found is made up and sent back here for final action.

The last section of this bill provides that these findings of fact of the Court of Claims when reported to Congress shall be continued from session to session and from Congress to Congress until the claim is finally disposed of. This would relieve the claimants on the one hand and the Government on the other, as well as Congress to that extent. The testimony all being taken, filed for reference, and a judicial finding of the facts made and recorded, the whole matter comes before Congress for action. If Congress then refuses to act—to perform its plain duty—we cannot help it. It will not be the fault of this House. Such a contingency is improbable and affords no sound reason why we should neglect to act in this important matter and perform the duties devolving upon us. I will not assume that future Congresses will abnegate their duties and therefore omit the performance of my own duty. The same objection may be urged against the bill proposed by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. HOUSE.] His bill provides substantially for the same course of procedure.

Mr. HAZELTON. I would like to ask the gentleman how Congress is to be relieved unless we accept the findings of the Court of Claims?

Mr. RAY. It will not relieve Congress practically.

Mr. HAZELTON. That is what I expected.

Mr. RAY. We must accept these findings or we shall get no practical relief.

Mr. HAZELTON. Then the judgment should be made available and not reported back here at all.

Mr. RAY. Congress will accept these findings and act upon them in a large majority of cases. I see no reason why findings of fact carefully and deliberately made by that court should not receive as much faith and credit as Congress gives to judgments rendered in causes now within that court's jurisdiction. Such judgments, I am advised, are commonly paid without objection by a provision for that purpose included in a general appropriation bill.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, I ask for only two minutes in order to say that any refusal of the Government of the United States to at least give its loyal citizens, no matter what portion of the country they may inhabit, an opportunity to present for redress any grievances of which they may complain is a doctrine that cannot receive my indorsement. The government of a great country like this, noted for its enlightened and Christian character, cannot afford to wrong its loyal citizens by any course that will deny to them this right before some tribunal—I am not prepared to say what tribunal is most proper—that will be competent to pass judicial judgment upon the merits of each case.

If the loyal citizens of the South, who during the rebellion suffered all the tortures of the damned, are not worthy, then I am at a loss to imagine any class of people who do deserve any recognition at the hands of a great and good government.

Mr. BOWMAN. In the few minutes remaining to me, Mr. Speaker, I only want to appeal to the House for fair and honest treatment of the committee bill, which I represent. I want to say a few words in conclusion in regard to this bill which has been the result of a great deal of care and attention on the part of the committee, and I ask for it fair and honest consideration on its merits and without prejudice. It has been pointed out that the Holman amendment is like the Trojan horse, by which the enemy came in and destroyed the city. I agree that that amendment would defeat the principal object, or rather benefit of the bill. The Holman amendment renders it almost worthless. It provides in fact that large classes of claims which come to Congress shall not go to the Court of Claims. It has other objectionable features, but in the moment or two I have remaining I cannot point them out. All that is necessary to say is that it is an almost utter destruction of the objects sought to be accomplished by the bill. It will work harm instead of good. I ask the House to vote that amendment down. Then I ask the House to come to a square vote on the House bill, or substitute, and then, perhaps, we can have a vote fairly and squarely to our conscientious convictions upon the bill reported from the Committee on Claims.

If the House desires to vote to allow every claim to go into the Court of Claims and for reviving the Southern claims commission, they will vote for the substitute; but if they do not desire this, if they do not desire to open an unrestricted avenue for the reception of all these worthless and rejected claims, then I ask them to vote that bill down and give us a square vote on the bill reported from the committee. It is a simple, compact bill. I have referred to its provisions and need not now take up the time of the House to again discuss them. I hope they are thoroughly understood, and if they are I believe there will be no objection to the passage of the bill.

I am now ready to ask the House to vote upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I desire to be permitted to print some additional remarks upon the pending bill. [See Appendix.]

Mr. KENNA. My colleague [Mr. HOGE] who has given a great deal of attention to this matter, I know desired to present some remarks also upon this bill, and I make the same request in his behalf. [See Appendix.]

The SPEAKER. Without objection, both requests will be granted.

The question now is on the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, which amendment the gentleman desires to divide and have voted upon separately.

Mr. BRAGG. I move that the bill and pending amendments be committed to the Judiciary Committee of this House.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not in order at this time.

Mr. BRAGG. If we wait until after we have voted upon all the amendments there will be no amendment to commit. When the voting commences, and after the debate has closed, then it seems to me that the proper time has come to make the motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin may make an able argument against the rule, but the rule allows the motion to commit with or without instructions after the previous question has been ordered on the passage of the bill. That condition has not yet been reached. The previous question has been ordered on the bill and pending amendments, which exhausts itself on the third reading of the bill; and the motion to recommit is not in order at this time. The first question is upon the first clause of the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. BRAGG. Will it be in order after we have passed through all the stages up to the point indicated by the Speaker to make the motion?

The SPEAKER. Undoubtedly; that is the rule of the House.

Mr. BRAGG. I am anxious to make that motion, because I see the gentleman from Massachusetts desires to relieve the Democratic party of the necessity of answering for war claims in the next campaign.

The SPEAKER. The amendment of the gentleman from Indiana will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. —. The jurisdiction of said court shall not extend to or include any claim against the United States growing out of the destruction or damage to property by the Army or Navy during the war for the suppression of the rebellion, or for the use and occupation of real estate by any part of the military or naval forces of the United States in the operations of said forces during the said war at the seat of war; nor shall the said court have jurisdiction of any claim against the United States which is now barred by virtue of the provisions of any law of the United States.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to this proposed amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. I thought the gentleman from Ohio had moved to strike out the first part of that amendment.

The SPEAKER. That motion was voted down.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 54, noes 63.

Mr. BRAGG. I call for the yeas and nays on that amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BUCKNER. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question being taken on the motion to adjourn, there were—ayes 69, noes 83.

Mr. BUCKNER. I call for the yeas and nays.

On the question of ordering the yeas and nays there were ayes 15; not a sufficient number.

So the yeas and nays were not ordered, and the House refused to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on agreeing to the first branch of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. DUNNELL. I ask for the reading of that part of the amendment again.

The SPEAKER. That can only be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. CAMP. I object.

Mr. SPRINGER. There are two distinct propositions enunciated in the first part of the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana. I am in favor of one and not of the other, and I ask for a division of the question.

The SPEAKER. The demand of the gentleman is made too late. The yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. SPRINGER. I have a right to demand a division of any proposition on which I am called to vote.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman did not call for a division until the yeas and nays had been ordered on the whole proposition.

Mr. HOUSE. Let the portion of the amendment on which we are to vote be read, that it may be known what we are voting on.

The SPEAKER. It is the first branch of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.] It has been twice or thrice read. The Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 103, nays 88, not voting 100; as follows:

So the first part of Mr. HOLMAN's amendment was adopted.

The following pairs were announced:

Mr. CORNELL with Mr. BUCKNER.

Mr. SCALES with Mr. ERRETT.

Mr. WATSON with Mr. HARDY.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, with Mr. WILSON.

Mr. FARWELL, of Illinois, with Mr. MARTIN.

Mr. HISCOCK with Mr. BLACKBURN.

Mr. WAIT with Mr. HOGE.

Mr. SPOONER with Mr. BLACK.

Mr. WILLITS with Mr. KNOTT.

Mr. HILL with Mr HARDENBERGH.

Mr. MULDROW with Mr. MILES.

Mr. WISE, of Pennsylvania, with Mr. BRUMM.

Mr. LEEDOM with Mr. SHULTZ.

Mr. JOYCE with Mr. CURTIN.

Mr. RICE, of Ohio, with Mr. GEDDES.

Mr. VALENTINE with Mr. ATHERTON.

Mr. WARD with Mr. AIKEN.

Mr. HARMER with Mr. TALBOTT.

Mr. HAMMOND, of New York, with Mr. BELMONT.

Mr. MARSH with Mr. MCKENZIE.

Mr. KING with Mr. CARPENTER.

Mr. MOREY with Mr. CONVERSE.

Mr. ELLIS with Mr. BUTTERWORTH.

Mr. COVINGTON with Mr. CUTTS.

Mr. STEPHENS with Mr. W. A. WOOD.

Mr. NOLAN with Mr. CROWLEY.

Mr. PRESCOTT with Mr. SHELLEY.

Mr. DUGRO with Mr. YOUNG.

Mr. DEERING with Mr. PHISTER.

Mr. LINDSEY with Mr. COBB.

Mr. HUBBELL with Mr. CAMP.

Mr. FISHER with Mr. ROSECRANS.

Mr. CAMP. I am paired with Mr. HUBBELL, of Michigan. Having been informed he would vote "ay" on this proposition, I voted; but being somewhat in doubt, I desire to withdraw my vote.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to say my colleague, Mr. COBB, has been called home by sickness in his family.

Mr. CONVERSE. The Clerk in reading the pairs failed to show my pair with Mr. MOREY referred to political questions alone.

On motion of Mr. CAMP, by unanimous consent, the reading of the names was dispensed with.

The result of the vote was then announced as recorded above.

Mr. HOLMAN moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. I now move that the bill, amendments, and substitute be laid upon the table.

Mr. HOOKER. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HOOKER. Will it now be in order to move that the bill and amendments and substitute be referred to a committee?

The SPEAKER. That motion would not be in order at this time.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. I insist on my motion that the bill and pending amendments and substitute therefor be laid on the table.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa, there were ayes 34, noes not counted.

So the motion was not agreed to

The SPEAKER. The question recurs upon the second proposition contained in the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HOOKER. I move that the House now adjourn.

The motion to adjourn was not agreed to; upon a division—ayes 40, noes 75.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now read the second proposition contained in the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, which is the next question in order at this time.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. —. In any case for a claim for supplies or stores taken by or furnished to any part of military or naval forces of the United States for their use during the late war for the suppression of the rebellion, the petition shall aver that the person who furnished such supplies or stores, or from whom such supplies or stores were taken, did not give any aid or comfort to said rebellion, but was throughout that war loyal to the Government of the United States, and the fact of such loyalty shall be a jurisdictional fact, and unless the said court shall, on a preliminary inquiry, find that the person who furnished such supplies or stores, or from whom the same were taken as aforesaid, was loyal to the Government of the United States throughout said war, the court shall not have jurisdiction of such cause, and the same shall, without further proceedings, be dismissed.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. BUCK. I now ask unanimous consent to offer at this time an amendment in regard to claims growing out of Indian treaties.

The SPEAKER. That requires unanimous consent. Is there objection?

Mr. BLAND. I object.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman will allow the amendment to be read.

Mr. HASKELL. The amendment has been carefully considered and approved by two committees of this House.

Mr. REED. Let the amendment be read.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made to the amendment by the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BLAND.] The question now recurs upon the substitute offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUSE] for the bill as it has been amended.

Mr. HOLMAN. I offered an amendment last evening, as the RECORD will show, to strike out the fourth section of the substitute and insert the two sections which I have indicated.

Mr. HOUSE. Those sections were offered as an amendment to the original bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. And also to the substitute.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana was offered for printing in the RECORD, as other amendments were offered to be so printed.

Mr. HOLMAN. No, sir; I claim the power and offered it as an amendment to the substitute.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think that when a measure was not under consideration at all, was not before the House at the time, it would be in order to offer an amendment to it.

Mr. HOLMAN. The subject was up for discussion, and just before the recess was taken yesterday afternoon I arose and offered the amendment.

The SPEAKER. There was general debate going on at that time; but the substitute was not then being considered.

Mr. HOLMAN. No objection was then made to its being offered.

Mr. HOUSE. I object to it.

Mr. HOLMAN. If it is not received as an amendment to the substitute, it seems to me that it would be taking a very improper advantage of a member. I offered the amendment in the usual way.

The SPEAKER. The Chair observes, by reference to the RECORD, that at the time the amendment was proposed to be offered, as the gentleman states, the Chair announced to the House that the amendment would be received and printed in the RECORD under the order of the House. The Chair did not understand that it was offered as a pending amendment to the substitute. The Chair does not understand that such an amendment would have been in order at that time.

Mr. HOLMAN. I understood that it was accepted as a pending amendment.

The SPEAKER. Perhaps from some misunderstanding of what the purpose of the gentleman was the Chair regarded the amendment as offered in the same way as a large number of other amendments had been offered. And the Chair directed that under the order of the House it should be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. HAZELTON. Oh, let it go.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the substitute offered by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. HOUSE.]

The question was taken; upon a division there were—ayes 74, noes 86.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. HOUSE called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. SPRINGER. Let us have tellers; that will do.

Mr. ROBESON. Oh, no; let us have the yeas and nays.

Mr. HAZELTON. They want the yeas and nays over there, and let them have them.

The question was taken upon ordering the yeas and nays; and there were 36 in the affirmative.

So (the affirmative being more than one-fifth of the last vote) the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MILLS. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to; upon a division—ayes 66, noes 73.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is it now in order to move to recommit this bill with the pending substitute?

The SPEAKER. It is not in order now.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to call the attention of the House to the fact that the RECORD shows clearly——

Many MEMBERS. Regular order! Call the roll!

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the roll on the substitute of the gentleman from Tennessee.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 86, nays 97, not voting 108; as follows:

YEAS—86.

So the substitute of Mr. HOUSE was not agreed to.

The following additional pairs were announced from the Clerk's desk:

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin, with Mr. DAVIDSON.

Mr. HOOKER with Mr. KASSON.

Mr. BURROWS, of Missouri, with Mr. BLAND.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated

Mr. ROBESON moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. BUCK. I ask unanimous consent to offer an amendment to the bill.

Several members objected.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. BOWMAN. I demand the previous question on the passage of the bill.

Mr. BRAGG. I move to refer the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SPRINGER. With leave to report at any time.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] is in order, but not with the addition suggested by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SPRINGER.]

Mr. BOWMAN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Having obtained the floor for the purpose of moving the previous question, I did so. Does the motion to commit take precedence?

The SPEAKER. It does.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to amend the motion by inserting instead of the Committee on the Judiciary the Committee on War Claims, which I think is the proper committee for the bill to go to.

Mr. BRAGG. I will accept that amendment as a modification of my motion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] is not amendable; but if the gentleman modifies it the Chair will entertain it as modified.

Mr. CALKINS. I hope the gentleman from Wisconsin will not accept the modification.

Mr. BRAGG. I stand by my original motion to refer the bill to the Judiciary Committee, as that seems to be the wish of the House.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. BRAGG, there were—ayes 84, noes 53.

Mr. BOWMAN. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. BOWMAN. I raise the point that no quorum voted.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point. The gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. BOWMAN, and the gentleman from Wisconsin, Mr. BRAGG, will take their places as tellers.

Mr. CALKINS. I make the point that after the demand for the yeas and nays has been made and decided, it is too late to raise the point that no quorum voted.

The SPEAKER. The result of the vote had not been announced. It is time enough to make the point before the result is announced.

Mr. CALKINS. The point must be made before other business intervenes. There had been a demand for the yeas and nays, which was decided by the House.

The SPEAKER. In the opinion of the Chair the point is made in time.

Mr. CALKINS. The result had been announced—ayes 84, noes 53.

The SPEAKER. The final announcement had not been made. The Chair had merely announced the numbers, not the result of the vote.

Mr. DUNNELL. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, there being—ayes 70, noes 55.

Before the result of the vote was announced the following business was transacted:

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. ALDRICH, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that he had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. No. 3246) changing the name of the German Protestant Orphan Asylum Association.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. HARRIS, of New Jersey, by unanimous consent, obtained leave of absence for April 25, 26, and 27.

AMENDMENT OF REVISED STATUTES.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which, with the accompanying documents, was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a communication, dated the 15th instant, from the Secretary of the Interior, with draft of bill and accompanying papers, touching the amendment of section 2142 of the Revised Statutes of the United States. The subject is presented for the consideration of Congress.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, April 21, 1882.

TRANSIT OF VENUS.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which, with the accompanying documents, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed:

OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, April 21, 1882.

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

I transmit herewith a communication addressed to me by the Secretary of the Navy, with accompanying papers, in which an appropriation is asked for the purpose of observing the transit of Venus in 1882. The matter is commended to the favorable action of Congress.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

BRANCH POST-OFFICE, WASHINGTON, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Postmaster-General, recommending an appropriation for the payment of rent for a branch post-office in Washington, District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

The result of the vote on the motion to adjourn was then announced; and accordingly (at five o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and other papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By the SPEAKER: The resolutions of the New York Chamber of Commerce, on the subject of tariff reform, adopted at a special meeting April 13, 1882—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. ARMFIELD: The petition of Elbert Wallace and others, for an appropriation for educational purposes—to the Committee on Education and Labor.

By Mr. BAYNE: The resolution of meeting of Andersonville Survivors' Association, held at Carlisle, Pennsylvania, asking the passage of Senate bill No. 1012, granting pensions to soldiers and sailors of the late war who were confined in confederate prisons—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, the petition of the Keystone Bridge Company, of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, employing 600 men, and resolutions of the Engineers' Society of Western Pennsylvania, urging the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 4726) providing for the appointment of a board to test the strength of iron, steel, wood, &c.—severally to the Committee on Appropriations.

By Mr. FORNEY: The petition of 1,000 citizens of Colbert and Lawrence Counties, Alabama, for relief, to the laboring classes of those counties whose crops last year were destroyed by drought and who have sustained heavy losses this year by floods—to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. HERNDON: The petition of the Cotton Exchange of Mobile, Alabama, for increased appropriations for the Signal-Service Bureau—to the Committee on Appropriations.

By Mr. MANNING: The petition of J. M. Saunders and 51 others, citizens of La Fayette County, Mississippi, for the construction of the proposed ship-railway across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec—to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. MCCOOK: The petition of James B. Robinson, of New York City, for the passage of the French spoliation claims bill—to the same committee.

By Mr. MORRISON: Papers relating to the private land claim of the heirs of Jean Francis Perry—to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

By Mr. PEELLE: The resolutions of the Indiana State Board of Health, favoring control and regulation of quarantine measures by the General Government—to the Select Committee on the Public Health.

By Mr. THERON M. RICE: The petition of Rowland A. Colby, for relief—to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. HENRY G. TURNER: The petition of the Mayor and council of Albany, Georgia, for an appropriation to complete the improvement of the harbor at Brunswick, Georgia—to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, the petition of J. M. Rouse and 39 others, of Worth County, Georgia, for an appropriation for the improvement of the Flint River—to the same committee.

By Mr. J. T. UPDEGRAFF: The petition of Mary E. Raynor and 59 others, citizens of Richmond County, New York, protesting against proposed legislation to enlarge the powers of the National Board of Health—to the Select Committee on the Public Health.

By Mr. WALKER: The petition of Jesse K. Sanborn, for an extension of a patent—to the Committee on Patents.

SENATE.

MONDAY, April 24, 1882.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday last was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed:

OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, April 21, 1882.

To the Senate of the United States:

I transmit herewith a communication addressed to me by the Secretary of the Navy, with accompanying papers, in which an appropriation is asked for the purpose of observing the transit of Venus in 1882. The matter is commended to the favorable action of Congress.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to a resolution of April 5, 1882, the report of Lieutenant T. W. Symons, Corps of Engineers, respecting the navigable waters of the Upper Columbia River and its tributaries and the resources of the country adjacent thereto.

Mr. SLATER. I move that the communication be referred to the Committee on Commerce and printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It had better be referred without printing, and the Committee on Commerce can decide whether the communication should be printed.

Mr. SLATER. It is a document of which, when in print, I shall probably move the printing of an additional number.

Mr. HAWLEY. I beg leave to suggest to the Senator from Oregon that it looks like a very formidable document, and he may, by looking over the matter, perhaps dispense with the necessity of printing many parts of it. There is a roll of maps accompanying the communication, the printing of which would be costly.

Mr. SLATER. I am advised as to the contents of the paper. It is a matter of public importance, giving general information in respect to the region of country it refers to. I am satisfied that the printing will be ordered when the document is examined, and I have no objection to referring to the Committee on Printing a motion to order it printed for public distribution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. As the Senator from Oregon has suggested that he wishes additional copies printed, more than the ordinary number allowed by the rules, the communication will be referred to the Committee on Printing, and the Senator from Oregon may confer with them on the subject.

Mr. SLATER. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 4th instant, certain papers relative to the construction of a bridge over the Willamette River at Portland, Oregon; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. ALDRICH. I present a memorial of the Providence Board of Trade, in favor of the Lowell bankruptcy bill and in opposition to the bill reported from the Committee on the Judiciary. The memorial contains a carefully prepared report of an intelligent committee of the board, composed of gentlemen who have large experience in the management of insolvent estates. The memorial is not long, and as one of the bills to which it relates is now upon the Calendar, I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD and lie upon the table.

The memorial was ordered to lie on the table and be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

The Providence Board of Trade at a regular meeting held April 4, 1882, received and approved the report and resolution following, and directed them to be communicated to your honorable bodies:

The committee of the board of trade, to which the board at its last meeting referred the consideration of the bill to establish a system of bankruptcy in the United States, reported by the Judiciary Committee of the United States Senate, and sometimes known as the "Bonney" bill, respectfully report:

That on the 4th day of October last this board passed a resolution recommending and urging the passage by Congress of the bankruptcy bill prepared by Judge Lowell, of Boston, with some few amendments, none of which were of a radical character. That bill appears to have been considered by the board as substantially, and much more than any other, embodying its views as to the wants of this commercial community. This committee has examined the bill referred to them with care, and are decidedly of the opinion that it ought not to be adopted and passed into a law by Congress.

A law intended for general use by the people, and likely to apply to a great number of cases, should be so full and explicit in its language and directions that the great mass of the people, both debtors and creditors, who are to be affected by it may be able to judge of the main part of its applications to cases as they will arise, without the assistance of a lawyer. It should give such plain directions and statements respecting the rights of creditors, the duty of debtors, and the mode of handling the assigned estate by the assignee that all these parties may know what to do. But the bill referred to us does none of these things. It is, indeed, brief, symmetrical, and compact, and these are generally good qualities. But brevity and compactness in this case are attained by the total omission of those directions which the parties in such proceedings need and must have, either from the law or from the court; and by not putting them in the law, but leaving them to the court, the course to be pursued is rendered doubtful, difficult, and uncertain, and the manner of proceeding in bankruptcy cases may have as many varieties under this bill, should it become a law, as there are district courts in the United States. In this respect the Lowell bill is full and satisfactory.

The "Bonney" bill leaves the great mass of proceedings to the notions of what may be expedient that may be held by the several district judges throughout the United States, so that they may not be alike in any two districts, and they can only be made to assimilate by the more or less legislative action by the Supreme Court. On the other hand, all the courts would by the Lowell bill be kept to one uniform and simple course of practice. We do not think it well to put unnecessary legislative power in the hands of any court.

The "Bonney" bill provides for proceedings by a bill in equity, a course which is notoriously cumbersome, slow, and subject to many uncertainties. Proceedings in equity are likely to develop intricacies and subtleties requiring great learning in one who would master them. But the Lowell bill provides for proceedings by a very simple petition, which is clear, intelligible, and very rapid in its movements.

Frauds against the true intention and design of a bankrupt act can be committed under the "Bonney" bill with great ease, and the court would have no power to punish them. The contrivers of such frauds, very likely favored friends of the debtor, would be likely to acquire and possess the debtor's property, perhaps to turn it over after a while to him. Such frauds the Lowell bill punishes as crimes, we think with great justice. By the "Bonney" bill the debtor, after faithfully obeying all the requirements of the law, may be discharged if the court thinks proper to discharge him. Nobody can know what a judge will think about it. The honest and faithful debtor cannot claim a discharge as a right under that bill, and in this we think the Lowell bill is better. The debtor, if honest and in all respects obedient to the law, should have the right to be discharged.

The "Bonney" bill puts the care, management, sale, and distribution of the estate in the hands of a receiver, who may be appointed by the court against the will of both parties. The Lowell bill gives the creditors, the parties most interested in the property, the right to name the assignee, who is bound to work in their interest, and if he does not they may cause his removal. In this respect experience shows that people will look after their own interests best through an assignee of their own nomination.

The "Bonney" bill does not limit the fees chargeable by the various functionaries who will be employed in the management of insolvent estates "in chancery." We have no hesitation in saying that they will not only differ in each district through the country, but that they will be so large as to cause universal complaint. Under the former bankrupt law they were found to be very large; indeed, so large as to be a potent influence toward the repeal of the law. But the charges of clerks of courts marshals, receivers, and other functionaries, taxed as they ordinarily are in equity cases, would be so burdensome as soon to become unendurable. In this respect the fees and expenses are very reasonably limited in the Lowell bill.

There are several other objectionable points in this bill which your committee have not thought it necessary to point out. They are of the opinion that this bill does not provide for any such law as this community needs, and that it would be vastly better to go without any law on the subject than to have such a one as this bill would make

C. B. FARNSWORTH,
CHAS. H. MERRIMAN,
JAMES. M. KIMBALL,
ROYAL C. TAFT,
Committee.

Resolved, That the Providence Board of Trade urgently request the Senators and Representatives in Congress from Rhode Island to oppose as much as possible the enactment into a law of the bill reported by the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, known as the "Bonney" bill, for the purpose of establishing a system of bankruptcy throughout the United States; and that they be requested to urge the passage of the bill known as the Lowell bankruptcy bill, with such changes as have been heretofore recommended by this board, or a bill making provisions in cases of bankruptcy substantially like the Lowell bill.

CHAS. WARREN LIPPITT,
President.

FREEMAN P. LITTLE, Secretary.

Mr. HOAR presented the petition of Francis G. Shaw and 70 others, of Richmond County, New York, praying for legislation to define the function of the National Board of Health; which was referred to the Select Committee to investigate and report the best means of preventing the Introduction and Spread of Epidemic Diseases.

Mr. SHERMAN. I present a petition of the board of education and quite a number of citizens of Columbus, Ohio, with most of whom I have personal acquaintance, setting out that the enfranchisement of the freedmen imposes an obligation upon the Government to qualify them for the full discharge of the duties with which they are charged. The petitioners pray that Congress may make liberal appropriations for the purpose of educating the freedmen in the South. I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Education and Labor.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FARLEY presented a petition of citizens of Calaveras and San Joaquin Counties, California, praying for legislation regulating transportation charges on railroads; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. FARLEY. I present the petition of Walter R. Butt, of Bakersfield, Kern County, California, a graduate of the United States Naval Academy, praying to be relieved from disabilities incurred during the war by entering the confederate service. I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS presented a memorial of Harvey Ritchie and others, citizens of Claiborne County, Tennessee, protesting against the passage of the bill to transfer what are known as war claims to the Court of Claims; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. LAPHAM. I present a resolution of the Union League Club of New York City, in relation to the bill restricting Chinese immigration. This organization is presided over by Hon. William M. Evarts, who is probably as familiar with the history of the late treaty with China as any man in the country, and the expression of opinion coming from this organization is entitled to so much weight that I ask that the resolution be printed in the RECORD. It is very brief.

The memorial was ordered to lie on the table and be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEW YORK, April 14, 1882.

DEAR SIR: At a regular meeting of the Union League Club the following resolutions were unanimously adopted, and a copy ordered to be sent to His Excellency the President of the United States, and to each of the Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of New York:

Whereas it is the sentiment of the Union League Club that the bill which recently passed Congress, prohibiting the emigration of Chinese laborers into the United States for a period of twenty years and providing a system of passports to be used by all Chinese subjects who may desire to enter the United States for any purpose is in plain violation of the letter and spirit of existing treaties between the United States and China; and

Whereas it is one of the highest duties of a government to keep inviolate its treaty obligations with all nations; and

Whereas the adoption of the policy embraced in said bill would tend to impair the friendly relations between this country and China, which relations have been carefully cultivated ever since the year 1844, and would also tend to place our citizens and merchants in China on a less favorable basis than the citizens and merchants of other commercial countries: Therefore,

Resolved, That this club approves of the veto message of the President, and commends his firmness in interposing his objections to the bill, and his statesmanship in placing this important matter before the country in such a light that the people may be able to study the subject in all its delicate and complicated bearings.

WM. M. EVARTS, President.
DAVID MILLIKEN, JR., Secretary.

Mr. LAPHAM presented resolutions of the Newburgh Board of Trade, in favor of making Newburgh a port of entry; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a memorial of the jobbers and manufacturers of the city of Rochester, New York, in favor of what is known as the Lowell bankrupt bill; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. LAPHAM. I am also charged with presenting a petition coming from Mr. David M. Richardson, of the city of Detroit. Mr. Richardson's petition is addressed "to the Senate and House of Representatives," and recites in very brief terms, by way of preamble, that—

It has become a trite saying that peace hath her victories no less renowned than war. The United States being now at peace with all mankind, and being in the midst of great prosperity, the occasion has seemed to me appropriate for a discussion of some of those greater problems of statesmanship the correct solution of which may tend to give to our Government the honored place it should occupy among the nations of the earth and firmly secure to the generations who shall come after us the blessings we now enjoy.

It is with such a feeling that I beg to suggest that, among others, the following subjects should receive the careful consideration of the present Congress, namely:

Our foreign commerce, the interoceanic canal, our Navy, our coast defenses, the improvement of the Mississippi River, including an adequate system of levees, polygamy in the Territories, public schools, the revision of the tariff, and a modification of the internal-revenue laws.

It will be seen from this summary that work is laid out for us, if we are faithful, which may keep us here until we are driven away by the heat of the dog days and the summer solstice; yet, in obedience to my respect for the right of petition, I feel called upon to present this petition to the Senate. There is material enough in it, if it could be subdivided, to place in the hands of each of the committees having cognate subjects in charge a proper portion for its consideration; but as Governor Seward once said of human society, every human society has a continuous identity, susceptible of indefinite prolongation and incapable of division; and as this petitioner has so treated the subject, I therefore leave it to you, Mr. President, to determine to which of the committees of the Senate the petition shall be referred.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will consider the subject of reference before he decides.

Mr. ANTHONY. I believe the Judiciary Committee has everything that no other committee wants.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will lie on the table for the present.

Mr. GEORGE. I present a memorial of the Legislature of Mississippi in reference to the cotton tax, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor. When the order of the introduction of bills is reached, I shall ask leave to introduce a bill to carry out the purpose of the memorial.

The memorial was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A memorial from the Legislature of Mississippi to the Congress of the United States of America in reference to the cotton-tax money.

Be it resolved by the house of representatives of the State of Mississippi, (the senate concurring.) That the Congress of the United States of America be respectfully asked to enact such legislation as may be necessary to refund and distribute among the various cotton-producing States of the Union the proceeds of the tax levied on and collected from the cotton made by the people of said cotton-producing States, and kept in the Treasury of the United States; that to each of said cotton-producing States be refunded the amount of said money collected from the people thereof; the sum, so far as the State of Mississippi is concerned, to be securely invested at interest, and the interest devoted to the use and benefit of the common schools of the State.

Be it further resolved, That we make this request and urge this measure upon the attention of the Congress of the United States of America, because we believe that the way suggested is the best manner in which the money can be used, inasmuch as it is impracticable, not to say impossible, to repay the money to the persons from whom the same was collected. We have in our State a large school population—the children not only of our white people but also the children of the colored people—all of whom we are desirous of seeing blessed with a good common school education. As it is, they enjoy equal but necessarily limited educational advantages. It is essential that those advantages be increased, not so much by enlarging the course of study as by extending the school term. The term or session in the country districts can last but four months, and often in many counties in this State falls far short of that. This occurs not from any hostility on the part of our people toward the public schools, but from their inability to bear greater taxation than is now imposed upon them. Should this, our request, be granted, the interest on the money collected from our people in the years immediately succeeding the late war between the States would enable us to extend our school term at least two months in every year, and thereby work lasting good to our people and to the whole country.

Be it further resolved, That a copy of this memorial be sent by the secretary of state to each of the Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of Mississippi, to be by them presented and laid before the Congress of the United States of America.

Approved, March 7, 1882.

Mr. PLATT presented a resolution of the Chamber of Commerce of New Haven, Connecticut, in favor of a resurvey of the waters of Long Island Sound, and asking an appropriation for that purpose; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. MILLER, of California, presented a memorial of citizens of California, remonstrating against the passage of the bill to apply the revenues arising from the tax upon alcoholic liquors to the support of public schools; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a memorial of citizens of California, protesting against the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 920) proposing a tax of $2.40 per dozen upon American champagne or sparkling wines impregnated with carbonic acid gas; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HALE presented the petition of Harriett Linnell, widow of Elisha Linnell, a soldier of the war of 1812, praying that her name be placed on the pension-roll; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. VANCE presented a petition of citizens of Edgecombe County, North Carolina, praying for the creation and distribution of a fund for educational purposes among the States and Territories; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. PLUMB. I present a number of petitions signed largely by citizens of Kansas, requesting that the sum of $50,000 be appropriated to be expended by the Commissioners of Education, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, for the establishment of public schools in Alaska. I move that the petitions be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. I present a petition numerously signed by citizens of Washington Territory, representing that they have sustained great injustice and loss by the course pursued by the Northern Pacific Railroad Company in reference to their land grant, and asking that immediate steps may be taken to declare a forfeiture of that portion of the public domain claimed by the company which it has not hitherto earned. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Railroads.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Similar petitions have gone to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. INGALLS. Perhaps that course might be taken in this instance, although as a bill has lately been reported from that committee upon the general subject of declaring these unclaimed land grants subject to taxation, the petition might as well lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will lie on the table.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, presented a petition of citizens of the United States, students of the University of Wisconsin, praying for certain reforms in the civil service; which was referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

Mr. PENDLETON presented the petition of Henry Baer & Co. and other firms and citizens of Zanesville, Ohio, praying for the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 5656) to amend the laws relating to the entry of distilled spirits in distillery and special bonded warehouses, and the withdrawal of the same therefrom; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of the Board of Trade and Transportation of Cincinnati, Ohio, in favor of the passage of the measure commonly known as the Lowell bankrupt bill; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented the petition of Frank Linck, of Cincinnati, Ohio, and the maltsters of the first, second, and third Congressional districts of Ohio, praying for the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 1079) fixing the rate of duty on barley malt at $2.50 per bushel; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. COCKRELL presented a petition of citizens of Cass County, Missouri, praying for the passage of a law regulating transportation charges on railroads; which was referred to the Committee on Railroads.

Mr. WINDOM presented the memorial of William P. Roberts, grand worthy chief templar, and others, citizens of Minnesota, remonstrating against the passage of the bill providing that the revenue derived by the Government from the tax upon alcoholic liquors be used as an educational fund; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. MORGAN presented the petition of the officers and members of the Mobile Cotton Exchange, praying for the passage of what is known as the Lowell bill, to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States; which was ordered to lie on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills:

A bill (S. No. 240) granting an increase of pension to Henry Strawbridge; and

A bill (S. No. 1677) to amend the act donating public lands to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and mechanic arts.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolution; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 5908) making an immediate appropriation for the removal of obstructions at Hell Gate, New York;

A bill (H. R. No. 3680) for the relief of John G. Taylor; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 186) authorizing the erection of a light on the tower of the Chicago water-works crib, Chicago, Illinois.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. No. 3246) changing the name of the German Protestant Orphan Asylum Association; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. JONES, of Florida, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1563) for the erection of a public building at Lynchburgh, Virginia, reported it with amendments.

Mr. VEST, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 239) to provide for the erection of a public building in the city of Quincy, in the State of Illinois, reported it without amendment.

Mr. VANCE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 678) for the relief of J. B. Cornell and others, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. GARLAND. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 700) for the relief of the State National Bank of Boston, Massachusetts, to report it adversely and to move its indefinite postponement. I do not care about the order being now entered. Let the bill go on the Calendar, as the Senators from Massachusetts are probably interested in it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. CAMDEN, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1653) granting a pension to Henry Thresher, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was ordered to be printed; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3399) granting a pension to E. L. Husted, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was ordered to be printed; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1499) granting a pension to Mathias Wondrak, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was ordered to be printed; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 5385) granting a pension to the minor children of James Eagle, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was ordered to be printed; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

FISHERIES REPORT.

Mr. ANTHONY, from the Committee on Printing, to which was referred the following concurrent resolution, reported it without amendment; and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That there be printed 10,000 extra copies of the report of the Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries for the year 1881, of which 2,000 shall be for the use of the Senate, 6,000 for the use of the House of Representatives, and 1,500 for the use of the Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries, the illustrations to be made by the Public Printer under the direction of the Joint Committee on Public Printing, and 500 for sale by the Public Printer, under such regulations as the Joint Committee on Printing may prescribe, at a price equal to the additional cost of publication and 10 per cent. thereto added.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SHERMAN asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1765) granting a pension to William R. Snook; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. GEORGE asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1766) to refund to the several States the proceeds of the cotton tax, to be devoted to common schools; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. INGALLS (by request) asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1767) granting a pension to William Foose; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PLATT asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1768) for the relief of L. F. Norton; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1769) granting a pension to Mrs. Philomene Larned; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. COCKRELL asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1770) to facilitate the negotiation of bills of lading and other commercial instruments, and to punish fraud therein; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1771) to authorize the appointment of a special commissioner for promoting commercial intercourse with such countries of Central and South America as may be found to possess the most natural and available facilities for railway inter-communication with each other and with the United States; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that the bill, with the accompanying brief and reasons for its passage, be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. VOORHEES asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1772) granting a pension to Isaiah Mitchell; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1773) for the relief of William McGarrahan; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. MILLER, of New York, asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1774) authorizing the sale of the land and premises formerly occupied as a site for the post-office in the city of New York; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. WALKER asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1775) for the relief of John G. Abercrombie; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

The above bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

AMENDMENT TO POST-ROUTE BILL.

Mr. HARRIS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 5812) to establish post-routes; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

PUNITIVE DAMAGES AGAINST THE GOVERNMENT.

Mr. GEORGE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Judiciary Committee be instructed to inquire if any legislation be necessary, and if so what, to secure a fair and impartial determination of cases triable in the courts of this District wherein the United States may be interested on account of their liability to make good any recovery which may be had against the defendant therein, or otherwise; and that they also inquire into the existing rules of law as to the allowance of punitive damages in such cases, and whether any change in the same is expedient and proper; and that they report by bill or otherwise at as early a day as practicable.

JULIA A. CHAMBERS.

Mr. VOORHEES. With the consent of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. JACKSON] I ask to have recommitted to the Committee on Pensions the bill (S. No. 1024) increasing the pension of Julia A. Chambers, reported by him adversely and postponed indefinitely. I make the request with the expectation of throwing some light upon the case not given to the Senator from Tennessee at the time the report was drawn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order for the indefinite postponement of the bill will be reconsidered, if there be no objection. The Chair hears none, and the bill will be recommitted to the Committee on Pensions.

DAVID WALDO & COMPANY.

Mr. COCKRELL. The bill (S. No. 787) for the relief of David Waldo & Co. was reported by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. JACKSON] adversely, and at my instance placed on the Calendar. I move that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Claims, with the additional evidence which I now present to the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. MAXEY, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Pensions be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Catherine Pentenoy, and that she have leave to withdraw the same from the files of the Senate.

The above bills and joint resolutions were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

UMATILLA RESERVATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further routine morning business, the Calendar will be proceeded with under the Anthony rule. The Chair will state that the printers have made a mistake in printing the Calendar for to-day, and the first bill appearing on the Calendar, the bill (S. No. 73) for the relief of L. Madison Day, was passed over on Friday. The first bill on the Calendar is the bill (S. No. 1434) providing for allotment of lands in severalty to the Indians residing upon the Umatilla reservation, in the State of Oregon, and granting patents therefor, and for other purposes; which is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole. The bill was read when it was reached on Friday, but the report was not read, though then called for. Is the reading of the report now called for?

Mr. SHERMAN and Mr. SLATER. The report had better be read.

The Principal Legislative Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. DAWES March 9:

Your committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1434) entitled "A bill providing for allotment of lands in severalty to the Indians residing upon the Umatilla reservation, in the State of Oregon, and granting patents therefor, and for other purposes," have had the same under consideration, and report as follows:

The Umatilla reservation was created by treaty with the Walla Walla, Cayuse, and Umatilla tribes and bands of Indians, occupying lands partly in Washington Territory and partly in Oregon, which treaty was promulgated April 11, 1859. The reservation contains 268,800 acres of land, of which 150,000 is tillable; the residue is pasture and timber lands.

The Indians upon this reservation have for the most part since their location on the same been peaceable and friendly toward the whites; have made some progress toward civilization; cultivated in 1881, as shown by the agent's report, 4,000 acres, broke during the year 2,000 acres new land, produced 10,000 bushels of wheat, 2,000 bushels of corn, 6,000 bushels of oats and barley, 6,000 bushels of vegetables, cut 900 tons of hay, 75,000 feet of lumber, 1,000 cords of wood, and built 10,000 rods of fence. They have 10,000 head of horses, 50 head of mules, 400 head of cattle, 5 head of swine, and 3,000 head of sheep. They earn by labor in civilized pursuits 65 per cent. of their subsistence and support, procure 12 per cent. by hunting and fishing, and receive in rations from the Government 23 per cent.

The number of Indians on this reservation, as shown by the report of the agent for 1881, is 751: males, 330; females, 421. Of the whole number 504 are wholly clad in citizen's dress, and 123 partly. Two hundred and fifty-two families are reported as engaged in agriculture, and 162 male Indians undertake manual labor in civilized pursuits.

The Indians for some years have in various ways manifested their desire to take lands in severalty and secure titles to homes for themselves and children. In April, 1879, several of the chiefs and head men visited Washington to confer with the Indian Office in respect to making a permanent settlement on their reservation, or, in lieu of such settlement, to remove to some other locality. The matter was to be left to the Indians upon their return to their reservation, which was determined by them the following November in favor of remaining upon their present reservation and taking lands in severalty.

The agent, in his annual report for 1880, referring to this matter, says:

"In November, 1879, I visited the different lodges of the Indians in regard to the agreement entered into with the chiefs at Washington in April, 1879, concerning their future settlement. Five hundred and thirty-nine Indians have decided to take land, thirty-six are still undecided, and nine wish to remove. (List forwarded December 8, 1879, with report.)"

The agent further reports that "on the 15th of January, 1880, a council was held for the purpose of taking into consideration any propositions compatible with the agreement entered into by the chiefs, (April, 1879,) that would have a tendency to improve the condition of Indians taking land in severalty here," at which council the following, among other things, were agreed upon to be requested in their behalf:

"That the laws of inheritance of the United States be extended over all Indians taking lands in severalty on this reservation. Their reason for making the request is to secure to the rightful heirs the real estate and personal property of deceased Indians, so as to prevent the Indian custom of dividing the property among friends of the deceased.

"That each person entitled to one hundred and sixty acres of land be allowed, in addition, forty acres of timber land, if they choose to take it. Their reason for making this request is that some of the best agricultural land on the reservation is devoid of timber; that many are anxious to take this land, but are unable to purchase the timber necessary for building, fencing, and fire-wood.

"That an agent be retained to distribute the money accruing from the sale of land, and to guard their interests against the surrounding whites. They (the Indians) are afraid that the whites surrounding the reservation would be continually interfering and meddling in their affairs if left without an agent.

"That a sufficient amount of money accruing from the sale of land be appropriated to erect and furnish a manual labor and boarding school for their children, and to board them; also, to employ two teachers and a matron, and to furnish the necessary books and stationery.

"To receive in cash all payments made them in money accruing from the sale of the land. They (the Indians) claim to be able to buy and sell judiciously, and prefer to receive money instead of goods.

"To have the reservation surveyed as soon as possible, so as to enable them to locate during the coming summer."

It will be seen that these requests have each and all received proper provisions in the bill now presented. In regard to timber, the bill provides, in section 1, that, in addition to the agricultural lands to be allotted in severalty, pasture and timber land shall also be set apart for these Indians to be used in common, and it is believed that this will better subserve the interests of the Indians than to give additional timber land in severalty, as it will give each and all an equal chance for timber for building, fencing, and fuel.

The amount of agricultural lands required for allotments, upon the most liberal calculations under the provisions of the bill, cannot exceed 68,000 or 70,000 acres. An additional amount of pasture and timber land, to be used in common, is also to be set apart, the whole for all purposes not to exceed 120,000 acres. If there be any fault in the provisions of the bill in this respect, it cannot be urged that too little land is allowed, but rather that too much is given.

It is believed to be wise, however, to make ample provision for pastoral purposes, in which direction these Indians now have considerable interest. The maximum of the diminished reservation will, after all allotments are made, furnish not less than 50,000 acres of timber and pasture lands; and the timber lands upon this reservation are also valuable for pasturage. Besides, it cannot be expected that for many years the agricultural lands to be allotted will be reduced to tillage or inclosed even so that the pasturage furnished in the diminished reservation will be ample for all requirements of these Indians.

The control of the reservation, with an agent to look after the interests of the Indians, will remain as heretofore, and as requested by the Indians themselves.

The establishment of an industrial farm and labor school for the benefit of these Indians commends itself to every well-wisher of the Indian race, and the conditions for the experiment on this reservation is most favorable and encouraging.

The lands belonging to this reservation, over and above the requirements of the several provisions of the bill, will, when sold, secure an ample fund to establish such a farm and school, and, it is confidently believed, leave a considerable sum from the income of which it may derive continued support.

The mode of disposing of the surplus lands of the reservation is believed to be the best under all the circumstances, and will secure to the Indians a just, fair, and reasonable price for their lands, and will prevent moneyed men from purchasing large bodies of it, while men in moderate circumstances will be furnished a fair opportunity of securing a home for themselves and families.

The bill has been very fully and carefully considered by your committee, has been submitted to the Indian Department, and by that Department carefully considered, and in general recommended as in accordance with its views and policy, with certain suggestions respecting the detail of its provisions, which suggestions, with one exception, have been embodied in amendments herewith proposed, and with these amendments your committee recommend that the bill be passed.

Mr. DAWES. The matter which is involved in the lines on the third page, beginning with the proviso in the fifty-fourth line of section 1, has been discussed several times in the Senate; and to obviate all question about it, to reach precisely what is sought for in that proviso and at the same time avoid any question about the right of the State to tax this land so held by an Indian in severalty, I have prepared a substitute for the proviso, which I have shown to several members—not all, for I have not had time—of the Committee on Indian Affairs, and which I think will commend itself to the Senate. Therefore I move to strike out that proviso and insert what I send to the desk.

The ACTING SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out, after the word "act," in line 54 of section 1, the following proviso:

Provided, That the title to lands acquired by Indians under the provisions of this act shall not be subject to alienation or incumbrance, either by voluntary conveyance or by the judgment, decree, or the order of any court, but shall be and remain inalienable and not subject to taxation, lien, or incumbrance for any purpose for a period of ten years from the date of patent, and until such time thereafter as the President may see fit to remove the restriction, which conditions shall be expressed in the patent.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

Which shall be of the legal effect, and declare that the United States does and will hold the land thus allotted for the period of twenty-five years in trust for the sole use and benefit of the Indian to whom such allotment shall have been made; or, in case of his decease, of his heirs, according to the laws of the State of Oregon, and that at the expiration of said period the United States will convey the same by patent to said Indian or his heirs, as aforesaid, in fee, discharged of said trust and free of all charge or incumbrance whatsoever.

Mr. DAWES. That, in short, Mr. President, provides that the United States shall hold the title itself to this particular severalty, but in trust for the sole use and benefit of each Indian getting his land in severalty. The Indian, therefore, under the law will be to all intents and purposes the occupant of the land and enjoy all its use, and at the end of twenty-five years the United States will be obliged by the force of this provision to give him or his heirs a patent discharged of the trust and free of incumbrance. It will be impossible to raise the question of taxation under that provision, and that will secure to the Indian his rights in severalty precisely as the other provision would.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SLATER. I offer the following amendment on line 43 of section 2: strike out, after the word "make," to and including the word "Interior," in line 46, and insert:

Any payment when the same becomes due, the Secretary of the Interior shall cause said land to be again offered at public or private sale, after notice to the delinquent; and if said land shall sell for more than the balance due thereon, the surplus, after deducting expenses, shall be paid over to the first purchaser.

The words to be stricken out are:

Payment as required he shall forfeit the land purchased, and the same shall be subject to entry and sale, at the appraised value thereof, at the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior.

So as to make the clause read:

No patent shall issue until all payments shall have been made; and on the failure of any purchaser to make any payment when the same becomes due the Secretary of the Interior shall cause said land to be again offered at public or private sale, after notice to the delinquent; and if said land shall sell for more than the balance due thereon, the surplus, after deducting expenses, shall be paid over to the first purchaser.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SLATER. I offer the following amendment, to come in at the end of section 6:

And shall have power to determine all disputes and questions arising between Indians respecting their allotments, and shall fix the compensation to be allowed to the commissioners provided for in section 2.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SLATER. I offer the following amendment, to come in on line 54 of section 2: Strike out the word "prior," at the end of line 54, so as to read "shall have a right."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SLATER. After the word "right," in line 55 of the same section, I move to insert "at any time after advertisement and before sale at public auction;" so as to read:

Shall have a right at any time after advertisement and before sale, at public auction, to purchase at their appraised value so much of said lands, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONGER. On page 5, line 11, of section 2, I move to strike out the words "reimbursed the value of such improvements, in money or in other improvements upon his allotment, as shall be determined by the Department," and insert "shall be entitled to an allotment of such land and improvements."

I see that the bill, in section 1, on page 3, provides that the allotment of lands to Indians as made by the commissioners, shall be in as compact a form as possible, and this provision is that if, after having made the allotments in a compact form, some Indians have their farms or their improvements on some part of the ground not within this compact form, those improvements shall be valued or appraised and the additional value shall be given to the Indian who is driven from his farm and his home to enable him to make himself another farm and another home.

Now, what possible benefit it can be to the Indians for the Government of the United States to seize upon the lands which one of them has improved in his first effort at cultivation and civilization and huddle them all together in a compact reservation, compelling them to leave the improvements they have made, and receive some contemplated reimbursement in the shape of aid or of money, God knows, I cannot see at all; and it seems to me that the system of taking away from the Indians generally all the lands they have and giving them forty or eighty or one hundred and sixty acres, a tithe or perhaps a fiftieth part of the lands which we have formerly allowed them, is bad enough, without by law authorizing a commission appointed by this act of Congress to go over all this large reservation and first place the Indians within any portion of the territory, whether it is the best land or the poorest; and if they carry out the provisions of this bill they will make their allotments in a compact form upon the poorest land, for this kind of bill is evidently to give the best lands of the Indians to the whites. I say I cannot see why Congress should authorize by law, at the will and caprice of commissioners, the authority to go and take away from every Indian who has made improvements, has labored, has been encouraged to make himself a home and a farm, and compel him to go on a new piece of land, away from his home, away from the place he has selected within his reservation to live, and give him the uncertain opportunity of receiving something to enable him to make improvements elsewhere. The whole spirit of that proposition in this bill is infamous in my judgment, unworthy of this Government, unworthy of the legislation of this body. I should like to hear it defended if it is possible to defend it against the common judgment, and the common sense, and the common ideas of humanity under which we pretend to be governed in our treatment of the Indian question.

Why not give the Indian his farm? Why not give him the result of his labor? Why drive him off to some other territory and to some new land and leave him to wait until the appraisal of these lands has been made, and then allow him whatever pittance is estimated with which to build a new home? If that proposition was made in regard to the poorest white man that has settled between the Rocky Mountains and the Alleghanies upon the public lands, and the people of the United States knew it, it would meet with universal condemnation. You could not do it to the poorest immigrant that came into this country without exciting the hostility and condemnation of every honorable man in the land. But these Indians that we are legislating for may be driven one after another from their lands, as Chief Joseph was from the home he had built up for himself and his family, and not a voice raised against it.

Now I admit——

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. HARRIS in the chair.) The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. CONGER. I think I have said enough. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER.]

Mr. SLATER. Mr. President, I presume if the Senator was as well acquainted with this reservation as I am myself, and as the Indian Department is, he would not have made the objection to this particular clause of the bill that he has made. These Indians are settled compactly now, and it is fair to presume that when this new reservation within the present reservation is set apart by the commission it will include all their improvements; but there were possibilities that one or two, at most three, places with small improvements might fall without the limits of the new reservation, and compensation must necessarily be made to these Indians. It was not considered by the Department or those who prepared the bill to be wise to leave these Indians to be surrounded by the settlements of whites alone, but that their settlement should be compact and among themselves, and as the report says (and it recites the recommendation) they themselves have requested that their domain shall be still continued as a reservation with an agent, in order that they may be protected from their supposed more crafty neighbors. That request is complied with in this very provision. They are to have their improvements appraised, and the value of the improvements is to be returned to them either in money or in new homes, under the control and direction of the Department of the Interior; and to adopt the amendment of the Senator from Michigan would be simply destructive of the entire purpose of the bill.

Mr. CONGER. I move to postpone the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan moves to postpone the further consideration of the bill.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. President, I have made that motion simply for the purpose of making a few further remarks. I desire to say, in answer to the Senator from Oregon, that those who have been most familiar with the Indians and their lands and their reservations, those who have been most desirous for their improvement and civilization, have always said, not once or twice, but always said, that the easiest way to bring them into habits of civilization is to separate them from their close community with each other, to allow whites to come in among them to be their neighbors, owning adjoining lands, not to huddle them together in reservations. That has been the strong argument heretofore.

Now, it seems to suit best to get the better of these lands (and I thank the Senator from Oregon for the admission) for the crafty neighbors of these Indians—that was the language he used——

Mr. SLATER. No, sir; I said from their supposed crafty neighbors, those that they supposed were crafty.

Mr. CONGER. I say from their crafty neighbors. It is an admission for which I thank the Senator. This craftiness will apply not only to the good people of Oregon but to the good people of every Territory where there are Indian lands.

It is better if these Indians have their lands in severalty, for their education, for their improvement, for the example around them, that they have their lands scattered here and there among the lands of whites; infinitely better. But this compels them to be huddled together with no chance to observe the improvements all around them of their white neighbors.

But I do not put it upon that. I put it upon the abstract right of every Indian to whom this Government has given land which he has used and occupied and labored upon, to make his home and to endear his home to him by his own labor, that he shall have the right, notwithstanding the legislation of Congress, if he is to have a separate allotment, to take his home and keep it on so much land as the law gives him as his home, together with his improvements.

I said before that if this were attempted in regard to the most obscure and humble white man that settles within our territory, and the facts were made known to the American people, there would be one universal execration of that attempt to drive a man from his own home and land and compel him to take whatever his neighbor or a commissioner saw fit to place him upon.

These are my views. I trust many of these bills on account of the very eloquent and florid and affectionate and earnest speeches of the chairman of this committee, expressing profoundly his regard for individual Indians and for Indians at large. But will he defend this clause in the bill? In view of the sympathy he has expressed for the Indians at large and the individual ones, will he vote to make this new allotment thus to drive Indians from their homes and from their improvements, and put them upon wild, waste land? I may almost say that my confidence in the Senator from Massachusetts would warrant me in withdrawing all opposition to this bill if he will rise in his place and pretend for a moment that such a proposition is right.

I withdraw my motion to postpone.

Mr. SLATER. I hope the Senator will not withdraw his motion for a moment. I hope he will allow it to stand for a moment.

Mr. CONGER. The Senator can renew it.

Mr. SLATER. Very well, I do. Mr. President, the Senator's argument overreaches his proposition entirely. In the first place, in the history of this matter, these Indians sent a delegation to this city two years ago to ask the Department to do just this thing, to let them have lands in severalty, and when they came to consider the matter finally among themselves at home they desired their lands in severalty, but they desired the reservation to remain intact, and what was not occupied for reservation purposes to be set apart and sold for their benefit. You cannot keep up a reservation and scatter the Indians all over the country promiscuously among white people; that is a matter of impossibility. The bill provides for the possibility of some improvements falling without the limits of the new reservation. They have asked this, and the bill provides that before it can go into effect their assent is to be obtained to the provisions of the bill. There can be no harm in this. Their consent must be obtained, and in writing, and by a majority of the male adults of the tribe. I withdraw the motion now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER.]

Mr. DAWES. It is in order to renew the motion to postpone. What the Senator from Michigan says in its general application to the treatment of the Indians is perfectly true, and no one desires to gainsay the doctrine that an Indian should not be moved against his will from his location where he has already made improvements upon his land and set himself up in severalty, and has so far advanced in civilization as to be able to take care of himself. But my experience upon this committee has been to me an educating process, and I have come to understand that no general rule applicable to all Indians in this matter of setting up Indians in severalty can be enacted; that each individual Indian must be treated by himself. I had supposed that inasmuch as this bill provided for all this being done by a commission to be appointed by the Department, the commission, upon the ground and understanding the nature of the land, the disposition and desire of the Indians, and the condition of each individual Indian, would come as near securing their rights as possible, inasmuch as before their action could be confirmed it must be reported to the Secretary of the Interior for his approval. On this account I thought we should approximate very nearly to doing as much justice to these Indians as possible by the bill in its present form.

It is supposed that there may be two or three Indians who are residing upon lands that may possibly fall outside of the reduced reservation. What it would be best to do with these Indians the Committee on Indian Affairs, without knowing a great many things that it was impossible for them to know, could not say, and they have trusted that matter to the commission. They have supposed that if there were found three or four of these Indians so situated that it would be better for them to have their improvements paid for satisfactorily to themselves and they given lands with their brethren all together it would be more advisable than to push them out by force into the world. We cannot say whether that will be a blessing to these Indians or a curse to them; therefore the Committee on Indian Affairs were of opinion that on the whole it would be best to trust the whole thing to three commissioners.

I am not going to resist or undertake to controvert the abstract proposition laid down by the Senator from Michigan. It is true that as a rule it is better for the Indian to come in contact as much as he can with the white man, but that depends upon what kind of an Indian he is, and the Senator must know that there are a great many Indians that if you put them among white men, set them up on farms surrounded by white men, will soon have no land. The Senator does not mean to apply any such policy as that to such an Indian. I know there is nothing in his speech that would indicate that. When you come to apply this to a whole reservation, you have got to take that contingency into account. If the Senator believes it possible for the commission to wrong an Indian, he will find me helping him to support any provision that will prevent that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Michigan.

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary suggests that in the second proviso in the first section, the first having been stricken out, the word "also" should be stricken out after the word "provided." It will be so ordered, there being no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

LANDS IN SEVERALTY TO INDIANS.

The bill (S. No. 1455) to provide for the allotment of lands in severalty to Indians on the various reservations, and to extend the protection of the laws of the States and Territories over the Indians, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. DAWES. I offer the same amendment which I offered to the bill that has just passed, to strike out the proviso on the fifth page, beginning at the third line of the fifth section, down to and including the eleventh line, and insert:

Which shall be of the legal effect, and declare that the United States does and will hold the land thus allotted for the period of twenty-five years in trust for the sole use and benefit of the Indian to whom such allotment shall have been made, or, in case of decease, of his heirs according to the laws of the State or Territory where such land is located, and that at the expiration of said period the United States will convey the same by patent to said Indian or his heirs aforesaid in fee discharged of said trust and free of all charge or incumbrance whatsoever.

Mr. COKE. While I do not see the necessity of that amendment, I cannot perceive that it will do any harm, and am willing, as far as I am concerned, to accept it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. I move to add to section 8, "to be repaid pro rata out of any proceeds of the sales of such lands as may be acquired from the Indians under the provisions of this act."

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. How will it read then?

The ACTING SECRETARY. If amended as proposed, the section will read:

SEC. 8. That for the purpose of making the surveys and resurveys mentioned in section 1 of this act there be, and hereby is, appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $100,000, to be repaid pro rata out of any proceeds of the sales of such lands as may be acquired from the Indians under the provisions of this act.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question was on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. PLUMB. I ask unanimous consent that the words "pro rata" in my amendment be changed to the word "proportionately." I think that expresses the idea better.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection to the modification being made, and it will be so modified.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SUPREME COURT QUORUM.

The bill (S. No. 814) to amend section 673 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to the quorum of the Supreme Court of the United States, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with amendments.

The first amendment was, in line 4, after "United States," to insert "provided for by law;" so as to read:

That hereafter a majority of the justices of the Supreme Court of the United States provided for by law shall constitute a quorum thereof.

Mr. PENDLETON. I should like some explanation of the bill. There is no report.

Mr. GARLAND. Under the act of the 10th of April, 1869, section 673 of the Revised Statutes, the Supreme Court of the United States is made to consist of one Chief-Justice and eight associate justices, "any six of whom shall constitute a quorum." It is found that this has been a very inconvenient statute to comply with on account of the frequent necessary absences of judges either on circuit or on account of sickness. On consultation with some of the judges of that court, the committee have seen proper to change the law, accepting the common rule applied to bodies of that character that simply a majority of them, as they may exist by law, shall constitute a quorum, so that if there are six, eight, nine, ten, or eleven, not a specific number shall be required to be a quorum, but simply a majority, which will insure the holding of the court more regularly and more regular attendance to the business of the court. The quorum will vary as the number may go up or down. A majority of the legal number will be a quorum. The words of the amendment are "provided by law;" so that if the law at any time changes the number from nine to ten or nine to seven, the majority of that number, whatever it may be, will constitute a quorum of the court.

I wish to call the attention of the Senate to an amendment following this, a very important one, and which is not particularly clear to myself, nor was it to the committee; and I shall be frank with the Senate in stating the exact position of the amendment before the committee.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator permit me to say to him that if it is the purpose of the persons having charge of this bill to insist on the amendment he is now coming to, which relates to a totally different subject, having no connection with the other, I shall interpose an objection. I will not interpose an objection until he has made his remarks, if he prefers to make them; but I give notice that when his remarks are over I shall interpose an objection to the bill, unless the committee are content to take the provision in regard to a quorum of the court, and not embarrass it with the other.

Mr. GARLAND. Let me say to the Senator from Massachusetts that I will make the statement, as I think it my duty, having the bill in charge, in reference to the whole bill—and I was proceeding to make a very frank statement to the Senate—and then the Senate can do what they please with it, say whether they will consider it now or at a future time.

It is true, as the Senator from Massachusetts suggests, that the last amendment refers to a totally different matter, although it falls within the organization of the court. It was thought an opportune time to put in something with reference to this matter if it needed attention at all.

It is to be observed by every person who reads the decisions of the Supreme Court, and by those who practice in that court, that it is a practice almost invariable that when a case is appealed from a circuit court below to the Supreme Court the record is handed over to the associate justice who presided in the court below. I have not made an estimate; but I venture the assertion that three-fourths of the cases are treated in that manner. Referring an appeal to one of the judges who presided at the trial of the case below, already committed to his decision, with his pride of opinion, with his influence with the court, amounts, in my judgment, to denying the appellant a fair trial in the Supreme Court. It fails to give the appealing party a fair and impartial trial, for he meets at the threshold one of the seven or eight or nine judges, as the case may be, who has already decided the case; who has already prejudged it; and it is simply an appeal "from Philip drunk to Philip sober," or vice versa, as the case may be. I have seen and watched and noticed the operation of this rule to be very detrimental in many cases.

It is said that it is necessary for these judges to participate in order to inform the other judges, possibly, of the operation of the local law, the decision of the local court, of what the local laws are particularly as to limitations, as to descents and distributions, and so on; but information on this point is accessible to the other judges through the library of the court, and it is not necessary to put the court in possession of them that the judge who presided in the court below should give them his judgment, already made up, upon this case, for the record shows that at least.

So much for that; upon that point I think it important that something should be done. But here is another point that I want to call the attention of the Senate to. I have my doubts, notwithstanding this was my amendment to the bill in committee. A very close point was presented whether or not Congress can, under the Constitution, do this. I want the Senate now to have the advantage of everything that transpired in reference to the matter. My judgment is that Congress can constitutionally do it, but it is not one of those clear points that can be absolutely affirmed. It is not one of those points that we meet sometimes in the exact sciences where we can put our finger and say "It is here precisely and nowhere else; it is this thing and nothing else." But under the distribution of powers in the Constitution the judicial power is vested in one Supreme Court.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. GARLAND. I shall take but a very few moments to explain this report, and I ask unanimous consent to proceed.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the Senator have leave to proceed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the Senator will proceed.

Mr. GARLAND. The Constitution vests the judiciary power "in one Supreme Court," &c., leaving that court to be provided for by Congress. Then it goes on in the next section and says that the judicial power shall extend to certain cases. After distributing the original jurisdiction it says that appellate jurisdiction can exist in this court "both as to law and to fact, with such exceptions and under such regulations as the Congress shall make." My judgment is that under that section of the Constitution Congress can make provision that a judge who presided in the hearing of the case in the court below shall stand aside when the case is heard in the Supreme Court. Of course the trouble is met there again that in taking away this judge you have but eight judges as the court is now organized. Then under this bill five of these eight would make a quorum. That difficulty is met in that way.

I think the whole bill is just and advisable, and so far as the second amendment is concerned my judgment is—and I have given reasons for it—that Congress has the power to prescribe it.

Mr. BUTLER. Do I understand the Senator from Arkansas to state that the amendment he is now discussing proposes to withdraw the judge who presided below entirely from the consideration of the case in the Supreme Court?

Mr. GARLAND. He is not to participate in the hearing above. Nothing I said as to his conferring with the other judges or his saying this, that, or the other simply as a man; but he shall not be counted as one judge in that case and shall not have a voice in the deciding of it in the appellate court. That is all. So he is excluded from the bench in that case, and necessarily, as there are nine judges, there will be only eight to pass on the case.

Mr. HOAR. Does the Senator from Arkansas mean to imply that if that provision becomes a law he would think it becoming that a judge should converse, a person excluded from sitting or participating in the decision should speak to the other judges about the case?

Mr. GARLAND. I do not think it would be very proper. I simply answered the question of the Senator from South Carolina; I cannot answer two at once. I answered his question that the judge was not excluded from this bill, but I take it for granted no judge under this law would confer about such a case; but the Senator from South Carolina asked me if he was excluded from conversing with the other judges. He does not participate in the hearing; he is not one of the judges to pass upon that case. That is the whole matter of this bill. I have said all I desire to say about it now or hereafter.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I wish to state before this bill passes from before the Senate, in one word, my dissent from its propositions. If this bill goes into effect with the amendments, it would be quite possible that in many instances judgments would be rendered by the Supreme Court against the opinion of a majority of its members. There was a very curious instance of that in the attempt to enforce a provision which I think afterward was abandoned in Great Britain in the case of the court of exchequer chamber. That court was made up of four judges of the King's bench, four judges of the common pleas, and four judges of the court of exchequer, with a provision that the judges belonging to that court from which the question came to the court of exchequer chamber should not sit on the hearing of the exceptions on appeal. The result of that was that of the twelve judges who composed the exchequer chamber the four belonging to the court from which the exceptions came might be one way, they could not sit at the hearing; the other eight determined the case by a majority of five to three, so that seven judges of the court might be against the opinion which became the law of the land as announced by the judgment of the court.

I believe that whole theory in England was abandoned, and it seems to me that it is the height of absurdity to say that the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States shall not have the benefit of the opinion upon a question of law of the judge who has decided it when it first arose and applied it to the facts of the case which occurred before him. It is very often the case that causes go up to that court which are argued imperfectly by counsel on both sides. A case may be argued before a judge like Marshall, or Taney, or Ellsworth, and that cause is to be heard by the tribunal of which Marshall, or Taney, or Ellsworth is the head, he being compelled to sit dumb and hear counsel who cannot comprehend or grasp the reasons which have governed him in his judgment, submit that case to his associates, and they be compelled to decide it upon such a presentation as is made by counsel.

Mr. President, I believe the true theory in legislating, or in framing constitutions, especially in reference to tribunals like the Supreme Court of the United States, is to presume—a presumption which the facts and the history of that illustrious tribunal warrant—the greatness of its members, their capacity to rise above little petty and unimportant considerations like the pride of opinion or the dislike to be overruled. I believe it has always been a characteristic of our greatest judges that they have been as capable of dealing impartially with questions which they have once considered and decided as with questions which have come to them from the decision of others. Of course there may be exceptions. There may be exceptions where the person who is the exception is unconscious himself of the bias, but they will always be guarded against by his associates.

It seems to me that the fear of the inconvenience that a particular judge may be influenced in his second decision by the fact that he has once decided one particular way, so that a small bias creeps into the final judgment of the tribunal, will be very much overbalanced by the inconvenience of excluding the judge who knows how the question of law was applied to the facts, and who gave the case its original direction, from giving his associates the benefit of his judgment. As I said, if the committee insist on having this, which has nothing to do with the question of quorum, put into the bill where it does not seem to me to belong, I must object to the consideration. I ask the Senator from Arkansas if he will not allow the first part of the bill to pass by itself, and bring this forward in a separate measure?

Mr. GARLAND. I have said all I desire to say about it. I will ask the sense of the Senate on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. HOAR. I should want to discuss that more than five minutes.

Mr. GARLAND. I should dislike after the committee has reported to agree to let it go.

Mr. HOAR. Then I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill goes over, being objected to. The hour of two o'clock has arrived.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 3680) for the relief of John G. Taylor was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The following bill and joint resolution were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Commerce:

A bill (H. R. No. 5908) making an immediate appropriation for the removal of obstructions at Hell Gate, New York; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 186) authorizing the erection of a light on the tower of the Chicago water-works crib, Chicago, Illinois.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 2538) to amend the act entitled "An act regulating the appointment of justices of the peace, commissioners of deeds, and constables within and for the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved June 7, 1878, and also to extend the jurisdiction of justices of the peace in the District of Columbia, and to regulate the proceedings before them.

MISSISSIPPI AND MISSOURI RIVERS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 1572) for the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi and Missouri Rivers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] is entitled to the floor, but at his request the Chair recognizes the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. HAMPTON.]

Mr. HAMPTON. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] for his courtesy in yielding the floor now, and I shall avail myself of it and tax the patience of the Senate for a very short time. Indeed, sir, it was not my purpose to say anything on the bill now before the Senate, but the wide range the discussion on it has taken, and the intricate questions brought out by that discussion, impel me to define the position I occupy and to give very briefly the reasons which will govern my action.

It has been my fortune to have spent a large portion of my life in that section of Mississippi known as the Yazoo Delta. For many years past all my means have been invested in planting operations on the Mississippi River, and I have studied its characteristics with constant care and anxious solicitude. Many of the warmest friendships of my life were born and nurtured among the generous people of that grand country. Every motive, then, of interest and affection prompts me to extend to them in this their hour of distress and desolation not only my profoundest sympathy but my most active aid. The extent of that aid on my part shall be measured only by what I regard as the limitations of the Constitution; and while nothing could induce me to violate or even to stretch any of its provisions, I hope that ample authority may be found in that instrument to authorize us to extend a generous aid to these suffering people.

The Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] has presented cogently, as he always does, his views as to the constitutional power of Congress over this subject, and I admit the force of what he said. But waiving for the present all consideration of the constitutional questions involved, I venture to express the hope that the amendments to the bill offered by my friend from Arkansas and by the Senators from Louisiana may be withdrawn. I do this on the ground that the bill as it came from the committee is broad in its scope, liberal in its appropriation, and catholic in its spirit of liberal generosity. It gives to that great country watered by the Mississippi River all that was asked by the river commission, and it leaves to that commission ample discretion to use the funds appropriated in such manner as will best improve the navigation of that river and control its angry waters. The sum appropriated is fully sufficient to meet the present emergency, and it is surely enough to be invested by the General Government in an experiment, for all plans to bring under control the Father of Waters must be at best but an experiment. If in pursuing their investigations to solve the great problem of rendering the navigation of the Mississippi safe this commission, composed of the ablest engineering talents of the country, declares that the erection of levees is an essential part of the system to be adopted, I shall most cordially vote to appropriate any adequate and reasonable amount in order to consummate the plans proposed. It will then be clearly within the jurisdiction of Congress to do this, as it will be an imperative duty; one, too, that there will be, I am sure, no hesitation in discharging.

The whole country is interested in this great national highway of commerce, which bears on its mighty bosom annually a commerce equal to that of our whole foreign commerce; laving by its tributaries more than two-thirds of the States of the Union, stretching its gigantic arms from the Alleghanies to the Rocky Mountains, and binding together, as with links of steel, in its flow from the frozen regions of the North to the tepid waters of the Gulf, a confederacy of great Commonwealths, bound together indissolubly as long as its waters flow in an indestructible union of indestructible States. As it was one of the most serious elements of discord in the late war, there is an eminent propriety that it should now be the great and perpetual bond to bind together in enduring peace the late contending sections. Realizing, therefore, to their fullest extent, all the vast and varied interests connected with and dependent on this river; recognizing the great difficulty of dealing with these complex interests with perfect justice to all, and appreciating fully the magnitude of all the issues involved, I desire that we should be in possession of all possible information before we adopt any permanent policy for the improvement of the Mississippi. As to the best plan to be adopted there are many different and opposing opinions held by men whose experience, skill, and ability justly claim for them very wise consideration at our hands. As to the great engineering problem involved in the reclamation and control of the river, no one can speak with authority except scientific professional engineers; but even these may gather useful hints from laymen, who have had long and large experience in noting the phenomena of the river and in contending with its angry floods. The contribution to this general stock of information which I can offer may be very small, but, as I have had experience of all the great freshets on the Mississippi from that of 1843 to the present, my opinion may not be without interest to some of those who have no personal knowledge of the peculiar formation of the Mississippi Delta and of the effects of a general overflow. It is proper, however, to say that my experience is limited mainly to the east bank of the river, that being the section with which I am most familiar, and I may perhaps be able to give some statistical data touching that part of the country not without interest. All who have studied the geological formation of the Mississippi Delta are aware that most, if not all, of that fertile territory was formerly covered by the Gulf of Mexico, for the mouth of the Mississippi was in the remote past probably where Cairo now stands. As years rolled on the river, bearing constantly its load of soil in partial solution, steadily deposited its sediment, encroaching on the waters of the Gulf, pushing them back and creating for man's use these alluvial lands, more fertile than those watered by the Nile. The process of formation was in accordance with the command of the Almighty, when he said: "Let the waters under the heaven be gathered together unto one place and let the dry land appear; and it was so."

A curious verification of the theory touching the formation of this portion of the country is to be found in some interesting facts established by the investigations of the coast survey. If any one will examine the submarine formation of the Gulf of Mexico he will find that the shoal water follows with close conformity the outlines of the present shore line. This shoal water extends out one hundred miles from the shore, and then the bottom of the Gulf drops suddenly at an extremely steep slope to a depth of 12,000 feet. Why, in the case of Florida, for instance, there is on all sides of it an exact counterpart of the slate under the shallow waters of the Gulf waiting, perhaps, for the Divine command to emerge from the sea. This fact illustrates what was said by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] in his instructive remarks on the peculiar formation of the banks of the Mississippi. The river itself has made all that vast territory which it has during countless ages rescued from the Gulf, and as it was forming these lands by its constant overflows its greatest deposits were made when its current was first checked. Thus it is that the banks of the river are higher than the adjacent lands, and it is a curious fact that all the drainage in that section is from and not to the river. The lands on the river bank being higher than the rest of the country, are of course considered generally as the most valuable, and this fact, together with the additional one of their greater elevation, offers a strong temptation to have the levees put up too near the stream. Many of the most disastrous overflows have thus been caused by the caving in of the banks, and along with them the levees on them.

On of the most difficult problems which the engineers will have to encounter will be to prevent the caving in of the banks, and until they can meet this successfully all efforts to direct and control the current will be futile. If they can solve this problem the rest of their task will be comparatively easy. There are portions of the river where levees must necessarily form a part of the work to deepen the channel, for in some places the banks are low and levees will be required to confine the stream to its proper channel. Perhaps it may be found after full experiments by the commission that a general and permanent system of levees is absolutely essential to render the navigation of the river safe and certain, and in that event I doubt not that the national Government will extend its prompt, generous, and efficient assistance. Such action on the part of Congress would then receive the general approval of the country, and the people in all sections know the value of this great national highway; they know how greatly it contributes to our national wealth; they know that the prolific lands it waters could feed and clothe the world, and they will deal with it as national property. Feeling sure of this, I desire to see the Senate act with caution and full consideration before it commits itself to any definite policy in this matter.

In my opinion the engineering skill which we have at our command can perfect a plan which, while making the navigation of the river safe, will go far toward securing the safety of the great Mississippi Valley. I believe that it will eventually be found that to attain these two desirable objects a combination of the levee and the outlet systems will be necessary, for I think that they can be combined to great advantage. I am aware that the outlet system cannot be used in Mississippi, or indeed on the east bank of the river at all, until Bayou Manchac in Louisiana is reached; but I think that it can be adopted to advantage on the west bank. From Memphis to the mouth of the Yazoo no stream enters the Mississippi River, and all the water that falls in that section and all that escapes from the Mississippi on the east returns to the river by the Yazoo just above Vicksburgh. That portion of the river can be securely leveed, because no streams come into the Mississippi, and because the bluffs below Memphis afford a good starting point for the levees.

The difficulty of protecting the west bank of the river is greater, for there several large streams enter the Mississippi, but even on that side the skill of the engineer could overcome the obstacles which nature has placed in the way. I shall not detain the Senate to discuss the details of any plan to accomplish this object, for doubtless the commission will consider and report the most feasible one, and I only suggest in passing that much of the danger to Louisiana below the Red River could be averted by turning the waters of that stream into the Calcasieu, the Vermillion, and the Atchafalaya Rivers. This would not only relieve the Lower Mississippi of an immense volume of water, but would tend to lower the water level of that river for some distance above the mouth of the Red. But all these questions can be more appropriately discussed when we have before us some well-defined and thoroughly digested plan submitted by the commission in whose hands this whole matter now rests. The able gentlemen composing that committee are competent to deal intelligently with this important subject, and I am content to leave it with them until we obtain all the information they can collate. We can then act understandingly for the best interests not only of the Mississippi Valley, but of the whole country. Congress, with entire unanimity and with a munificence never surpassed, has extended already to the suffering people of the valley the most generous and liberal aid; aid that should be doubly welcome because all sections of our common country gave it cheerfully, not grudgingly. Nor has the executive branch of the Government been less liberal in the views expressed than the legislative, for the President has manifested an earnest sympathy for the sufferers from the flood and shown a sincere desire to assist them.

Such exhibitions of fraternal feelings cannot fail to exercise a strong and wholesome influence in obliterating all bitter sectional animosity, and in this aspect, at least, the present dire calamity in the South may prove indeed a blessing in disguise. Before closing, Mr. President, I desire, if possible, to correct some misapprehensions which have obtained here and elsewhere, and which do unintentional but grave injustice to the people of the Mississippi Delta.

It has been asked why these people, who before the war maintained a good system of levees, cannot do so now? There are several reasons why they cannot. Then the labor of the country was thoroughly organized, trained, and disciplined. Every planter was deeply interested in protecting his own land, and in guarding the levees on its front. Whenever any point was threatened, hundreds of laborers could be promptly sent to protect it, for the whole neighborhood turned out. Now, that systematic co-operative labor is wanting, and it cannot be commanded. The negroes, even when their own homes are threatened by the water, will not work on the levees without full pay, and the planters are too poor to give them wages. Before the war all the open land on the river was under cultivation, but now much of this is abandoned, leaving long stretches of levees unguarded and uncared for. The people have not now the means to keep up these levees, and though they have expended vast sums in the effort to do so, they have failed to accomplish the work. Aid in some shape must be given to them or a large portion of that valley, which contributes so materially to the national wealth, will be abandoned.

There is another error prevailing in many quarters to the effect that the people of the Mississippi Delta have not contributed to any large extent to the erection and maintenance of the levees. I cannot say what Arkansas and Louisiana have done in this direction, but some data in my possession will show what Mississippi has expended. The levee board of that State was organized by act of the Legislature in 1858, and issued $500,000 in bonds bearing 10 per cent. interest, and a tax of ten cents an acre on all the alluvial lands was levied. In three years this tax yielded $720,000, and with this fund the levee system from the Tennessee line to the Yazoo River was inaugurated. At the close of the war the debts of the board amounted to $943,666.58, exclusive of interest. In 1867 another board was organized to liquidate the outstanding indebtedness and authorized to fund the principal in bonds bearing 5 per cent. interest. This entire debt, amounting, principal and interest, to $1,400,000, has been paid off with the exception of $120,000, and this balance will be paid during the ensuing year. It will thus be seen that the people of the Yazoo Delta expended on the levees from 1858 to 1867 the sum of $2,120,000 in payment of debts accruing up to the last-named year. Since the war the board have issued bonds bearing 10 percent. interest to the amount of $1,992,937. To liquidate this debt a tax of one cent per pound on all cotton grown in the delta was levied in addition to the tax on the land.

This tax has realized in the three lower river counties, Bolivar, Washington, and Issaquena, since 1865, about $3,500,000, and all the indebtedness of the board up to last January, except about $17,000 has been paid. In 1871 the three upper riparian counties, Coahoma, Tunica, and De Soto, were organized into a levee district and authorized to issue $1,000,000 of bonds. It will be seen from these figures that $5,900,000 have been paid by the people of the Mississippi Delta since the war to keep up their levees. In the face of these facts it is hardly just or fair to assert that they have not done their part manfully to protect their country. I think that they put their shoulders to the wheel before they called for help, and I think that their brave efforts and their suffering entitle them to receive it. There are two other facts in this connection which give them an equitable if not a legal claim upon the assistance of the national Government. During the war five of the largest and most expensive levees were cut by the Union forces, and after the war a very heavy tax of questionable constitutionality was levied for some years on all of their cotton. The Government can therefore afford to be generous; it surely will be just. But under no circumstances would I be willing to see it, while endeavoring to deal generously and justly with the people of the inundated districts, unjust in any degree to the other sections of the country. It has been a source of sincere pleasure to me, Mr. President, to observe that in the discussion of this grave question no partisan feeling has been displayed, no political jealousy has been manifested, no sectional animosity evoked. This is a sign full of hope to the country, for it shows that no party, no sectional lines have here divided the representatives of all the States of the Union. North, South, East, and West join in considering this great national issue on broad, statesmanlike, constitutional grounds, all having in view one patriotic object, that of promoting the welfare and the prosperity of all the people of our great Republic.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, the condition of the great valley of the Mississippi appeals strongly to the Congress of the American people; and the terrible distress that has been witnessed in the last few months in that valley is beyond precedent. I do not think that any such disaster in the way of the destruction of material wealth, and consequent unhappiness to the producers of that wealth, has ever been witnessed in this country, although there have been grievous afflictions. The widespread destruction of property and life in Michigan by the late forest fires, the destruction of so large a portion of the great city of Chicago by fire, and of Boston as well—although such occurrences were appalling in the extent of ruin they wrought, will not bear comparison with the magnitude of losses which the unconfined waters of the Mississippi River and its tributaries have brought to the great tier of States which lie along its banks.

We may call the Mississippi a river, and that is probably its nominal description, but in fact the Mississippi River is the great interior water-front of this continent. The other day I went before a committee of the other House of Congress to discuss appropriations for the improvement of certain rivers and harbors of which locally I had some knowledge. Unlike my friend from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND], I am disposed to be a strict constructionist of the Federal Constitution, and I never have advised and I never have voted that public moneys should be taken for private use. I believe it to be a heresy peculiarly dangerous under our popular form of government and the written Constitution under which we have arranged the powers of government here. I do not believe that it is anything less than the communistic principle developed for local class, and personal ends. Therefore in giving reasons why upon my conscience I could not ask for appropriations for certain rivers and harbors for the sake of the merely local benefit, I gave them simply because it happens as a geographical fact, that the water-front of the country which I desire to see improved was not the local water-front merely of a State or Territory, but it was equally the water-front of States lying far in the interior and distant from it, that in the great problem and course of transportation, it matters not at what point the obstacle shall be discovered, it matters not at what geographical point the chain of continuity is broken in the course of the transportation of the produce of the country to the markets of the world, the loss caused by the obstruction falls everywhere along the line of communication, and cannot be confined to the spot where the obstruction is found or the break takes place. And just as I said that Maryland and New Jersey and Delaware are the Atlantic termini and ocean water-front of Indiana, Illinois, Ohio, Tennessee, Kentucky, and West Virginia, so on the other hand do I feel that the Mississippi River, coursing for nearly 3,000 miles through the territory of the Union becomes, and is in fact, a great interior water-front of the entire country, as much entitled to the consideration of those who administer the powers of this Federal Government as though that front were on the Atlantic or Pacific Oceans, instead of being in the interior of the country; and I believe as legitimately, justly, and properly, Congress may expend money from the public Treasury for the purpose of preserving and improving the navigation of that river, as it can of any other water-front of the United States. You may with equal constitutional justification spend the money of the Treasury upon the Mississippi River, as you may upon the rocky channels of Hell Gate, or any other portion of that great commercial water link, Long Island Sound.

It is not just or possible, therefore, to consider that great river, with all its affluents, with all the vast and varied interests that line its banks and which are affected by it, as a local question, or as one confined to mere local interests or results. Ten States of the Union are actually washed by its waters, and four others, equal in extent and importance, are intersected by its chief affluents. The influences and uses of the Mississippi for transportation extend infinitely beyond the great group of States which are either immediately adjacent or almost directly connected with the waters of the river itself.

Thirty-one years ago the Supreme Court of the United States, speaking through the voice of the illustrious and learned Taney, gave such an interpretation to the Constitution as extended the admiralty jurisdiction of the Federal Government over the great chain of lakes and rivers where the tide neither ebbs nor flows. Said Judge Taney, in the case of the Genesee Chief, in considering the English definition of admiralty jurisdiction, confining it to waters within the ebb and flow of the tide, and giving historical and geographical reasons why that was the law in England and was so imported into this country at the time of adoption of the Constitution, he nevertheless by perspicuous reasoning showed that where the reason ceased the law ceased, and that from the very nature of things, and from the relations of the several States of the Union, and the proper government and furtherance of the objects of the Union, a wider, broader, and more comprehensive interpretation had to be given to the powers of the General Government under the Constitution. After referring to the rule that admiralty must have tide-water for its basis and limitation of jurisdiction under the English law, he said:

> The attention of the court was, however, drawn to this subject in the case of Waring vs. Clark, 5 Howard, 441, which was decided in 1848. The collision took place on the Mississippi River, near the Bayou Goulah, and there was much doubt whether the tide flowed so high. There was a good deal of conflicting evidence. But the majority of the court thought there was sufficient proof of tide there, and consequently it was not necessary to consider whether the admiralty power extended higher.
> But that case showed the unreasonableness of giving a construction to the Constitution which would measure the jurisdiction of the admiralty by the tide. For if such be the construction, then a line drawn across the river Mississippi would limit the jurisdiction, although there were ports of entry above it, and the water as deep and navigable, and the commerce as rich, and exposed to the same hazards and incidents as the commerce below. The distinction would be purely artificial and arbitrary as well as unjust, and would make the Constitution of the United States subject one part of a public river to the jurisdiction of a court of the United States, and deny it to another part equally public and but a few yards distant.
> It is evident that a definition that would at this day limit public rivers in this country to tide-water rivers is utterly inadmissible. We have thousands of miles of public navigable water, including lakes and rivers, in which there is no tide. And certainly there can be no reason for admiralty power over a public tide-water, which does not apply with equal force to any other public water used for commercial purposes and foreign trade. The lakes and the waters connecting them are undoubtedly public waters; and we think are within the grant of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction in the Constitution of the United States. (The Propeller Genesee Chief vs. Fitzhugh, 12 Howard's Reports, 456, 457.)

I have read this because that decision was one of the great landmarks of judicial interpretation in the history of our Government, which recognized the condition of things as they are, and which exhibited the capacity of the principles that underlie the frame-work of the Constitution to accommodate themselves to the growing recognition of great public necessities and essential public facts.

It was a most important and profound adjudication of the equities of the Union, expanded so as to include every member within its beneficient powers, regardless of geographical position.

I read further from this decision:

> The Union is formed upon the basis of equal rights among all the States. Courts of admiralty have been found necessary in all commercial countries not only for the safety and convenience of commerce and the speedy decision of controversies, where delay would be ruin, but also to administer the laws of nations in a season of war, and to determine the validity of captures and questions of prize or no prize in a judicial proceeding. And it would be contrary to the first principals on which the Union was formed to confine these rights to the States bordering on the Atlantic, and to the tide-water rivers connected with it, and to deny them to the citizens who border on the lakes and the great navigable streams which flow through the Western States. Certainly such was not the intention of the framers of the Constitution; and if such be the construction finally given to it by this court it must necessarily produce great public inconvenience, and at the same time fail to accomplish one of the great objects of the framers of the Constitution; that is, perfect equality in the rights and the privileges of the citizens of the different States, not only in the laws of the General Government, but in the mode of administering them. That equality does not exist if the commerce on the lakes and on the navigable waters of the West are denied the benefits of the same courts and the same protection which the Constitution secures to the States bordering on the Atlantic.

The recommendation of the judicial department has been followed by the Legislature. We have consequently had no question asked as to whether the commerce of the country and the navigation which conducted that commerce were upon tide-water or beyond the reach of the tides. The most conspicuous illustration of this is to be found upon this great river itself. I refer to the jetties erected at the mouth of the Mississippi, the harbor there formed, and the safe and easy access given to the great port of New Orleans under the engineering skill of Captain Eads. There was a clear and most justifiable assumption of control over the channels at and near the mouth of that river by Congress, in making the wise appropriations for the purpose of producing the marvelously beneficial results which have followed.

I do not believe that the results of those jetties, and of the direct commerce with the world which they have already given, and are yet to give, to all that great group of States that lie so distant from the sea, are as yet fully appreciated. Changes in the routes of commerce have frequently occurred in history. At first they are not marked in their results; gradually their influence upon trade and commerce becomes recognized, and how important and essential they are. I believe that the capacity of the river Mississippi, as a factor in the great question and struggle for quick transportation of cereal supplies, has scarcely yet become appreciated by the people of the United States, or by the many millions that lie beyond the limits of this country, and who are affected by the capacity of that river to afford a cheap food supply to the world.

Capital is discovering what an opening for its employment these jetties have created, and the statistics of the increasing grain-trade from Saint Louis are most suggestive of a wonderful future.

The commerce of New Orleans has felt the quickening effect upon every branch of trade, and every industry connected with it.

As to the results of a system of extended and beneficent commerce, of exchanges, of providing foreign markets for the industries and productions of the people of the great Northwest and of all those whose territory is contiguous to the Mississippi River, I believe the picture has not been nor can be now fully drawn. I look back with satisfaction to the part that I have taken, in assisting by my vote and voice, in the proper development of plans to insure the full use of the marvelous capacities of the river Mississippi to aid the commerce, the prosperity, the welfare of the whole country.

The expenditures on the jetties at the mouth of the Mississippi have resulted in great and triumphant success up to this time. It is true that we hear the whispers of adverse criticism—and a vague share in the disasters of the late inundations and overflows is sought to be attributed to them. But condemnation and criticism must in simple justice be suspended, because in dealing with such a power as this mighty current, there must necessarily always be something that is necessarily experimental, in any work even with the aid of the greatest human ingenuity and highest intelligence to devise a plan, and with honesty, ability and care in executing it. I hold that all that may be done by members of Congress in either House is, that they shall carefully scrutinize the amount of appropriations and see that they are just in proportion to the objects in view, and secure, so far as they may, that the moneys so appropriated are honestly expended. I do not think it is within the power of man to guarantee with certainty the success of any of these experiments. The difficulty attending this or any other appropriation for the Mississippi is, that such measures always will be in a great degree tentative. You cannot guarantee their permanent results in advance; you cannot rely upon what the actual result of your expenditures will be. The mysterious and mighty power of that river may sweep away the most carefully-devised and strongest works that man's hand can erect, and may set at naught and laugh to scorn all efforts to confine or control it.

I have myself been a personal witness to the marvelous and uncontrollable power of that stream, and the unexpected course that it will take despite all human experience or expectation. I remember very well in the summer of 1876, being on Congressional duty at Jackson, Mississippi, I went across to spend the day at Vicksburgh to see a cut-off and channel which the river had just established for itself, and which threatened then, and I fear threatens now, disastrous consequences to the city of Vicksburgh. It is well known to the Senate that during the war the best engineering skill of the United States Army, under the command of General Grant, sought to cut a canal across the neck of land below Vicksburgh for the purpose of giving safe passage to vessels and avoiding the batteries which lined the bluffs above the city. No expense was spared; no zeal or skill was wanting. Every reasonable hypothesis would have led one to believe that this canal, opened at the point selected by the best engineers of the Army, would have received instantly the flood and impetus of the main body of water of the river, which would have been prompt to flow through it by a shorter and more direct passage to join the water below. Yet "man proposes and God disposes." The canal was cut at the precise point and angle that was expected to be efficient, and it was labor in vain. The course was open for the water, but the water strangely and stubbornly refused to follow it; and yet some ten or twelve years subsequently to that period all at once, of its own motion, uninstructed by engineers, unexpected and undesired by any one there, the river quietly, and with an irresistible and majestic force, cut its own way directly across this neck of land some distance above the canal that Grant's engineering skill had planned. Within less than a week from the time it cut its way across that neck of land, I passed through the new channel so made, upon a tug-boat, and was informed by those in charge that the channel was at that time one hundred feet in depth, and where that channel then was a cotton plantation had always stood in the memory of man until within a fortnight of its destruction.

I am mentioning but a single fact. Those whose homes lie along the banks of that river could repeat to you its wonderful phenomena. But all the marvels of its history teach in the long run but one lesson. He who would seek to avail himself of the power of the Mississippi must humbly study the laws of its currents, and its mysterious and apparently unaccountable movements and make his attempts at hydraulic engineering and improvements subordinate to the currents, floods, and vast powers of the river itself. If this postulate be true, how dangerous will it be to embark suddenly upon any wholesale system that is not at every step carefully examined, tested, and reported on by those, who from their special skill can intelligently watch it, and inform us of the results of their experiments?

I have here in my hand the report made last year by an accomplished and able commission, supplemented by a minority report of Captain Eads, who, although a member, was absent at the time of the close of their deliberations, which recommends a large and important expenditure to protect the navigation of the river and keep its waters within their proper course. I have read these reports; and I have read other reports. I find conflict of judgment between the experts which I cannot reconcile; men of experience and intelligence differ toto cœlo from each other. We are told that certain plans which conscientious and intelligent men recommend will be worse than useless; that they will only foster and extend the very difficulties which this expenditure of money is meant to meet. In this case what can we do? What is the measure of duty of a conscientious representative in this difficulty?

As I said before, all of these expenditures must be tentative; they must be and are necessarily experimental; but if we do not make the experiment, we will never be able to test the truth and usefulness of the plans of either one side or the other. So, I say, that, justified as I believe myself to have been in the past, in voting the large amount of moneys for the mouth of the Mississippi and to create those jetties, I feel myself justified in following the recommendations of the commission, composed in part of the very intellect and mind that devised so successfully the prior expenditure, and will give my vote in aid of the expenditure to the amount recommended by the bill and the commission, I think, of $5,300,000, which at least shall afford the opportunity of testing the correctness of the plans and views carefully prepared and intelligently reported of the commission of experts to whom the consideration of this subject has been properly intrusted.

They may be in error; the expenditure may prove futile, but this is part of the incompleteness of any human endeavor to deal honestly with a great and difficult problem. In view of the immense public interests that stand waiting our decision, I feel that we have no right to ask that Congress shall still pause and pause forever without making an honest endeavor to commence the attempt to repair and improve the navigation of this river, which is so essential to the safety of so large a share of the country's commerce.

Now, one word in regard to the results. I said as a principle I do not believe that you can justifiably apply public property for private use. It is that doctrine and that belief which prevent me from being a protectionist, so called, upon the subject of the tariff. But, sir, all public expenditures honestly and properly made, necessarily and justly result in private as well as public benefit. If an "incidental protection" shall come to the planters along the bank of that great river, from the works raised by the Government to confine its floods and currents and make it navigable, then I shall only be the more glad to vote for it. It is so much the better for them. It is not because it assists these men, so unfortunate in the locality of their homes, that we ought to withhold our proper aid to a great Governmental work. On the contrary, I protest that whenever the two things can be accomplished and the powers of this Government can be exerted and its property expended in furtherance of a great public object, the more of private benefits that follow in its train the better.

I have said thus much, because I feel justified in going to the extent recommended by the board of experts and the committee of this Senate, who I believe have ably and conscientiously performed their duty and made to us a report, not absolutely certain and conclusive in its findings, for it was impossible from the very nature of the subject that it could be so, but nevertheless sufficiently so to justify them upon their character as responsible men in saying, as they have to the Congress of the United States, "We believe that the navigation of that river and the enormous commerce which floats upon it can be permanently and importantly benefited by the expenditure of the sum of money which we have decided to recommend should be appropriated."

There have been a great many propositions stated as the proper constitutional grounds upon which the money can be expended. My friend from Missouri who sits in front of me [Mr. VEST] made one from which I wholly dissent, and I scarcely believe that he made it with absolute approval in his own mind, when he said that the river belonging to and being under the lawful control of the Government of the United States, it was their business and duty to keep their property from invading that of the private citizens. If that be so, then the Government would be as liable, should a drought befall us and prevent navigation from want of water, as it can be from a flood which destroys property by its inundations. The argument cannot stand for a moment, in my judgment; it is not the basis of the responsibility of the Government. But this is the fair and reasonable proposition: the Mississippi River, the great "Father of Waters," is part of the public navigable domain of the United States, and it is the duty of the Congress to deal with it in a fair and just sense of its proportionate value and interest to the whole of this broad Union, and the property it contains.

I am not disposed to ask the latitude or longitude of the locality where the expenditure is to be made. All have an equal right to ask this care of the Government, and wherever you shall make a judicious appropriation in the line of care of a navigable river, or of a harbor, there you have sown the seed of advantage to the entire country, for in the great chain of transportation, as I said in opening, it matters not at what point the obstruction occurs, it is there that the hand of the Government should be employed in removing it.

I hope sincerely that by the expenditure of this important sum, recommended by this board of experienced men of especial fitness and intelligence, enough may be discovered to make it clear to us, us, or make it clear to those who shall succeed us in this place of public duty, that a scheme of improvement with assured and beneficial results may safely be embarked upon, and that the great Mississippi River may receive at the hands of Congress its just proportion of the public money to be spent for public benefit.

For that reason, I shall give my vote in favor of the sum reported and recommended by the commission, and shall not at present go beyond it. The work is experimental, from its very nature it must be in a great degree at least experimental; but we are justified, nay, I would say further in my opinion, we are obliged to follow the unchallenged report and judgment of this commission in making what I consider the large and liberal appropriation which they recommend, and which I hope may be productive of benefit to the great object in view.

Mr. PENDLETON. Mr. President, the magnitude and importance of the Mississippi River, the extent of territory which its waters wash, the greatness of the commerce which it serves, the value of the productions of agricultural labor and mechanical skill which float upon its surface, lie at the very basis of this discussion. They have been described so well, so fully by every Senator who has taken part in the discussion that I do not propose to add a word upon that subject. Eloquence and rhetoric, and facts which seem incredible, and figures which are bewildering, have all been called into requisition, and yet the description does not equal the reality.

When I recall what the Mississippi River was two hundred years ago, when La Salle with his three canoes traversed its length, when its majestic waters rolled, in the silence of the primeval forest, from the lake to the Gulf; when I recall what it was a hundred years ago, when almost impenetrable forests stretching from the Illinois to the borders of the Gulf, unbroken except by the tread of the savage, separated it by five hundred miles and more from the westernmost border of the feeble colonies; when I recall what it was sixty years ago, when the removal of the Cherokees just west of the lands which its waters drain was supposed to place them at a distance such that separation would perform the functions of non-intercourse laws, and they would be secure from the aggressions of the active and energetic civilization of our race; when I see how these Indians are pressed not only by our people but by our railroads; when I see this river draining States which have become empires, and bearing on its bosom the products of farms which have grown up out of these wildernesses; when I look at that drop and this ocean, at that grain of sand and this mighty seashore, it seems as if the dream of possibility had been surpassed. If we look forward into the future, even the immediate future, within the life-time as I hope of most of these Senators who sit beside me, fancy refuses to compete with fact and—

> Imagination's utmost stretch
> In wonder dies away.

Mr. President, I heard a remark from this side of the Chamber in response to a taunt from the other side which seemed to imply a criticism upon the doctrine of strict construction of the Constitution. I regretted to hear it. I am a strict constructionist, I belong to that school; I belong to its straightest sect; and the more reflection I have been able to give to the subject, the more faithful have I become in my adherence to its tenets. The Constitution of the United States has classified the powers of Government and society. It speaks of delegated, prohibited, reserved powers. The delegated powers are those which the Federal Government possesses. It has no other. It has no inherent power; it has no original power. It has only that portion of the power originally belonging to the States which is given to it by the States under the Constitution. The prohibited powers are those which the States themselves have consented not to exercise. The reserved powers form that great residuum of power belonging to every governmental and social organism, belonging to every independent, self-existing, self-controlling, self-maintaining sovereignty, which it has refused either to delegate to the Federal Government or to decline to exercise itself. Two clauses in the Constitution announce its whole philosophy.

> This Constitution and the laws of the United States made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land.

This is the provision which gives its supremacy to the Government of the United States within the sphere of its action and the scope of its powers. Alongside of it, supplementing it, completing it, protecting it, is that other provision equally important, even more important still, that—

> The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.

These provisions constitute the rule by which I interpret the Constitution of the United States. "They are the lamp to my feet and the light to my path." When Massachusetts, devoted to home rule, devoted to that democracy which finds its worthy expression in the powers of her town-meeting and the form of government based upon it, ratified the Constitution of the United States, at the same moment in the same instrument, Massachusetts declared that "in order to remove the fears and quiet the apprehensions of many of the good people of this commonwealth and more effectually to provide against undue administration of the Federal government," there should be an amendment to the Constitution declaring that all powers not delegated by the Constitution are reserved.

Mr. President, I have said that these two provisions contain the whole philosophy of the Constitution, the philosophy of our Government, the philosophy of Federal union, the philosophy of confederated equal republics. They contain the philosophy of a Republic of republics. They express the idea of union as against unity. Sir, they do more; they constitute the hope of the continuance of this Government and form the best safeguard of our liberty. Union is liberty and strength; Unity is empire, despotism, and finally disintegration.

The Constitution of the United States declares that—

The Congress shall have power * * * to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States and with the Indian tribes * * * to establish post offices and post-roads * * * to organize and maintain armies * * * to provide for the common defense and the general welfare.

It is extremely doubtful, if this were a new question, whether those who made the Constitution and put in operation the Government could have found an interpretation of the Constitution by which they were willing to stand, which would have given the authority for the passage of this bill. But it is too late to enter into that discussion now. They found under the provision to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the States full authority to do—and they did—all which in their judgment was necessary for that regulation. They anchored buoys; they built light-houses; they built break-waters; they built piers; they improved harbors where there were harbors, and made harbors where there were none; they found authority and did all which was necessary to regulate commerce between foreign nations or in the coastwise trade within the limits of the tide-water district of the United States. Although that authority may have been questioned here and there, yet in spite of all opposition it was maintained for fifty years, though limited to the tide-water.

The decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of The Genesee Chief extended the maritime and admiralty jurisdiction of the United States to all the lakes and navigable rivers which washed the shores and carried the commerce of the several States. Since that time, against whatever opposition, it has been maintained successfully, both by the decisions of the courts and the enactments of the legislative authority, that Congress has the same power of regulating commerce upon the great rivers and upon the great lakes as it theretofore had in regulating commerce on the tide-water. In the face of the uniform practice of fifty years before that decision, in the face of the uniform practice of regulating the commerce upon the lakes and the rivers for forty years since that decision was made, in the face of the contributions under one power or another, to the Pacific railroads and to other roads not so extensive as they, it is too late to question that Congress has now, in relation to the commerce of the rivers and lakes, the same power that it ever exercised in reference to the foreign or the coastwise commerce of the country. Even before the decision in The Genesee Chief, Mr. Calhoun, in view of the improvements in the mode of transportation, of travel, and of navigation, declared that—

The invention of Fulton has in reality for all practical purposes converted the Mississippi with all its tributaries into an inland sea. Regarding it as such, I am prepared to place it on the same footing with the Gulf and Atlantic coasts, the Chesapeake and Delaware Bays and the lakes, in reference to the superintendence of the General Government over its navigation.

Considering this great subject two years ago in this catholic spirit, in 1879, the Congress of the United States organized this commission of which we have heard so much. Congress defined the work assigned it and declared that—

SEC. 4. It shall be the duty of said commission to take into consideration and mature such plan or plans and estimates as will correct, permanently locate, and deepen the channel and protect the banks of the Mississippi River; improve and give safety and ease to the navigation thereof; prevent destructive floods; promote and facilitate commerce, trade, and the postal service; and, when so prepared and matured, to submit to the Secretary of War a full and detailed report of their proceedings and actions, and of such plans, with the estimates of the cost thereof, for the purposes aforesaid, to be by him transmitted to Congress.

I am prepared to maintain that Congress has the power to do every one of the specific and particular things for which the commission were directed in this section to prepare plans and make estimates. It has been said during the course of this discussion that the third provision, "to report specifically upon the practicability, feasibility, and probable cost of the plan known as the jetty system, the levee system, and the outlet system," committed Congress in some way or other upon either the advisability or the constitutional power to undertake some of those works. I feel no such embarrassment, no such committal. I feel not in the least degree committed to go further by the mere demand for information. If I had known at the time that it was utterly beyond the power of Congress to inaugurate those improvements, I would nevertheless be willing in a case like this, involving so much of material interest, to make the investigation. I feel no committal, for if I have taken a wrong step I can easily retrace it. I say that Congress has the power to do each and every one of the things enumerated in this instruction to the commission. Let me read it again:

To take into consideration and mature a plan which will correct, permanently locate, and deepen the channel and protect the banks of the Mississippi River and prevent destructive floods—in order to improve and give safety and ease to the navigation thereof, and to promote and facilitate commerce, trade, and the postal service.

Mr. President, I do believe that Congress has the right, the constitutional power, to do each and all of these things. I do not believe that it has the power "to fence the farm of a farmer," as long ago was said in discussing this very question. I do not believe it has the power to use the public revenue for the purpose of reclaiming the lands of individual owners who are citizens of, and whose lands lie within the limits of, a State. I do not believe that it has power to enter upon a system of public improvements whose only end and aim are to prevent damage in the future or repair the injuries which in the past, have arisen from natural causes over which it has no control.

This commission has made its report. The committee, following in the line of the report and in the line of the action of Congress, has reported this bill appropriating $6,000,000 for the improvement of the Mississippi River under the direction of that commission. It permits the amount appropriated to be expended under the direction of the commission for executing every work of every kind which will materially aid in the improvement of the Mississippi River. It provides that not one dollar shall be expended on any work which does not contribute to that end. I approve that proviso. I would be willing to vote it in a different form. I would be willing to take the amendment offered by the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. JONAS.] I would be willing to adopt the suggestion made by the other Senator from Louisiana [Mr. KELLOGG,] who sits opposite me. I would be willing to amend it in any way which would make it more clear that Congress means two things—first, that the money shall be appropriated under the judgment of the commission, and according to its discretion, for the repair or the rebuilding or the building anew of levees wherever they are essential to the improvement of the river; and second, that not a dollar shall be expended when the main purpose of repairing or rebuilding the levees is to reclaim the lands of private individuals whose property lies within a State, however numerous or however meritorious those individuals may be.

Mr. President, what will be the action of the commission under this bill? I have read its report; I have examined it with much care; I have examined the various papers whether reports or supplemental reports, or statements which have been presented to the Senate.

Without troubling the Senate by reading the extracts which have been repeatedly read, I have come to the conclusion that the members of the commission do believe that in places, at times, under conditions, the repairing and the construction of levees is an important aid in the improvement of the navigation. They believe perhaps that the levees are never the sole, essential, only means of improving or perfecting the navigation or facilitating the commercial interchanges along the river; but they are sometimes important, necessary, and always appropriate and conducive. I am willing to commit that question to them. It is a matter of scientific examination and experience; it is a question that I cannot for myself solve. I am willing to leave it to this commission. I am willing to appropriate this money so that this commission may use it within their discretion for this particular purpose. It gratifies me to believe that when this money is used for the purpose of improving the navigation of the river, when it is used for the purpose of aiding the commerce that floats upon its bosom, and bears beneficent results to all the States of the Union, that it will also restore to some extent the prosperity of those people whom the floods have almost ruined, and repair the injuries from which they now suffer. It gratifies me; it enables me to vote very heartily for this bill, that the judgment and wisdom and experience of these men who have made this the subject of thought and study, will be able to agree upon plans which while they subserve the main purpose of regulating the commerce and improving the navigation of the river will also accomplish this incidental beneficence.

It is not necessary that I should go further to state the position that I hold upon this bill; but I should like to make a suggestion or two to gentlemen to whom the idea of repairing or building levees seems to conjure up a horrid spectre of unconstitutional action and enormous expenditure. I have heard no man say upon the floor, I believe no man will say, that the power of Congress to regulate commerce upon the lakes and upon these great rivers, the Mississippi and the Missouri, is not the same, equal in extent, mutatis mutandis, with the power to regulate commerce upon the high seas. What has been done by Congress in the regulation of commerce upon the lakes? It has improved the means and facilities of transit; it has improved the Saint Clair Flats; it has built enormous works at Sault Ste. Marie. It has done more. It has gone along the shores of the State of Ohio; it has built breakwaters and dredged behind the breakwaters the shallow lake to a proper depth, so that there should be harbors of refuge for vessels caught in a storm on their way from Buffalo to Chicago. It has done more. It has built piers; it has established light-houses; it has improved creeks running into the lake; it has erected enormous works; it has built costly harbors in order that vessels plying along the lakes might find a secure place in which to unload and to load the freights which the cities themselves and the rich country behind them bring to their docks; it has made ports where there were none; it has improved unsafe ports, and no complaint has been made. It has in many places made out of the bare, shallow shore of a lake, where there was no harbor, where there was no refuge, a complete, handsome, commodious harbor for business, as well as a place of safety for vessels seeking refuge from the elements.

Nobody has objected, nobody has found fault with it. The power of Congress has never been questioned. I want to ask, if it shall become necessary to build a harbor of refuge upon the Mississippi River, so that vessels shall not be cast away by the enormous floods and overflows of that stream, has not Congress as much right to build it, if necessary, there as it has to build it upon the lakes? If it shall become necessary to build harbors and ports in order to accommodate the commerce and the traffic which floats upon that great river, more and manifold more than that which floats upon the lakes, has not Congress authority to build these ports and furnish the convenient facilities for the easy interchange of the commodities which, as I understand it, makes commerce?

I am not saying that here or there or in any particular place it may be as necessary upon the river to make these works of improvement as it is upon the lake, but if the exigency arises and the importance is as great, I want to know whether the power of Congress is not adequate to make the improvements upon the river that it has already without question made upon these great inland seas? What virtue is there in the waters of the lake and the soil of the noble State, which I in part represent, which makes that which is unconstitutional in Mississippi and Louisiana constitutional upon our borders? What quality of vice is there in these States of Mississippi and Missouri and Louisiana, represented so ably by gentlemen who sit around me, which makes that for their benefit unconstitutional, which is constitutional when applied to Indiana and Michigan and Ohio?

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator from Ohio allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. PENDLETON. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON. I think the distinguished Senator from Ohio is combating a proposition which has not been assumed by anybody in this Chamber. I freely concede the power of the Government in the protection of commerce and in the facilitation of commerce to be quite as wide on the Mississippi River as on the lakes or on the sea-coast; and I do not think that any one has advanced any other conclusion than that.

Mr. PENDLETON. Very well, Mr. President——

Mr. HARRISON. But if the Senator will permit me further——

Mr. PENDLETON. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON. In connection with these landings, these piers, does the Senator think that the construction of a continuous landing on both sides of the river from Cairo to New Orleans could be justified under the plea of building landing places?

Mr. PENDLETON. That is simply a question as to whether the work shall be greater or less. That is simply a method of trying constitutional power by the magnitude of the work required and its cost. If Congress has the power to build piers and make harbors upon the lakes when they may be necessary to commerce, I ask has it not the power, wherever it is necessary for the same purposes, to build them on the river and to use in building those piers the alluvial soil which is at hand rather than the rubble work and the masonry which it may be obliged to use in other parts of the country. If it shall become necessary in the course of time to build harbors of refuge upon the Mississippi, then the Senator [Mr. HARRISON] admits that there is constitutional power to do it. If it becomes necessary in order to the transactions of the commerce which floats upon the bosom of that river to make docks and piers, places of landing, that boats may discharge their cargoes and take on new cargoes, then the Senator [Mr. HARRISON] admits that there is the power in Congress to do it. It is not for me, it is not for him, to limit the constitutional power to build a pier because it must be ten miles instead of ten yards.

I am not fond of anticipating questions. I am not fond beforehand of stating the limits of constitutional power in the Federal Government, but I say to gentlemen that the time will come, and perhaps soon, when this question will be differently stated. It will not be stated as a scheme, for the reclamation of lands, as the Senator from Indiana has stated it, but it will be, as a plan, for the enlargement of the banks of the river for the purpose of protecting the channel of the river, narrowing its boundaries, deepening its waters, providing for the commerce that floats upon its bosom. These gentlemen had better reflect upon the suggestions which I have made and which I have not intended to answer, for the time will come when they will be pertinent to the discussion which will be had and will demand an answer, even if their consideration is not necessary for the determination of the present bill.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President——

Mr. VEST. Will the Senator from Florida yield to me to make a single remark?

Mr. CALL. Certainly.

Mr. VEST. The Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD,] not now in his seat, I am sorry to say, alluding to a position which I assumed the other day, said that he had no idea that the Senator from Missouri could be sincere or in earnest in that position, or that it had the approval of his judgment, to use his own language, and that the argument could not bear examination for an instant.

Now, Mr. President, I simply wish to say that when I took the position that the Government of the United States, under the Constitution, when it assumed the ownership and property of the Mississippi River, assumed the obligation of all ownership and all property to improve and regulate that river, I asserted what is the deliberate result of long-continued investigation and judgment upon that question; and I state now, in order that it may go upon the record and to the country, that I am prepared to declare, and I believe, to prove beyond any sort of question, that when the Congress of the United States assumes to deepen the channel and to put more water, to use the language of the Senator from Delaware, into the Mississippi River, it logically assumes the duty and the position that it must protect from the results of overflow the country through which the Mississippi River runs.

The gentleman from Delaware congratulates himself that he voted for the jetty system. What was the jetty system, and what is it to-day? It is simply deepening the channel by putting more water in it at the mouth of the Mississippi River. Yet the Senator seeks to belittle my argument to a reductio ad absurdum by stating that if I undertake to say that Congress must protect that country against overflow at the same time I say that it must protect it against drought and put more water in the river.

Now, Mr. President, I assert that if you undertake to deepen the channel, to improve the river, to put more water in a particular place in it for the purpose of navigation, the very same argument compels you to the further position, that river being the property of the United States, the right to improve that very property imposes the obligation of its being so regulated and so controlled by the owner as to conduce to the welfare of the whole country instead of the destruction of a part; and when this proposition is answered, then I will concede to the Senator from Delaware the right to speak facetiously of the position I have assumed.

Mr. HOAR. May I ask the honorable Senator from Missouri if he states gravely to the Senate as a proposition of law that ownership of a natural stream imposes upon the owner the duty of protecting anybody else against the natural action of that stream?

Mr. VEST. No; I never dreamed of such a thing; but as I stated the other day, and undertook then to elaborate, the relations between individuals are not the relations between the Government of the United States and its citizens. As I said then, alluding to the Senator from Arkansas, who sat immediately next to me, the relation of the Government of the United States to the people of the lower valley of the Mississippi, or to any portion of the people of the country, is not that between the Senator from Arkansas and the Senator from Massachusetts and myself or between any two individuals, because the Senator from Massachusetts has his separate and distinct individual rights and I have mine, and to a certain extent they are antagonistic; but I go upon the broad, national, catholic ground constitutionally, and that the Constitution of the United States asserts all through that the Government is for the people, to protect the people, belongs to the people, that there can be in the nature of things no antagonism between the Government and the people who own it. That is my position. Therefore this narrow, contracted view, with all respect to the Senator from Massachusetts, that the law applies as between the Government and the people which would apply between individual owners, does not obtain in this case; and if the Constitution in its terms permits the Government to make these improvements, to regulate which the Supreme Court says is to improve, then I say irresistibly the Constitution imposes under the clause to provide for the general welfare the duty to see that its own property does not destroy the property of the people.

Mr. HOAR. Then I suppose the Senator can carry that doctrine to its logical conclusion, and hold that where the Government owns the mountains in any Territory it must protect the people who dwell at the foot from avalanches.

Mr. VEST. I do not understand the Senator.

Mr. HOAR. I suppose the Senator would carry that doctrine to the logical conclusion that where the Government owns the mountains in any Territory it must, of course, protect the people who dwell at the foot of the mountains from avalanches.

Mr. CALL. I am entitled to the floor.

Mr. VEST. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. HOAR. I understand the Senator's proposition is this: he concedes that the ownership of a natural stream in a private person does not impose upon the owner the duty of protecting other persons against the natural action of that stream; that is an act of God.

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. But when the United States becomes the owner of a natural stream, then this being a Government by the people and for the people and of the people, the argument is irresistible that it must protect mankind against the natural action or the action of God as manifested through that stream. Now, I ask the Senator if it is not equally true that when the Government became possessed of the Sierra Nevadas or any other mountains it must protect the persons who dwell at the foot from the action of avalanches?

Mr. VEST. With the greatest pleasure I reply to the Senator from Massachusetts just this: I reiterate deliberately the proposition that it is the duty of the Government of the United States, notwithstanding he uses the term "the act of God," without committing any blasphemy, constitutionally or otherwise, to protect the people of the United States and their property, in so far as it can, from overflow or from avalanche. If twenty-six million acres of soil lay at the foot of the Sierra Nevadas and an avalanche impended, and this Government owned the mountains and could stop it by an act of Congress, I would stop it and believe that Congress had the right to do it. I answer the Senator unquestionably that either from an avalanche or overflow, if the Government owns the property and can do it, it ought to prevent injury to the property of the people.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I propose to examine the question whether or not there is any power in the Constitution and Government of the United States for the protection of one-half the commerce and one-half the people of the United States without reference to and not under the guise of a proposition that it shall be done for the improvement of a navigable river. I maintain that if there is no such power in the Constitution of the United States it is quite time there should be an amendment of that instrument; that if one-half of the commerce and the production of this country, and if the lives and safety of one-half its people may not be protected by an exercise of the powers of government given in the Constitution, it is quite time that there should be an amendment by which the powers of government should be made adequate to some provision for the common defense and the general welfare.

THE VALLEY OF MISSISSIPPI, AND ITS EXTENT.

Mr. President, the Mississippi River, justly named the "Father of Waters," with a vast and mighty current, traverses the whole length of the territory of the United States, while its tributaries gather to its bosom the productions of nineteen States and three Territories, extending from Eastern Tennessee to the commencement of the Pacific slope and the summit of the Rocky Mountains in the west: West Virginia, Alabama, Mississippi, Tennessee, Kentucky, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, Minnesota, Texas, Kansas, Wisconsin, Nebraska, Dakota, Montana, the Indian Territory, Arkansas, Louisiana, are all interested directly either in the great river or its tributary streams. Twenty millions of the people of the United States inhabit, with their prosperous industries, the country which it drains, and in the not distant future one hundred millions will find homes and subsistence from its fertile soil. Like the ocean, restless and uncontrolled, it has hitherto defied the control of man, and no power but that of nature's God has prescribed its bounds and said to it, "Thus far shalt thou come, and no farther."

LIMIT OF APPROPRIATIONS FOR IT.

The appropriation for it finds equal difficulty with the great river in keeping within the channel and limits of the ordinary and established rules of constitutional power. As it came into the system of States and became the subject of constitutional power and jurisdiction in defiance of all previous constructions of the Constitution, so it still demands for itself new and peculiar theories and boundaries of constitutional power. As its vast flood submerges and destroys States and threatens a continent and a nation of sovereign States with ruin, it is content with no power of less dignity or more circumscribed extent than that chief and sovereign power which summons all the energies of the Constitution to provide for the common defense and the general welfare when threatening armies in time of war assail with all the engines of death and destruction the national life. In times long gone by it defied and subverted the theories of the most eminent and learned of the school of constitutional power that acknowledged no powers outside of the specific grants of the Constitution, and compelled them to place it beyond and outside of the rivers, whether great or small, and to designate it as an inland sea. So it seems now again intent upon asserting its right to that title.

For myself, recognizing its demands to be to some extent justly commensurate with its great natural powers for good or evil, I wish to examine whether there is in the bounds of the Constitution and our forms of government an authority adequate to meet and curb its rebellious disposition, its defiance of law and order, its threatened appropriation of regions most favorably endowed to be the happiest theater of human toil and to furnish the most abundant and beneficent reward for labor, or whether it is to accomplish by the forces of nature that peaceable secession for which human power and genius was inadequate.

POWER TO REGULATE COMMERCE.

The power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the States is construed to be the same as the power to create commerce and the same as the power to promote commerce, and not merely as both the language and the object of the power under a strict construction would indicate, the regulation in the sense of prescribing the terms and conditions upon which an already existing commerce might be conducted. The term regulate in the school of construction means to create not only the opportunities and conditions but also the conveniences, agencies, and instruments of commerce; not only those which are moral but also those which are material highways, constructed or improved by art, both natural and artificial, by sea and by land, are within the reach of the elastic grasp of this significant and useful phrase. Commerce, instead of signifying the exchange of commodities of production, in constitutional philology, means the intercommunication of goods, productions, inventions, language, thought, and people, and all the points of contact and relation in which the human race are placed to each other. Within the germane and just application of the very learned and able Senator from Tennessee's health bill, [Mr. HARRIS,] it embraces the intercommunication of contagious diseases, both among animals and men. And in the argument of the Senators from California it embraces either the admission or the exclusion of the Chinese; in short, it means either intercourse or non-intercourse, either commerce or isolation. The "regulation" of commerce between the States and with foreign nations now encounters a new difficulty in being required to embrace within its capacious grasp the rescue of the lands and subsistence of the people of the Mississippi Valley along the ten thousand miles of its banks and those of its tributaries from a greater ruin, a more devastating conquest than plundering armies or murderous implements of war could effect.

NOT CONFINED BY NARROW CONSTRUCTIONS.

I rest my support of the appropriations necessary for the defense and protection of the citizens of the United States, the subjects of Federal power and Federal taxation, and the just and proper beneficiaries of Federal protection, who occupy and are to occupy the banks of this great river and its tributaries from its devouring floods on no such narrow policies. Such limitations of the source of power when applied to this subject are akin only to the superstition which holds that the swollen torrents of the Nile in its annual flood can only be appeased by the sacrifice of human life, by throwing into its angry waves the tender infant and the aged parent.

I do not regard the power to protect the soil or the people of the Republic from any powers or forces which are beyond the capacity of State power as at all dependent upon any other question. I do not consider that it is necessary to cut out the bottom of the river in order to make it lawful to keep its waters within its boundaries, nor to regard its shores as wharves or conveniences of commerce in order that it shall be lawful to build them as restraints against the overflowing tide with its desolating flood.

SHALL CONGRESS PROTECT THE COMMERCE AND PEOPLE OF THE MISSISSIPPI VALLEY.

We have then, Mr. President, the proposition—ten thousand miles of the States and Territories and many millions of the citizens of the States and Territories of the Republic, many thousands of millions of dollars of values, depend absolutely upon an appropriation of the public money, the taxes and labor of the people of all the States to the construction of such works from its sources to the Gulf as will restrain its angry current within its prescribed bounds. Have we the power to apply the public money for this purpose, have we the power to make levies of men and money, and if necessary to levee its banks from its source to its mouth, for the purpose of protecting the country and its production from the angry and devastating floods of the river and its tributaries bearing to the bosom of the Mississippi the floods of two-thirds of the States as an independent ground, and as distinct from its improvement as a great national highway?

This question may properly be regarded first in the light of constitutional power and of constitutional and legislative duty, and secondly, as a measure of expediency, and thirdly, as a measure adapted to harmonize the object of protecting the country from floods with a proper contribution of the people and property to be benefited toward bearing the burdens of this work.

I propose to endeavor to discuss this question and to try it, if within the limits of my ability to do so, by sound propositions of reason and by a consideration of the just powers and objects of our Government.

NO DISTINCTION IN PROTECTION AGAINST FLOODS AND AGAINST WAR.

I have listened in vain to the argument of Senators to discover some ground of distinction in principle between the application of the public powers, the public money, to the protection of the people of the States of the Mississippi Valley against destruction from natural causes from the floods of the great river, and its application to their protection against invasion in foreign or domestic war.

I have listened in vain to discover from them some specific grant of power in the Constitution under which the ordinary or the extraordinary expenditures of the public money are made.

I have heard from one Senator on another occasion that under the power to regulate commerce a railroad may be built; under the power to establish post-offices and post-roads a railroad may also be built.

Surely if the nature of these powers be thus elastic, some place may be found somewhere for the exercise of a power to protect one-half of the commerce and production of the States of the Union from annually recurring destruction.

ANALYSIS OF THE ARGUMENT.

But, Mr. President, let us bring this discussion within the limits of a clearer and more minute analysis. The objections of the Senators from Indiana and Alabama are, first, an absence of power to appropriate public money for the protection of the people of the Mississippi Valley against the floods poured upon them from the waters of the other States; that such an appropriation of the public money would benefit private property by a reclamation of lands, increasing their value and their profits to their owners. The absence of the power to appropriate public money by the national Government is deduced by them from the supposed fact that the immediate object and effect of the appropriation is the reclamation or protection of the lands belonging to the States and to individuals; and this would be to appropriate public money for the improvement of private property for the benefit only of the owners of property, or for their private benefit; and, secondly, in the argument of the Senator from Alabama, that this reclamation of these lands is a subject within the power of the States, and therefore beyond the power of the National Government, and with which it has no power to interfere or touch.

I believe I state the question fairly and their argument in its full and just scope and effect. The proposition is, that the commerce, the production, the soil, the safety of nearly one-half of the States and Territories and of the people of the States and Territories require protection against causes and influences beyond their separate powers, and within the reach only of the combined power of all the States. The objection of the argument is that this protection can only be had by work done within the separate States, and by the reclamation of land in each State, the property of the State and of private individuals, which, when reclaimed, will benefit the owners, and which as property and as within the territorial limits of the State is subject to the jurisdiction and power alone of each separate State.

The objections therefore are: first, an absence of national power; second, an interference with the State power; third, an exercise of power for the benefit of private individuals.

IT CONCERNS THE COMMON DEFENSE AND GENERAL WELFARE.

I propose to examine them, and I affirm that no one of these propositions can stand the test of reason or of fair and just argument. It cannot be denied that the annual or quintennial submersion of the vast area of the Mississippi Valley and the expulsion of its population would affect injuriously the commerce with foreign nations and among the States, both now and hereafter. It will not be contended that it would not diminish the taxes and imposts and duties and revenues of the United States. It will not be disputed that it concerns the general welfare and the common defense of the United States.

If it be pertinent and within the just scope of the power to regulate commerce to improve or create or preserve a water-way or a highway as a channel for it to pass over and through, because only that without this highway there could be no commerce, by what argument shall we demonstrate that any other means equally essential for the preservation of that commerce is not equally pertinent to and within the just scope of the power to regulate commerce? As a fact, is not the protection of the area of the Mississippi Valley and its tributaries from the annual recurrence of devastating floods equally necessary for the preservation of commerce as the preservation of the river as a highway for the transportation of its productions?

Is it not evident that to have commerce, production, or something to transport is as necessary as transportation, and that the means and the fact of production must precede the means and the act of transportation?

If it be within the power of the National Government, in providing for the common defense and the general welfare, to acquire territory, to annex States to the Union, is it not necessarily within the purview of the powers under which the soil was acquired and attached to the Union to preserve it in its essential and necessary characteristics as soil, as territory?

Will the honorable Senators from Indiana and Alabama say that if a flood were to submerge the whole of the grand State of Indiana, or of Alabama, it would not be within the power and a just cause for the exercise of the national power to appropriate money to reclaim that territory and to restore it to its purposes as a part of the territory of the Union?

SAFETY OF THE REPUBLIC IS THE SUPREME LAW.

The self-evident rule of interpretation of constitutional and sovereign power is that which the Romans embodied in the maxim, "The safety of the Republic is the supreme law."

Whatever powers, therefore, not hurtful to the political autonomy of the States and the national Government are necessary to the exercise of the functions and the performance of the sovereign duties of either or both are necessarily within the scope and limit of their powers, hence the Constitution in express terms affirms—

Congress shall have power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by the Constitution in the Government of the United States.

How shall Congress lay and collect taxes to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and the general welfare with one-half of the soil of the States of the Union submerged and incapable of being taxed?

How shall Congress raise and support armies from a country which has been released from its allegiance to the Union and placed under the dominion of desolating floods and angry waters? How establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, and promote the general welfare in so large an area of the Republic, rendered uninhabitable by causes within the power of the National Government alone to prevent?

POWER CANNOT BE CONSTRUED TO DEFEAT THE OBJECT FOR WHICH IT IS GRANTED.

By what rule of interpretation or what process of reason shall we limit and define the meaning of the words "provide for the common defense" to defense against assaults by and dangers from hostile armies and fleets or combinations to resist the law? The rules of interpretation of the meaning of laws are clear and certain. They are the result of right reason, and properly applied leave no room for uncertainty.

We ascertain the meaning of a law by taking the customary meaning of the words in connection with and subject to and qualified by the object and purpose or spirit of the law, ascertained from its context from the old law and the mischief it was intended to prevent. The object of providing for the common defense is to preserve the territorial integrity, the political autonomy, the production, the persons and lives of the people of the country. If these be endangered upon such a scale or in such form as to affect the people in common and to require the efforts of the people in common to defend them, it is manifest that the objects for which this power is given are attained and that the argument which affirms that the common defense must be limited to defense, not against the evils which hostile fleets and armies cause, but to the hostile fleets and armies themselves, is untrue. But the Constitution proceeds, Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts, and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States; therefore, the affirmation of the Constitution is express, Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, to provide for the general welfare of the United States.

GENERAL WELFARE INCLUDES THE COMMERCE AND PRODUCTIONS OF MISSISSIPPI VALLEY.

By what argument has it been asserted on this floor, what reason given, that that "general welfare" does not include the lives, the productions, the nineteen hundred millions of annual productions of the vast area of the Mississippi Valley, and the countless millions yet to be produced from it? No reason has been given, no limitations of this express phrase of the Constitution have been assigned. None can be given. Is the "general welfare" of the United States promoted by the prevention of one-half of its production and its commerce from being destroyed, one-half of its soil from being withdrawn from its dominion for all purposes of government?

The question seems scarcely to require an answer, but its mere statement demands and carries with it its certain conclusion. The learned and able Senator from Alabama, whose clear and well-trained mind analyzes thought so clearly, has found in the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States that the banks and beds of rivers belong to the States and to riparian proprietors under State law, and not to the National Government, an objection to the appropriations for the protection of the people and commerce of the Mississippi Valley.

RIGHT TO APPROPRIATE PROPERTY FOR PUBLIC USE ESSENTIAL TO GOVERNMENT.

But, Mr. President, the argument cannot run this way. It is manifest that there can be no government, no sovereignty without dominion, either absolute or qualified, over land and people. These are the subjects of sovereignty; jus dominium is the attribute of sovereignty. Qualify and divide it as you may, this is the essential attribute of government, of sovereignty, without which there can be neither.

The Constitution of the United States in affirming in article 6, "this Constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, shall be the supreme law of the land," declares this sovereignty, this jus dominium, over land and people for the uses and purposes and within the limits of the Constitution; and when it affirms that private property may be taken for public uses, just compensation being made therefor, it asserts for itself that right of eminent domain, restrained and qualified by the limitations and prohibitions of the Constitution and by the rights of the States, which is the necessary attribute of sovereignty, whether qualified or absolute, separate or divided. For the beneficial exercise of the powers of the Constitution for the common defense and the general welfare of the United States, objects which in their nature and by the Constitution are declared to be not hurtful to the autonomy of the States or of the Government but preservative of both, there can be no denial of power, no limitation of exercise, because the jus dominium, the right of eminent domain in the banks and beds of the Mississippi River and its affluents is in the States, and because they are the subjects of private property.

NO OBJECTION THAT PRIVATE PROPERTY WILL BE BENEFITED.

Much force has been laid in the argument on this bill on the proposition that the exercise of the public powers of the National Government for the protection of commerce and of the soil and people of the States of the Mississippi Valley would secure the public and general objects referred to, would provide for the common defense and the general welfare by means which would also enrich many land proprietors and private individuals.

Certainly it is true that the burdens and the benefits of this and any other exercise of the powers of government ought to be equalized over the whole people and all the interests of all the States just in that proportion in which they are benefited. But that is a perfection of government never yet reached with precision; still it is true that the measure should be made to attain this end as near as possible. But so far as the fact is concerned that the bill proposes to attain its public ends in and by legally benefiting certain classes of private citizens who happen to be land-owners, and by benefiting certain States who are also land-owners, this cannot be regarded as an objection. The increase of individual property and means under our economic system of property in individuals is the only source from which the Government derives its taxes, imposts, and revenues.

The increase of production carries with it the increase of revenue, and it is by the increase of the wealth of the people of a State that the beneficence of government is attested, and by its decrease that the maleficent results of government and public policies are decided.

As individual prosperity in the general increases, so manifestly increases the taxes and revenues of government, I am not prepared to say that some other system of economic distribution of production and land may not in some future time be found necessary to supply the wants and furnish subsistence and comfort to the densely crowded population who are to inhabit our continent and globe. However this may be, it is surely true of our day, and of the effect of the exercise of our powers of government, that no well-founded objection to any measure can be found in the fact that while it provides for the common defense and the general welfare of the United States it also enriches individuals and increases the production of the soil.

SOVEREIGNTY OF UNITED STATES AND STATES DO NOT CONFLICT.

Mr. President, the Constitution of the United States divides sovereignty and sovereign powers with the States, and reserves to the States and the people thereof all powers not granted. Its single and essential distinction is that in thus dividing sovereignty and assuming granted powers it appropriates to itself only those which concern all the States, and which can be better exercised for the common defense and the general welfare by all for each than by each for itself. Tried by this standard the autonomy of the States can never be interfered with, and that the sovereignty of the States cannot be disturbed the Constitution has been careful to provide that Congress shall have power to levy taxes, to provide for the common defense and the general welfare of the United States. How can any law providing for the common defense and the general welfare affect the autonomy of the States which have reserved authority absolute and potential only over local subjects and domestic rights?

If the owner, whether State or citizen, of the bank of the Mississippi River shall refuse to allow such bank to be used for reclamation of lands, or for the protection of himself and his neighbors and the people of the United States against the floods, the Constitution secures him in his individual right; but the autonomy of the State would be in no wise disturbed, its sovereign power in no way interfered with or lessened by the exercise of the power of the National Government to do there and with his property whatever might be necessary for the common defense and the general welfare. No logic or reason can point out how the sovereignty of the States would be affected or touched by the exercise of power by the National Government to build a levee which would protect the commerce of the United States upon the banks of the Mississippi. The absolute reserved sovereignty of the State over that particular soil would still exist there to tax the increased value of the property, to exert dominion over persons and property, to exercise eminent domain over it, subject still to that higher power of use for the common defense and the general welfare to which it has been applied by the national power.

SPECIFIC MEASURE FOR IMPROVEMENT.

In determining as to the specific measure by which the power of the National Government shall be exercised for the protection of the people and commerce of the United States against destruction by the floods of the Mississippi Valley and its tributary streams, I am of opinion that while the measure of relief should be ample and correspondent with the magnitude of the evil and the end of certain and entire prevention—while Congress should affirm that to be the end and object of its legislation and the scope and purpose of its exercise, I am also inclined to think that such a system should be adopted as would be co-operative with that of the State and the owners of the land, so as to subject the increased and increasing value of their lands to a reasonable part of the burdens of this improvement. I can perceive no objection to and no difficulty in the way of adopting and perfecting such a system by which the powers of the two governments might be made to work harmoniously together for the same end, and by which the appropriations of the National Government might be made dependent upon such State legislation as would at some time return some part of the amount to the United States.

I am, however, prepared to give my support to the bill now before the Senate, or to any other bill which shall affirm the principles and be made in accordance with the opinions I have expressed upon the authority and power of the Government and the necessity for its exercise. I am prepared to vote such sums of money as shall be needed and may be wisely expended for this purpose during the next fiscal year.

In conclusion, Mr. President, I quote the argument of Daniel Webster on this subject in 1846. It covers the subject now, as it did then, in the comprehensive and just view, both of constitutional right and power and of broad and liberal statesmanship.

Mr. Webster said in his speech at a public dinner in Philadelphia:

> We cannot shut our eyes to what is around us. Here we are. This vast country, with the ocean on the east and the Gulf on the south and the great lakes on the north and the west, and these great rivers penetrating it through hundreds and thousands of miles—what are we to do? Is it not of all countries in the world that for which nature has done mighty things, and yet calls most loudly on man to do his part? Providence has given us a country capable of improvement. It is not perfected. We are called on to do something for ourselves; to wake up in this day of improvement and do the deeds which belong to improvement; to facilitate internal intercourse; to furnish harbors for the protection of life and property; to remove obstructions from the rivers; to do anything, all and singular, which a large and liberal policy will suggest to an intelligent people with abundance of means for the advancement of the national prosperity. We live in an age, gentlemen, when we are not to shut our eyes to the great examples set us all over the European continent. I do not speak of England, where private enterprise and wealth have gone so far ahead. But look to Russia, Prussia, Austria, Saxony, Sardinia, everywhere we see a spirit of improvement active, stimulated, and persevering. We behold mountains penetrated by railroads; safe harbors constructed; everything done by government for the people which in the nature of the case the people cannot do for themselves.
> The improvements such as have been mentioned, whether on the ocean or the Gulf, on the lakes or the rivers, are improvements which, from their nature, no single State nor any number of States can make or ought to be called on to make. All idea of leaving such improvements to be undertaken by the States is in my opinion preposterous. In the second place, as all the revenue derived from commerce accrues to the General Government and none of it to the States, the charge of improving the means of commerce and commercial intercourse by such works as have been mentioned properly devolves on the Treasury of that Government and on that Treasury alone.

Mr. President, I am not afraid to stand there. I believe that whatever promotes the general welfare and provides for the common defense of the production, the commerce, the people of the United States, and is not hurtful to the political autonomy of the States or the Federal Government, is both within the power of this Government and within its duty to do; and I believe that the Mississippi River and its affluents, comprising nearly two-thirds of the great territory of this Government, beyond the power of any State to protect from the annually accumulating floods pouring from all the other States upon the valley of the Mississippi, is a work of national necessity, of national duty, and entirely within the scope and unquestionable power of Congress under the Constitution.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. President, I do not desire to detain the Senate now by any remarks, but there have been such wild statements made in regard to appropriations by the Government for the Mississippi River and its tributaries that I have been at some pains to collect together the facts in regard to that matter, and I propose to give the correct figures.

The appropriations, excluding appropriations for surveys and for the jetties at the mouth of the Mississippi River, as I find them, are many millions more than the statements which we have heard here. I desire to have my statement go in the RECORD for the benefit of those gentlemen who have charged this Government heretofore with making slight appropriations for the Mississippi River and its tributaries and large appropriations for other portions of the country.

I find that aside from the appropriations for the South Pass of the Mississippi River, aside from several hundred thousand dollars appropriated for surveys, this Government has appropriated to the Mississippi River and its tributaries from the commencement of the Government to and including the appropriation of 1881, $36,374,652.68 instead of the $6,000,000 which has been repeatedly stated upon this floor to be the amount appropriated for the Mississippi. Even last year in the river and harbor bill of that year there was appropriated to the Mississippi River and its tributaries $4,770,500, and the year before that, 1880, the sum of $2,871,500.

I desire that these statements may go upon the record, as I believe them to be at least below the actual amount, and very different from the statements which have been made on this floor during this discussion.

Mr. KELLOGG. I submit an amendment to the pending bill which I ask to be printed.

The amendment was ordered to be printed.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 2538) to amend the act entitled "An act regulating the appointment of justices of the peace, commissioners of deeds, and constables within and for the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved June 7, 1878, and also to extend the jurisdiction of justices of the peace in the District of Columbia, and to regulate the proceedings before them, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After thirty minutes spent in executive session, the doors were reopened, and (at five o'clock and twenty minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, April 24, 1882.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. F. D. POWER.

The Journal of Saturday was read and approved.

PUBLIC BUILDING, SCRANTON, PENNSYLVANIA.

Mr. SCRANTON. Mr. Speaker, I move, by unanimous consent, that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4178) to authorize the purchase of a site and the erection of a suitable building for a post-office and other Government offices in the city of Scranton, Pennsylvania, and that the bill be put on its passage at this time.

The bill was read.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let us have the regular order. There is not a quorum present.

Mr. SCRANTON. I hope the gentleman from Indiana will not insist on his objection.

Mr. HOLMAN. I must do so.

AMERICAN CITIZENS IN BRITISH PRISONS.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a privileged question; the same one that was up on Saturday last, and I will send the following resolution to the Clerk's desk to be read:

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas on the 23d day of January, 1882, a resolution of inquiry was introduced in this House and was on that day referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs; and

Whereas afterward, on the 14th day of February, 1882, the same resolution, having been reported back, was recommitted to the Committee on Foreign Affairs with instructions, all of which will more fully appear by reference to the said resolution and instructions hereto appended and to the record of the proceedings of those days; and

Whereas by clause 2 of Rule XXIV every such resolution is required to be reported back by the committee to which it has been referred within one week of such reference; and

Whereas more than one week, to wit, ten weeks, have elapsed since the reference or recommitment of said resolution to said committee, and no report has been made thereon by said committee: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Affairs be, and they hereby are, discharged from the further consideration of said resolution, and that the same be now brought before the House for immediate consideration.

[Resolution referred January 23.]

Resolved, That the President of the United States, if not incompatible with the public service, be requested to communicate to this House all correspondence with the British Government on file in the State Department with reference to the case of D. H. O'Connor, a citizen of the United States, now imprisoned in Ireland.

With instructions to add:

And also in reference to the cases of Mr. Chael, of Lawrence, Massachusetts; H. O. Mahoney, of Buffalo, New York, and John McEnery, citizens of the United States, now imprisoned in Ireland, with instructions to request the President of the United States to demand of the British Government the prompt trial of these citizens or their prompt release.

Mr. ORTH. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. Let me say there is a part which the Clerk did not read, which was the resolution and instructions referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The SPEAKER. They will all be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. I rise to the point of order, Mr. Speaker, that this is not a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana has been recognized.

Mr. ORTH. I wish to make the point of order, Mr. Speaker, that the resolution offered by the gentleman from New York is not a privileged question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would be glad to hear from the gentleman from Indiana on that question.

Mr. ORTH. Under the new rules of the House resolutions of inquiry——

Mr. COX, of New York. We cannot hear the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. ORTH. Before proceeding to present the question of order, Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROBINSON]—of both the gentlemen from New York, who are interested in the question—to postpone the consideration of it until to-morrow morning; and for this reason: as the House is aware the Committee on Foreign Affairs has the right to sit during the sessions of the House. We are now engaged in the midst of an investigation with which we are charged, and I am the only member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs on the floor of the House, and I have come here with reference to asking a postponement of the consideration of this question until to-morrow morning, when the committee can be present.

Mr. COX, of New York. These resolutions, which my colleague has charge of now, are resolutions on which a very great question of privilege may arise, especially as to one of them. That is the resolution of inquiry upon which I raised the question of privilege on Saturday. I would like my colleague, if possible, to defer these resolutions at the request of the Committee on Foreign Affairs until to-morrow, only one day. This committee is now engaged with the late Secretary of State in their committee-room. They have leave to sit outside of the sessions of the House. I think it would be no more than grace and propriety to postpone these until to-morrow so we may examine the question of privilege and avoid any long wrangle connected with it.

I desire to say, so far as I am concerned I have no harsh criticism to make of that committee. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] on Saturday put into my mouth words I did not intend to utter and did not utter. I do not arraign the committee. I recognize the fact its organ here from Indiana has been trying to do all he could in this matter. I requested him a week ago to find out who of these suspects were released and who still remain in prison. He said they were busy, but they would the very first opportunity give the House this information. I think it would be no more than fair to that committee to postpone this until to-morrow morning, and I ask my friend and colleague to do that grace to the committee.

Mr. ORTH. The first thing in the morning.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. Very well. I will only say in explanation of my resolution that it is now to-day ten weeks since that resolution was sent before the Committee on Foreign Affairs. During that time this committee have been examining into some unsavory subject connected with Peru, which is of no more consequence as compared with this question, relating to the rights of an American citizen and the dignity of the American Government, than one insignificant thing is in comparison with the most important national question. I wish very much that the Committee on Foreign Affairs could be induced to devote some of their spare time to our American citizens groaning in foreign prisons, instead of devoting the whole of it to the products of Peru. However, this question will come up to-morrow morning, and therefore I am willing to accede to the request of the gentleman from Indiana, and shall consent to postpone the demand for the consideration of the resolutions for the present; though it seems to me that the ten weeks which have already expired, and one other which will now probably be taken up, have been sufficient to allow "my dear Granville" to patch up some weak sort of a pretext for imposing upon the American Government, as he has been doing heretofore.

Mr. ORTH. I desire, Mr. Speaker, to say only this in response to the remarks of the gentleman from New York, that the Committee on Foreign Affairs is prepared to give, and will give at the proper time, abundant reasons for their action in this and in any other matter which has been referred to them by the House.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. I suppose it will be understood, if this goes over until to-morrow, that the point of order made against it as a question of privilege will be considered as pending.

The SPEAKER. The point of order will be considered at the proper time.

Mr. COX, of New York. Is the privileged question which I raised on Saturday upon one of the resolutions pending only on one of them as the Speaker will remember, considered as pending?

The SPEAKER. As we reach this question, all questions of order and privilege will be considered in their sequence. As the Chair understands, these resolutions will go over by consent until to-morrow morning.

COLLEGES FOR AGRICULTURE AND THE MECHANIC ARTS.

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. No. 1677) in relation to the donation of public lands to the several States which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts, and put it upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. The title of the bill will be read, after which objection will be asked for.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. No. 1677) to amend the act donating public lands to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts.

Mr. SIMONTON. I would like to hear some explanation of this bill subject to objection.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I shall not object to the present consideration of the bill, but I desire the reasons for its present consideration.

Mr. BLAND. I demand the regular order.

Mr. KASSON. I ask the gentleman from Missouri, in view of the fact that the Legislature of the State of Iowa has expressly desired this action, and the committee have unanimously recommended it, to allow it to be considered at this time. I ask him to withdraw his objection.

Mr. BLAND. I withdraw the objection.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That section 4 of the act of Congress entitled "An act donating public lands to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts," approved July 2, 1862, be amended, and is hereby amended, so as to permit the State of Iowa, which has provided a college in accordance with the act aforesaid, to loan the endowment fund belonging to said college upon real-estate security, under such rules and regulations for its safe investment as the General Assembly shall hereafter provide.

Mr. CARPENTER. The law as at present in force provides that all moneys received from the sale of lands donated by said act shall be invested in stocks of the United States or of the State, or some other safe stocks yielding not less than 5 per cent. upon the par value of said stocks. Now, the State of Iowa, under this law, selected land, and these lands were appraised and leased for ten years, and the fund arising therefrom was invested at 8 per cent. upon the appraised value. The time for which the lands were leased is now expiring, and the money has been paid into the Treasury. Under the limitations of the law at present in force it is impossible for the trustees to invest the funds. Consequently they ask that the law be so amended as to permit them to invest these moneys in real estate; and as real estate is increasing rapidly in value in the West there can be no safer stock.

The bill was taken from the Speaker's table, read by its title a first and second time, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CARPENTER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JOHN G. TAYLOR.

Mr. CHAPMAN. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3680) for the relief of John G. Taylor, and that the same be put upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read subject to objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the proper accounting officers of the Treasury be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed, in adjusting the accounts of John G. Taylor, former collector of customs at the port of Annapolis, in the State of Maryland, to allow him a credit of $127 09, being the amount paid by said Taylor as collector of customs as aforesaid to John R. Briscoe, as surveyor of customs at the port of Nottingham, Maryland, on account of salary of said Briscoe, and disallowed to said Taylor by the Treasury Department.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does this bill come from some committee of the House?

Mr. CHAPMAN. Yes, sir; it is the unanimous report of the Committee on Ways and Means. I will say to the gentleman from Indiana that it is only for the correction of an entry in the account of a collector.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CHAPMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. I demand the regular order.

Mr. PAGE. I hope the gentleman will yield for a moment in order to enable me to send to the desk and have read a bill to which I think there will be no objection. This is an important matter which should be acted upon at once, and I hope he will withdraw the call for the regular order and let it be read, at all events for information.

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. I withdraw the demand for that purpose.

REMOVAL OF OBSTRUCTIONS AT HELL GATE.

Mr. PAGE. I am unanimously instructed by the Committee on Commerce to report the bill which I send to the desk, and to ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

A bill making an immediate appropriation for the removal of obstructions at Hell Gate, New York.

Be it enacted, &c., That the sum of $50,000 be, and is hereby, appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the removal of obstructions in East River, Hell Gate, New York, the same to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, and to be immediately available.

Mr. PAGE. I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] to explain the necessity for this bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I presume the measure is all right, but I reserve the right of objection.

The SPEAKER. The right to object is reserved.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. The necessity for this appropriation will be apparent from the note which I hold in my hand from General John Newton, the eminent engineer, who is in charge of this work at Hell Gate. He says:

We will be obliged to stop work at Hell Gate on May the 31st unless Congress comes to our relief before that time. It would be a misfortune and a pity.

The fact is that the work at Hell Gate is nearly completed. The underground chambers are nearly ready for the final explosion, but in order that the rocks may be blown out of place this year it is absolutely indispensable that the work should go on without interruption. If there be any interruption it will postpone the explosion for twelve months, for the reason that nitro-glycerine, which is the explosive agent used, can only be surely and safely exploded during a period of six weeks in September and October. During the summer the lightning which prevails at that time is apt to produce an inductive current which may discharge the explosive compound; and during the winter the cold weather prevents the explosion altogether; so that any delay in the prosecution of this work will simply delay the entire work for twelve months.

The bill appropriates no more money than will be appropriated in any event. It only provides that the money may be made available in the month of May instead of the month of June.

Mr. FLOWER. I have the same information about this matter that my colleague has. I have received several letters from the gentleman in charge of that work. It is absolutely necessary that this appropriation be made at once.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection to the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. ROBESON. I desire to know whether this is a report from the Committee on Commerce that properly has charge of this matter.

The SPEAKER. It has been stated that this is a unanimous report from the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. GIBSON. The engineers have asked for it.

Mr. ROBESON. We have millions of dollars asked for by engineers in the Appropriations Committee; but all these demands must be examined before they are granted. If this has not been examined by the appropriate committee I shall object to it.

Mr. GIBSON. It has been examined by the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. And reported by that committee.

Mr. ROBESON. All right; I have no objection.

The bill (H. R. No. 5908) making an immediate appropriation for the removal of obstructions at Hell Gate, New York, was read a first and second time, ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and, being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PAGE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CLERK TO COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I desire to make what I understand is a privileged report from the Committee on Military Affairs. I am instructed to submit for reference to the Committee on Accounts the preamble and resolution which I send to the desk.

The preamble and resolution were read, as follows:

Whereas the important character and great amount of business assigned to the Committee on Military Affairs of this House, only equaled in amount in the cases of three other committees of Congress, and, by reason of division of labor by assistant clerks in some other committees, not equal in number of measures by that laid upon any other committee clerk in either House of Congress, demands the services of a permanent clerk: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Appropriations be authorized to provide, in their recommendations of legislative appropriations, for such clerk at an annual salary of $2,000.

The preamble, resolution, and accompanying report were referred to the Committee on Accounts.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. AINSLIE rose.

Mr. NEAL, and Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan, called for the regular order.

Mr. KLOTZ. I ask unanimous consent to take a bill from the Speaker's table for the purpose of moving concurrence in Senate amendments thereto. It will not take more than one minute.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is called for, which is the call of States and Territories for the introduction of bills.

Mr. SPRINGER. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SPRINGER. Is not the unfinished business of Saturday, the motion to commit the bill referring claims to the Court of Claims, this morning after the reading of the Journal the regular order, the previous question having been ordered on the passage of the bill?

Mr. ROBESON. It was not ordered.

The SPEAKER. The previous question was not ordered; but the demand for the previous question was pending, and it was then in order to move to commit; and that motion was pending at the time the House adjourned.

Mr. SPRINGER. I understood the previous question to have been ordered.

The SPEAKER. It was not ordered, and that matter cannot come up until after the morning hour.

CONTESTED ELECTION—COOK VS. CUTTS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House additional papers in the contested-election case of Cook vs. Cutts, of the sixth Iowa district; which were referred to the Committee on Elections.

EXPENDITURES OF NATIONAL BOARD OF HEALTH.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting reports of expenditures made by the National Board of Health for the quarters ending December 31, 1881, and March 31, 1882; which were referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being called for, this being Monday, the first business in order is the call of States and Territories for the introduction of bills and joint resolutions for reference to their appropriate committees. Under this call memorials and resolutions of State and Territorial Legislatures, and also resolutions calling for executive information, are in order.

TAX ON TOBACCO.

Mr. OATES introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5909) to construe subdivision 8 of section 3244 of the Revised Statutes of the United States so as to exempt farmers from the payment of the tax thereby imposed in all cases wherein they furnish tobacco to their farm laborers and employés in the same manner that other supplies are furnished, and do not engage in the same as merchandise or as a business or vocation; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

MAHALA H. PORTLOCK.

Mr. FORNEY introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5910) for the relief of Mahala H. Portlock; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

PRIVATES ON CAPITOL POLICE.

Mr. PHELPS introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5911) making an addition to the number of privates now authorized by law to serve on the Capitol police; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

ABIGAIL T. BROOKS.

Mr. PHELPS also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5912) granting a pension to Abigail T. Brooks; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

CONSULAR REPORTS.

Mr. SPRINGER introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 199) to provide for the publication and distribution of the consular reports; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Printing, and ordered to be printed.

ARMY OFFICERS ON DETACHED SERVICE.

Mr. HENDERSON introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5913) to provide compensation for officers of the Army when on detached service as members of military courts, boards, or commissions; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

JEAN FRANCOIS PERRY.

Mr. MORRISON introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5914) for the relief of the heirs of Jean Francois Perry; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims, and ordered to be printed.

CAPTAIN DANIEL W. BURKE.

Mr. STEELE introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5915) to change the date of the commission of Captain Daniel W. Burke, of the Fourteenth Infantry; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

REDUCTION OF LETTER-POSTAGE.

Mr. ANDERSON introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5916) to reduce the rate of postage on letter matter; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

NATIONAL AGRICULTURAL EXPERIMENT STATION.

Mr. ANDERSON also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5917) to establish a national agricultural experiment station in the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Agriculture, and ordered to be printed.

H. C. LINN.

Mr. HASKELL introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5918) for the relief of H. C. Linn; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

MANUFACTURE OF SALT IN INDIAN TERRITORY.

Mr. HASKELL also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5919) for the manufacture of salt in the Indian Territory; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

HOUSTON L. TAYLOR.

Mr. RYAN introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5920) for the relief of Houston L. Taylor; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

ASSISTANT SURGEONS IN THE NAVY.

Mr. ELLIS introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5921) to fix the rank and pay of assistant surgeons in the Navy not in the line of promotion; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

ASSISTANT TREASURER AT NEW ORLEANS.

Mr. DARRELL introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5922) to amend section 3596 of the Revised Statutes, fixing the salary of the assistant treasurer at New Orleans; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be be printed.

EIGHT-HOUR LAW.

Mr. MURCH submitted the following resolution of inquiry; which was read and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor:

Whereas the law making eight hours a legal working day for the workmen, laborers, and mechanics in the Government employ is unrepealed and disregarded in the Navy, War, and other Departments; and

Whereas for several years the men representing labor have urged to have the law enforced; and

Whereas continued disregard and nullification of this law on the part of the Executive Departments is a source of great public scandal and grievance to a large class of citizens: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Attorney-General be directed to report to this House at his earliest convenience his opinion as to the present status of the national eight-hour law of 1868, (section 3738 of the Revised Statutes,) showing in what Departments of the Government the same is obeyed and enforced; in what Departments it is enforced and obeyed for a portion of each year and disobeyed or disregarded during other portions of the year; also what Departments or officials do not enforce or obey this law at any time during the year; also the names of the officials who are responsible for the non-observance of this law, and what rules and regulations are established with reference thereto in the various Departments of the Government and at navy-yards, arsenals, forts, shops, stores, or other public works or places workmen, laborers, and mechanics are employed; also to report to this House his opinion as to whether any further legislation or action on the part of Congress is necessary to secure obedience to the law which makes eight hours a working-day for workmen, laborers, and mechanics in the employ of the General Government.

GEORGE E. PAYNE.

Mr. ELLIS introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5923) referring the claim of George E. Payne to the Court of Claims; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

FLORENCE SIMMONS.

Mr. URNER introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5924) for the relief of Mrs. Florence Simmons; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

JOSEPH MIDDLEKAUFF.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The call of States and Territories is now concluded.

Mr. NEAL. I demand the regular order.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I have a privileged resolution which I desire to submit.

Mr. WILLIS. I desire to introduce a bill for reference.

SYSTEM OF BANKRUPTCY.

Mr. HUMPHREY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, by unanimous consent, reported, as a substitute for House bill No. 3329, a bill (H. R. No. 5994) to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy; which was read a first and second time, recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

PERMANENT AND INDEFINITE APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. ATKINS. I do not see the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations present, and I will therefore ask unanimous consent that Senate bill No. 403, to repeal certain laws relating to permanent and indefinite appropriations, be taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. RYAN. I hope that will be done.

There was no objection, and the bill was accordingly taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

FINAL ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I desire to submit a concurrent resolution providing for the final adjournment of this session of Congress. It is a privileged question, I believe, and I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives do declare their respective Houses adjourned sine die at twelve o'clock on the 22d day of May next.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

LAKES, RIVERS, AND HARBORS.

Mr. WILLIS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5995) to define the jurisdiction and control of the United States over lakes, rivers, and harbors; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. NEAL. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order, under the resolution adopted on the 10th of this month, is business from the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. I ask consent to submit a resolution for reference.

The SPEAKER. If there is no objection the resolution will be received.

CLERK OF COMMITTEE ON TERRITORIES.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Accounts:

Resolved, That the Committee on Appropriations be, and hereby are, respectfully requested to make provision in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill for the ensuing fiscal year for the clerk of the Committee on Territories as one of the annual clerks provided for in said bill.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. NEAL. I must now insist upon the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the resolution adopted by the House on the 10th of this month in regard to the order of business to-day.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Monday, April 24, after the call of States and Territories for the introduction of bills and joint resolutions, be set aside for the consideration of such business as may be presented by the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. NEAL. I am instructed by the Committee on Territories to report for consideration at this time the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Monday, the 8th day of May, 1882, after the call of States and Territories for bills and joint resolutions, is hereby set apart for the consideration of such business as may be presented to the House by the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. ANDERSON. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ANDERSON. It is whether the special order which is set for to-day and such a special order as is proposed by this resolution takes priority of all previous special orders?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not considered the pending resolution, but the Chair recognizes the fact that the order of the House relating to the business from the Committee on the District of Columbia was first fixed by a suspension of the rules to take precedence of other special orders. The special order for to-day is fixed for consideration after the call of States, and before a morning hour can begin.

Mr. ANDERSON. But the special order which the gentleman now asks to have made——

The SPEAKER. The Chair will have to decide its rank when it comes up. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. NEAL moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. NEAL. I yield to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. GARRISON.]

JUSTICES OF THE PEACE IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. GARRISON. I am directed by the Committee on the District of Columbia to call up for consideration the bill (H. R. No. 2538) to extend the jurisdiction of justices of the peace in the District of Columbia, and to regulate the proceedings before them.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That justices of the peace of the District of Columbia shall have jurisdiction to hear, try, and determine all pleas and actions, including attachment and replevin, when the amount claimed to be due or the value of the property sought to be recovered shall not exceed $500, but not in cases where the title to real estate is in issue, actions for malicious prosecution, actions against justices of the peace or other officers for misconduct in office, and actions for slander, verbal or written, nor cases of breaches of promise to marry.

SEC. 2. That such jurisdiction shall be exclusive original jurisdiction where the amount claimed to be due or the value sought to be recovered shall not exceed $100, and original and concurrent with the supreme court of the District of Columbia where the amount claimed to be due or the value of the property sought to be recovered is more than $100 but does not exceed $500; and where the sum claimed exceeds $20 either party shall be entitled to a trial by jury.

SEC. 3. That no appeal shall be allowed from the judgment of a justice of the peace in any common law action unless the matter in demand in such action or pleaded in set-off thereto shall exceed the sum of $20, nor unless the appellant, with sufficient surety, approved by the justice, enters into an undertaking to pay and satisfy whatever final judgment may be recovered in the appellate court.

SEC. 4. That whenever any constable shall neglect or refuse to pay over to the party entitled thereto any money collected or received by him on any process issued by a justice of the peace, the justice issuing such process may, upon complaint of such party, summon the constable and the sureties upon his official bond to appear before him at a day and hour therein named, and not less than two days after service of such summons, to answer to the said complaint, and may render judgment against the said constable and his sureties for the amount so collected or received, if not exceeding $500, with interest and costs, and execution may issue therefor without stay except by appeal.

SEC. 5. That any justice of the peace may compel any constable to make due return of any process signed by said justice and placed in his hands for service, by attachment; and for refusal to make such return such constable shall be subject to the same fines and penalties as a witness refusing to obey a summons.

SEC. 6. That in proceedings under the provisions of chapter 19 ("Landlord and tenant") of the Revised Statutes relating to the District of Columbia, where the tenant cannot be found so that personal service can be made upon him, service of process may be made by leaving a copy of such process with some person over twenty-one years of age upon the premises, or in the absence of such tenant or person then process may be served by fixing a copy of the same to a conspicuous part of the premises where it may be conveniently read; and the officer shall, in his return, state the manner of such service.

SEC. 7. That in cases of appeal of certiorari the justice shall retain all original papers, except those filed in evidence, and make and file with the appellate court copies of the papers so retained, certified by himself; and for preparing and transmitting the papers on appeal or certiorari he shall be paid a fee of $1; but the superior court may require the production of the original papers.

SEC. 8. That when personal property is taken on execution or attachment issued by a justice of the peace, and such property is claimed by a person other than a defendant therein, or is claimed by the defendant to be property exempt from execution, and such claimant shall give notice in writing to the constable of his claim to such property, or that it is exempt as aforesaid, the constable shall notify the plaintiff in such writ, or his agent or attorney, of such claim, and shall also notify such plaintiff and the claimant before what justice and at what time and place a trial of the right of property shall be had.

SEC. 9. That the trial of the right of property in such cases shall be before the justice of the peace who issued such writ, or, if he should be unable to attend to such trial, before some other justice of the peace in said District.

SEC. 10. That the justice shall enter such cases on his docket, and the trial shall be had therein in the same manner as in other trials before justices of the peace; and a change of venue may be taken as in other cases.

SEC. 11. That in case the property shall appear to belong to the claimant, or to be exempt from execution, judgment shall be entered against the plaintiff in the execution or attachment for costs, and the property levied upon shall be released. If it shall appear that the property does not belong to the claimant, or is not so exempt as aforesaid, judgment shall be entered against said claimant for costs, including such additional costs as shall have been made by the delay in the execution of such writ.

SEC. 12. That an appeal may be taken as in other cases, and the bond shall be given within ten days from the time of entering the judgment, except when the tenth day falls on Sunday, when the bond may be given on the following day.

SEC. 13. That the judgment in such cases shall be a complete indemnity to the constable in proceeding to sell or return any such property; and in case of appeal the constable shall return such property unless the party claiming, or the defendant in the execution, or his agent, shall enter into an undertaking, with sufficient security, to be approved by the justice, for the delivery of such property to the officer if the judgment of the court shall be against the party entering into such undertaking.

SEC. 14. That the Supreme Court of the District is hereby authorized to make and establish such additional rules of practice and prescribe forms of process and proceedings rendered necessary by this act, and to alter or amend the same as it may from time to time deem advisable.

SEC. 15. That the constable or other officer serving a writ of distraint, attachment, or execution shall set off to the debtor, being a householder or head of a family, the articles exempted by section 797 of the act of Congress, entitled "An act to revise and consolidate the statutes of the United States, general and permanent in their nature, relating to the District of Columbia, in force December 1, anno Domini 1873."

SEC. 16. That civil cases tried by the justice without a jury shall be decided by him, and judgment rendered not later than the fourth day after trial, except when the fourth day falls on Sunday, when judgment may be rendered on the day following.

SEC. 17. That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed; but nothing herein shall be construed to take away and limit the jurisdiction conferred upon justices of the peace by chapter 19 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the District of Columbia.

Mr. GARRISON. I call the previous question.

Mr. KLOTZ. I would like to offer an amendment and say a word or two upon it.

Mr. GARRISON. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. KLOTZ. I have no objection to this bill except that in the amendments incorporated by the committee the amount of suits which may come within the jurisdiction of justices of the peace is increased from $200 to $500. It is true that we have very good justices of the peace in this District, but it is also true that they are not courts of record, and, although not a lawyer, I think that $300 would probably be a better limit than $500. I move to amend by striking out "five" and inserting "three," in sections 1, 2, and 4.

Mr. GARRISON. I now call the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. KLOTZ, it was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. GARRISON. I am directed by the Committee on the District of Columbia to call the previous question on the passage of the bill.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I rise to inquire whether there are not certain amendments reported by the committee on which the question should be separately taken.

The SPEAKER. The bill is treated as a substitute for the original bill; it is considered as the bill of the committee.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. It is not reported as a substitute. I do not object to so treating it, if the House understands it that way. I do not care particularly about the matter of form. The bill is reported as a bill to which the committee recommend amendments.

The SPEAKER. This is the bill which the committee called up.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. They do not call up the amendments as part of the bill.

The SPEAKER. They call up the bill as reported by them with the amendments.

The previous question was ordered, and under the operation thereof the bill was passed.

Mr. GARRISON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

An amendment reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia, to make the title of the bill read as follows, was agreed to:

A bill to amend the act entitled "An act regulating the appointment of justices of the peace, commissioners of deeds, and constables within and for the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved June 7, 1878, and also to extend the jurisdiction of justices of the peace in the District of Columbia, and to regulate the proceedings before them.

POLICE FORCE OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. URNER. I am instructed by the Committee on the District of Columbia to report back with certain amendments the bill (H. R. No. 3575) to increase the police force of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The bill, as proposed to be amended, was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That section 340 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the District of Columbia be, and the same hereby is, amended so as to read as follows:

The police force shall consist of the following officers, namely: one major, one captain, ten lieutenants, twenty sergeants, such number of privates, not exceeding three hundred for the regular service, as the board may deem necessary, and eight detectives; and all promotions to the positions of captain, lieutenant, and sergeant shall be made from the next succeeding grade or rank on the force.

SEC. 2. In the appointment of policemen under this act, the District commissioners shall, when all other qualifications are equal, give preference to those applicants who have been honorably discharged from the volunteer service of the Union Army. No appointment shall be made to the police force of any person who has not been a resident of the District for three months immediately preceding his appointment.

SEC. 3. That the commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized to appoint one additional clerk for service at police headquarters.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I desire to inquire whether the bill as just read is the same as House bill No. 3575, which we have in print.

The SPEAKER. It is not the bill as printed. The bill as read contains several verbal amendments, as well as a new section, reported by the committee as a substitute for section 2.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I ask for a separate vote on the amendments recommended by the committee.

The SPEAKER. The amendments will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 7, strike out "two captains" and insert "one captain."

In the same line, strike out the word "twelve," before the word "lieutenants," and insert "ten;" so as to read "ten lieutenants."

In line 8, strike out the word "four;" so as to read "twenty sergeants" instead of "twenty-four sergeants."

In lines 8 and 9, strike out "two hundred and fifty" and insert "three hundred;" so as to read "not exceeding three hundred for the regular service."

Strike out section 2, as follows:

"That so much of section 354 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the District of Columbia as requires that 'no person shall be appointed as policeman or watchman who has not served in the Army or Navy of the United States and received an honorable discharge' be, and the same hereby is, repealed."

And insert the following:

"In the appointment of policemen under this act the District commissioners shall, when all other qualifications are equal, give preference to those applicants who have been honorably discharged from the volunteer service of the Union Army. No appointment shall be made to the police force of any person who has not been a resident of the District for three months immediately preceding his appointment."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments reported to the bill.

Mr. ROBESON. I should like to have a separate vote on the last amendment.

The SPEAKER. The vote will first be taken on the amendments of the committee, excepting the one referred to by the gentleman from New Jersey.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Section 2 is entirely a new section, and is recommended by the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. ROBESON. Mr. Speaker, section 2 is as follows:

That so much of section 354 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the District of Columbia as requires that "no person shall be appointed as policeman or watchman who has not served in the Army or Navy of the United States and received an honorable discharge" be, and the same is hereby repealed.

Now, do we want to repeal that? That is the first question I ask—do the committee ask here this morning that we shall repeal that section of the Revised Statutes under which this police force has been organized since it existed, and throw it open to everybody the commissioners, whoever they are, choose to appoint, without retaining the preference for Union soldiers? And, Mr. Speaker, they do not meet this question squarely, but after striking out the patriotic section, they give us a substitute for it which, if I may be allowed the expression, whips the devil around the stump, [laughter;] if that is unparliamentary, I will take it back, but which, I may say within parliamentary limits, "keeps the word of promise to the ear and breaks it to the hope." There is no objection to that expression, I suppose. [Laughter.]

That is a provision which provides that the commissioners, acting on their own judgment, shall give preference to the Union soldiers. What does that amount to, and why repeal the positive provision to insert this weak substitute? We have already the section which says that all the Departments shall give preference to the Union soldiers; but do they give any such preference, or not?

A MEMBER. No.

Mr. ROBESON. They do not; everybody knows it, and you cannot make them, since it is left to their own executive judgment. This amendment leaves it discretionary with these commissioners, whereas we have now on the statute-book a positive regulation which they dare not violate and for which they may be arraigned if they do. Why should we take away that positive restriction and give them discretion of which they themselves are the sole and final judge? That is what I object to, and I do not think this House is going to vote for it.

Mr. URNER. This section 2, which was in the original bill as referred to the committee, provides for the repeal of that section of the Revised Statutes which requires appointments to be made from those who served in the Army and Navy of the United States. The Committee on the District of Columbia propose to strike out that section repealing the Revised Statutes. They want preference to be given to Union soldiers who served in the Army or in the Navy of the United States. Therefore, sir, in this report of the committee they propose to strike out that clause in the bill referred to, and in place of it to insert a provision that the commissioners of the District, all other things being equal, shall give preference to the Union soldier in the appointment of policemen.

It further provides, in the last part of the section, that all persons employed on the police force shall have been for three months resident in the District.

Mr. MILLER. I want to ask the gentleman a question. The commissioners, I understand, have established a rule that they will not appoint any man on the police force over forty years of age. Let me ask the gentleman, does not that keep out all the men who served in the Union Army? Is it not a fact that every man who served in the Union Army is now over forty years of age?

Mr. URNER. I do not know anything about the rules and regulations of the commissioners on that subject. The substitute we have reported, if adopted, requires the commissioners, regardless of their rules and regulations, because here is an act of Congress overriding their rules and regulations, to appoint to the police force of the District, in preference to all others, men who served in the Union Army or Navy of the United States, all other qualifications being equal.

Mr. ROBESON. Let me ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. URNER. Certainly.

Mr. ROBESON. Here is the provision of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and I will read it:

No person shall be appointed a policeman or watchman who has not served in the Army or Navy of the United States and received an honorable discharge.

Now, then, you propose to require these commissioners to employ soldiers by repealing that clause and substituting for it a clause which allows them to use their discretion, and merely says they shall give them preference, all other things being equal. The original section permits no regulation to interfere with it. Yours permits the commissioners to say that no man over forty years of age shall be employed and to rule out every man who was competent to be a soldier in the war.

Mr. URNER. The gentleman is entirely wrong.

Mr. ROBESON. I should like the gentleman to show me where.

Mr. MILLER. Let me state to the gentleman from Maryland——

Mr. URNER. I will explain in a moment in reference to this provision which the gentleman from New Jersey objects to.

Mr. MILLER. Just let me state why I made the remark that I did. I accompanied a Union soldier to the office of the commissioners of the District myself and recommended him for an appointment upon the police force of the city. Now, they cited me to a rule adopted by themselves, whether by authority of law I know not, but a rule that no man could be appointed on the police force who was over forty years old. If that is the law it ought to be repealed. If it is a rule established by the commissioners of the District of Columbia they should be so controlled by the law that they could not adopt a rule that would virtually cut out of all competition for the service a vast body of men who are entitled to recognition.

Mr. ROBESON. And shall this committee undertake to control them by repealing the law which now does control their action, and leaving it entirely to their discretion as to what rules they shall establish in this connection?

Mr. URNER. I think the gentleman from New Jersey takes an erroneous view of this question. I wish to call his attention to the fact that the bill which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia had in it a section which repealed this section of the Revised Statutes to which he now refers. Now, does the gentleman want us to come in here and bring in a bill to repeal the Revised Statutes, which provide that soldiers should have preference in these appointments? If that is his idea, I will say to him that the committee could not and did not do it. The committee believed it was proper for them to strike out of the bill the section which provides for the repeal of the Revised Statutes in question, and virtually re-enacted it in the substitute, by saying that the commissioners shall give preference to Union soldiers. There was no other way in their judgment by which they could arrive at the result which the gentleman from New Jersey seems to have in view.

Mr. ROBESON. Why not be content with striking out this thing, and not report the substitute, which gives more power to the commissioners? Why strike out a section of the bill which repeals the section of the Revised Statutes, and yet insert in the place of it as a substitute a provision which virtually repeals it? I am willing to strike out section 2, but, Mr. Speaker, I am not willing to insert in its place a provision which loosens, regulates, explains, if you choose, the section of the Revised Statutes which leaves it to the judgment of the commissioners to exercise their discretion solely. Of the million of men who were in the armies of the United States when this rebellion collapsed there are men enough, able, competent, and worthy to fill up the police force of the District of Columbia. There are men enough, able-bodied enough, intelligent enough, active enough, and brave enough for any such purpose. Let the section of the Revised Statutes stand as it is.

Mr. KLOTZ. Mr. Speaker, it is true that the Revised Statutes provide that preference shall be given in all the Departments of this Government to Union soldiers for all appointments rather than to civilians. But it is also true, and the gentleman who has just taken his seat knows it, that all of the Departments here, without exception, have neglected to attend to that duty or have failed to obey the requirements of the law. We know, and it is a matter of public notoriety, that for ten years no attention whatever has been paid to that law. Therefore, when gentlemen get up on this floor and talk about that provision of the statutes which is never enforced, it seems to me to be simple buncombe, especially so when, as my friend will admit, there is no Department of this Government, as I have just stated, that obeys it.

Again, while it is true, and I should be the last man to deny it, that the soldiers should have the preference in all such cases, yet the time may come when it will not be possible to get soldiers qualified, or when the applicants will be too old to perform the service which they are required to perform and physically able to perform the duties which we are now legislating upon. We say, then, in this bill, all other things being equal, that the soldiers shall have the preference; and in the same connection that a soldier living here for three months before the date of appointment, if elligible in all other respects, shall have the preference. That is the intent of the bill as presented.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania, my colleague, has referred to a rule established by the commissioners in reference to these appointments. It is true that we have the law giving the soldier preference, but he must be under forty years of age, he must be over five feet nine inches high, and he must have resided for two years in the city of Washington before he can be eligible. These are necessary requirements, as any gentleman will understand; and I would like to ask the gentleman from New Jersey if he thinks it advisable to pass a buncombe law which claims to give the soldier the preference and then exclude him by such conditions that you know he cannot comply with? How many soldiers from the gentleman's district or from my district will be willing to come here and remain for two years in order to gain the privilege of citizenship to enable them to secure an office that pays $75 a month and permits them to stand out all night in the snow and frost, while your Departments are filled with men and women, loyal people who never carried a musket, from whom no such exacting conditions are required? Do you think you can make the soldiers believe that there is anything but buncombe in that? They are not as stupid as you give them credit for. They are intelligent men generally. They do not ask to be appointed to a position wherein it is assumed that they are not equal to a citizen. If the conditions are equal he wants the preference, that is all. He asks, and he should have it under the law, the chance if he is qualified. He looks to Congress to do what is right, and I am satisfied he would prefer that his Representatives here should quit talking, talking, talking, for the purpose of buncombe only and getting their speeches scattered abroad. They are tired of that, and if you could go to their camp-fires and listen to them they would tell you so. I say under the old law a soldier could not have a position on the force here unless he came here and obtained a residence.

Mr. BRIGGS. That was under regulations of the commissioners.

Mr. KLOTZ. Under the law.

Mr. BRIGGS. I ask the gentleman if the requirement that men should be of a certain age, a certain height, and be two years residents of the District was not under rules which the commissioners themselves had established, thereby abrogating the law requiring them to appoint only Union soldiers to the office; and whether these regulations were not for the very purpose of avoiding the provisions of this law?

Mr. KLOTZ. I say let the Departments in the city of Washington give the soldiers situations under the Government according to law, better than the positions upon the frontier, better than the positions in which these men are out all night in the cold. They are deserving of better treatment. Let the Departments first be filled up with deserving soldiers and soldiers' widows. We see soldiers' widows here starving to death, while two or three from a family who did not serve in the war are in the Departments. Let those who make these objections enforce the old law and I will be glad to vote with them.

Mr. COX, of New York. I believe this is not the first time we have had a discussion about the policemen of this city. I think the Committee on the District of Columbia—and I am very glad to be able to support something from that committee—have shown good, old-fashioned common sense, what I might call horse sense; and of course the gentleman from New Jersey opposes it.

Mr. ROBESON. I am not opposed to horse sense. What I am opposed to is jackass sense.

Mr. COX, of New York. I did not hear exactly what the gentleman said, unless it be that he charges the gentlemen on the Committee on the District of Columbia with being jackasses for bringing this in. What is the position taken by the gentleman from New Jersey? Nearly twenty years have gone by since the war was ended. I believe my friend from New Jersey was not in the war. If he was, in what regiment did he serve?

Mr. ROBESON. In the same regiment in which the gentleman himself served.

Mr. COX, of New York. I belonged to the home brigade. I never sailed the deep like the gentleman from New Jersey. I never navigated the rivers like that gentleman. I never built the vessels and commanded them like that lord high-admiral. But I do believe we should bring to this discussion a little old-fashioned gumption.

What is the point in dispute? After the war has been long ended, and when the soldiers who served in it have become nearly twenty years older, we propose absolutely that none but them shall be policemen here. And the District Committee, in the interest of peace and safety in the Federal city, desire to give a discretion to the commissioners in the appointment of these policemen. What is wrong about that? They will prefer Union soldiers if otherwise they are fit.

What makes up the qualification for a good policeman? The gentleman from New Jersey ought to know. He has tried a good many cases in the courts, and will understand what I mean when I say it does not depend exactly on a man having fought here or there, on one side or the other; but it depends on the question whether he is a brave, capable, prudent man. Is he a strong man? Will he carry out the orders of his superior? Is he capable of discharging properly the duties of the office? If that be so, let him be selected. But if you restrict these commissioners, the responsibility for insecurity in this city will be on us, not on them.

Mr. MILLER. I desire to offer as an amendment to section 2, at the close of the bill, what I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. That will only be in order as an amendment to the amendment reported by the committee. The Clerk will read the proposed amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That the commissioners of the District shall not be permitted to make any rule or regulation as to age that will discriminate as to honorably discharged soldiers of the Union Army.

Mr. MILLER. That is all I ask. I do not ask that the commissioners shall employ these men if they are not capable, but that they shall be prohibited from making any regulation that will make it impossible for an honorably discharged Union soldier to apply. The rule they have now really discriminates against the Union soldiers and makes it impossible almost for any one of them to be employed on the force.

Mr. KLOTZ. I want to add one word. In this bill that we have reported here we make it a law that a soldier need only reside here three months, instead of a two years' residence being required as heretofore.

Mr. NEAL. I want the House and the gentleman from New Jersey, and every other gentleman who opposes this amendment, to understand that we have now two hundred policemen here. Every one of those, under the law, is required to be an honorably discharged soldier from the Army or the Navy of the United States; not volunteer soldiers, but honorably discharged soldiers or sailors from the Army or Navy. There are now two hundred of these policemen who are honorably discharged soldiers. That is the first proposition. Now, we propose to increase this force one-third; that is, to add one hundred more. What do we say? Not that the law shall be repealed so far as the two hundred already on the force are concerned, but that in making this addition to the police force a discretion may be vested in the commissioners to take persons who have been in the Army, provided they are better men than applicants who have not been in the Army.

As it is now, every policeman who is appointed comes, not from the volunteer soldiers, not from those who bared their breasts to the leaden storm during the four years of hideous war, but from the regular Army; soldiers who were discharged from the regular Army; who are entitled to no consideration from this House or the people of the United States.

The commissioners have, as I think, wisely adopted a rule providing they will appoint no man over forty years of age to this police force. Why? Because the police force of this city is not subject to political changes as it is in other cities of the United States.

Every new administration that comes in here does not change the police force. These men are kept on the force until, by old age or other disability, they are incapacitated from the further discharge of their duties. And heretofore it has been the custom of the authorities of the District to provide easier places for those who have been broken down in the service, and are no longer competent to act as policemen. That is a good and wise regulation. Men who are much over forty years of age are not competent by reason of their age to discharge the duties of policemen under ordinary circumstances.

Mr. ROBESON. Is the present police force of this District efficient?

Mr. NEAL. Is it efficient?

Mr. ROBESON. Yes; that is my question.

Mr. NEAL. I leave that for you to say.

Mr. ROBESON. I am not asking about the number of the force, but the character of its individual members.

Mr. NEAL. It is impossible for me to answer that question.

Mr. ROBESON. Is it efficient so far as the character of the force goes? If it be not, then that would be a different thing. But they have been appointed, I suppose, under the Revised Statutes as they now stand. And in adding one hundred to their number I think we might preserve that principle and leave the statute as it stands requiring the appointment of Union soldiers.

Mr. NEAL. I will ask the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROBE-

SON] before he takes his seat whether he considers that soldiers who have been discharged from the regular Army and Navy furnish the right kind of material for the police force of this District?

Mr. ROBESON. Who said anything about the regular Army and Navy?

Mr. NEAL. They are taken from the regular Army and Navy.

Mr. ROBESON. Oh, no. The statute provides that no person shall be appointed as policemen or watchmen in the District of Columbia who has not served in the Army or Navy of the United States, not the regular Army.

Mr. NEAL. Exactly; in the Army or Navy.

Mr. ROBESON. Does that say the "regular" Army or the "regular" Navy? Will any commissioner of this District undertake to exclude from this force all men who marched under our flag in the volunteer force?

Mr. NEAL. I do not yield for a speech.

Mr. ROBESON. I thought the gentleman wanted me to answer his question before I took my seat.

Mr. NEAL. That provision of the law does not confine the selection of policemen from the volunteer soldiery at all. It provides that they shall be those who have been regularly and honorably discharged from the Army and Navy; not simply from the volunteer force.

Mr. ROBESON. My friend will pardon me. It says those who have served in the Army or Navy.

Mr. NEAL. And the practical operation in this District is to take the members of the force from those who have been discharged from the regular Army or Navy.

Mr. McCOOK. Is not that in contravention of the statute?

Mr. NEAL. It is not.

Mr. McCOOK. I do not know how the commissioners may construe that provision of the statute, but to the mind of the average Congressman I think it would be considered a misconstruction of the statute, to take all these men from the regular Army or Navy.

Mr. NEAL. They have been honorably discharged.

Mr. McCOOK. Of course; and it must apply to the volunteer forces as well.

Mr. NEAL. Certainly; the volunteer forces are not excluded at all. But the practical effect is that all the policemen who are now from time to time appointed to fill vacancies come from the regular Army and Navy, because the material from the volunteer forces is not here in the District from which to make appointment.

But as I have already said, if this bill shall become a law as the committee have reported it, even then two-thirds of the police force of this District must of necessity come from the Army and Navy, because this bill does not interfere with the men who have already been appointed or with those who will be appointed to fill vacancies in that number; it provides only for the addition to the force.

Now, I say there would be nothing wrong whatever for us to provide that other persons than those who were in the Army and Navy of the United States, to the extent of one-third of the police force of this District, if they showed superior ability and superior manhood, might be appointed for that force.

We have a law which requires that for the clerical force in the various Departments of the Government in this city preference shall be given to those from the ranks of honorably discharged soldiers of the Union Army. What is the result? In the Interior Department, one of the largest, 35 per cent. only of such persons are appointed clerks. And if you will go into the other Departments you will find the proportion still less.

In the police force of this city, which above all others should be efficient and faithful, under this proposed law two-thirds must of necessity come from the Army and Navy. Why, then, when the lives and property of persons in the District are at stake, when the people of the District are compelled to pay the taxes to support this police force, should we require of them that which is not required of any other city in the Union; that is, that no man shall be a policeman unless he has been honorably discharged from the Army or Navy?

It seems to me there ought not to be any difference of opinion on this point. The Forty-sixth Congress, when they had this matter under consideration in the code, provided that 75 per cent. only of the entire police force of the District should come from the Army and Navy. That provision met with the approbation of nearly every Republican on this floor, I think, while the bill was opposed in that Congress by my Democratic brethren to a very considerable extent because it did not strike out that clause entirely and leave the commissioners free to select for policemen those who would be most efficient in the discharge of their duty.

The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROBESON] asks me whether or not in my opinion the present police force is efficient. That is a question that he could answer just as well as I can. Whether the police force here is efficient or not there is probably more crime committed in the city of Washington than in any other place in the United States in proportion to population; and that crime is to a very large extent undetected. The papers are filled every morning with accounts of larcenies, burglaries, assaults, and even worse—murders. Whether this prevalence of crime is the fault of the police I am not prepared to say. I do know, however, that whether the members of the force are efficient or not the force is certainly insufficient in numbers for the proper discharge of its duties.

Mr. HAWK. Is the gentleman prepared with statistics to support the statement he has just made in regard to crime in this District?

Mr. NEAL. In the city of New York, which has a territory of only one square mile less than the District of Columbia, there are 2,200 policemen, one for every 450 inhabitants. In this District, in the winter time, when strangers largely increase the population, the estimate is that there is but one policemen to 1,000 inhabitants. A comparison with other cities shows the same disproportion.

I trust, therefore, that whatever may be the fate of this amendment the House will not refuse to pass the bill in some shape, so that there may be protection for the property and lives of the people of Washington, who have to come to Congress with tied hands asking for every character of legislation which may be necessary for their welfare.

Mr. URNER. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that this bill has got into a little confusion, and perhaps the House does not understand it. I think it due to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and to myself, who have reported the bill by direction of the committee, that I should put both myself and the committee clear upon this question.

In considering this bill, the object that the committee had first in view was to secure the peace, order, and good government of the District of Columbia; to secure a police force of sufficient numbers and of proper character to accomplish that end. The bill, as referred, contained a section providing for the repeal of section 354 of the Revised Statutes, relating to the District of Columbia. I will read that section:

> No person shall be appointed to office, or hold office in the police force, who can not read and write the English language, or who is not a citizen of the United States, or who shall ever have been indicted and convicted of crime; and no person shall be appointed as policeman or watchman who has not served in the Army or Navy of the United States and received an honorable discharge.

The bill as referred proposed to repeal this section absolutely. The committee was not willing to do this. They thought that soldiers and sailors of the United States Army and Navy should have the preference in employment as policemen in the District of Columbia. At the same time they wanted to secure to the greatest possible extent the peace and good government of the District. They have therefore proposed as a substitute for the repealing section what is in substance the general law with regard to the employment of persons in the civil service of the Government; in other words, that all things being equal, the Union soldier and sailor shall have the preference.

We do not propose to repeal the section to which I have referred. We want the commissioners of the District to appoint the most efficient men they can get; and we provide that if a Union soldier or sailor possesses the requisite qualifications and desires appointment he shall have the preference.

This goes a good deal further than the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. He says his amendment provides that the District commissioners shall not discriminate against Union soldiers. Our section provides that the commissioners shall discriminate in favor of Union soldiers. We want to give such soldiers the preference; but at the same time we want to keep strictly in view the good government of the District and the selection of the best men.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. Is the gentleman advised whether the District commissioners have had any difficulty in filling the present force by the appointment of Union soldiers?

Mr. URNER. I have not any information on that subject.

Mr. BRIGGS. Do not the rules which the commissioners have prescribed make certain requirements of age and height as well as two years' residence?

Mr. URNER. I have never heard of those rules before hearing them mentioned here to day. If the commissioners have any such rules they must be rules of their own creation and in contravention of the law. I should not suppose they would adopt such rules.

Mr. BRIGGS. I will say to the gentleman that they have a rule of just the character I have suggested. When I applied to the board of commissioners for the appointment of a Union soldier, who I know would be as efficient an officer as any on the police force of this city or any other, I was referred to the rules which the District commissioners had adopted; and under them this man could not obtain the appointment.

I hope the statute will be retained as it is, and I trust that we shall go further, and take from those commissioners the power which they have exercised to discriminate against Union soldiers.

Mr. URNER. I will stand by the gentleman from New Hampshire upon all legislation necessary to give the most ample protection to the Union soldiers. I will give them the preference all the time.

Mr. ROBESON. Mr. Speaker, as I understand the chairman of the committee, it is not claimed that this section of the statutes providing that no policeman shall be appointed unless he has served in the Army or Navy of the United States and been honorably discharged excludes soldiers of the volunteer army.

Mr. NEAL. Certainly not.

Mr. ROBESON. I say so, too. But the gentleman goes on to say that under the ruling of the commissioners——

Mr. NEAL. Under their regulations.

Mr. ROBESON. Under their regulations nobody gets these appointments but men who have been honorably discharged from the regular Army, who the gentleman says are entitled to no special consideration from this House. But now, because the Commissioners have thus departed from the intention of the statute, the gentleman proposes to give them wider liberty. Because they do not keep the law as it is now written on the statute-book we will repeal it and substitute a clause which is more lenient and will give to them a wider discretion.

Now, before we increase their power in this respect, I say let us not give them rule over more things in the face of the declaration of the chairman of the committee that they have not been faithful over a few.

The gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX,] whom I always delight to see on the floor, who adorns every subject which he touches with the flight of his fancy and the richness of his imagination——

Mr. COX, of New York. You do not mean me.

Mr. ROBESON. I mean the gentleman who has now interrupted me, and I am not sorry to be able to pay him that tribute. But I trust he will not lose all regard for mere facts in following the corruscations of his own brilliant genius. [Laughter.]

Mr. COX, of New York. What has that to do with this question?

Mr. ROBESON. Nothing at all. [Laughter.] It has nothing to do with the question and nothing to do with the subject. If it had anything to do with the question or anything to do with the subject it would not be an apt reply to the gentleman's speech. [Laughter.]

Mr. COX, of New York. Why then does the gentleman make irrelevant speeches? [Laughter.]

Mr. ROBESON. Now, my friend says he belonged to the "Home Brigade" during the war. I will say that I was myself unfitted by physical difficulty, if not by personal inclination, from entering into the field, and belonged to the same corps; but in those positions which I had the honor to occupy, and upon those fields where I did wield influence, all I had of power and strength and substance was given to sustaining the armies of the Union in the field and supporting their cause before the people and the world. Did the gentleman belong to that particular "Home Brigade?"

Mr. COX, of New York. In reply to the gentleman from New Jersey, Mr. Speaker, I will say that I belonged to the party which the record will show voted for all the money and men to sustain this Government, and the gentleman, who has been prominent in public affairs, knows I voted a good deal of money that was misspent, [laughter,] but nevertheless I never complained of that in a great emergency.

Mr. ROBESON. I am not impugning the personal patriotism of the gentleman, but if he seeks to prove it before the people of this country he will do well to rest upon his individual action, and not upon the conduct and influence of the party with which he was associated.

Now, then, Mr. Speaker, we have been through a great war. We came out from it bleeding but victorious, discharging into the body of the country a million men armed with the weapons of war and accustomed to the looseness of military life. They went abroad into our country and were dispersed along the thousand pathways of life, to regain their status as workingmen and producers in the community, and our country absorbed them without effort or shock. We presented a spectacle which challenges rivalry or comparison from the history of any other country in the world, and is approached only, if approached at all, by the conditions which obtained when Cromwell's Ironsides were disbanded and scattered among the people of England, and were afterward, as the great historian tells us, pointed to with pride when an honest burgher or industrious mechanic was recognized. "That peaceful citizen served in the army of Cromwell." But they brought back into the body of their country none of the license of ribald soldiery and none of the inclination which grows upon men who are bearing arms to overstep or trample upon the laws and liberties of the people.

So at the end of this great rebellion we poured out into our country a million such men, as deserving as any who have ever served a great cause since the world began. We are engaged every day here in passing laws for pensions to support all those who are now found to be incapable of supporting themselves and families by honest industry. And we have always provided as far as we could without taking money directly from the Treasury to ordain and regulate by our law that where this Government, which they preserved, has places of employment and of emolument such as they can fill, they shall receive those places in preference to those who took up arms against it and struck against its life, and in preference to those who, like my friend from New York and myself, did not go into actual service in the ranks.

Now, then, that is the law upon the statute-book, and that is the section which this committee comes here before this Republican House and asks to have repealed. For one I shall never vote for it.

Mr. NEAL. I protest against the gentleman from New Jersey misrepresenting the action of the committee.

Mr. ROBESON. The gentleman may protest, but I point him to the record, and when that committee comes in here and asks to have this section repealed and their attention is called to it they say "No, we do not quite repeal it, but we will repeal it and substitute for it a provision which will leave this matter in the discretion of these commissioners," who out of the gentleman's own mouth have been shown here to-day to discriminate against the volunteer soldiery of this country.

Now, then, Mr. Speaker, I say it is our duty to vote down this measure to strike out and insert—that is a parliamentary proceeding—and then clearly and directly to strike out the second section, thus leaving the Revised Statutes exactly as they are.

Mr. COX, of New York. Mr. Speaker, I shall only occupy the time of the House for a moment——

Mr. NEAL. I want to correct the gentleman from New Jersey about facts.

Mr. COX, of New York. I want to correct the gentleman from New Jersey too. [Laughter.] Why the gentleman from New Jersey on every occasion should be so aggressive on the Democratic side without reason or occasion is more than I am able to explain. Why should the gentleman choose to call my personal record into question here on a mere matter connected with the police of the District of Columbia I do not know. Certainly it has no relevancy to the question. I discussed the matter pertinently. I endeavored to throw what sensible light I could on the municipal question; but the gentleman from New Jersey comes here and opens a tirade of abuse against the war, the memories of which ought to be buried forever. It is an old Roman saying that no trophies survive from the civil war. Time buries them, and for a reason. It is healing. Let no trophies of civil conflict survive the terrible and bloody division between two great communities in this country. We should, in justice to ourselves and in justice to the future, make no invidious distinctions and revive no revenges after the restoration of unity and concord.

Does the gentleman from New Jersey claim that it is in the interest of a good police system for this city—the purpose for which we are legislating—to maintain the sentimental statute which he would preserve? This Committee on the District of Columbia comes here and asks, in the interest of a good police system, that this statute should be so amended as to give discretion to those having charge of the police of the city to select the most available men. Why not? It gives them the privilege of selecting. Why should not the selection be made irrespective of the war and its issues and soldiers? Then comes in the gentleman from New Jersey to arouse the old bloody spirit again. He would bring out the old, thrice repeated, thrice met question, the old terrible trouble. What for? Either for some purpose to be subserved at home or to irritate this side of the House, or possibly to unite the other side in the spirit of hate.

I submit, sir, that while the gentleman compliments my personal record, as a faithful representative of my Government during the war, he has not been just to my associates since the war. While I thank him personally, I cannot do it at the expense of my associates. It was my duty to make, if not the first the second speech in this House against secession. Although I sustained the soldiers in the field, and the sailors on the sea, and voted immense sums of money to sustain them; although I may reproach myself for voting some of that money, because of its misuse, I did vote it all. I did all I could as a member of Congress, then from a Western State here, in behalf of the Union and its unexampled polity and government. This House is now unlike that during the war. It is now made up of members from all the States and sections, and all obnoxious distinctions should cease.

I am not here now to challenge the patriotism of any man who is to be selected for mere police duty. Moreover, Mr. Speaker, this House has settled our future relations to the dead confederacy. This was done when this House was largely Democratic. I think it was some six years ago when it passed the following resolutions presented by myself:

Resolved, That the people of the United States constitute a nation in the sense to the extent, and for the purpose defined in the Federal Constitution.

Resolved, That the Government of the United States is a Federal Union and was formed by the people of the several States in their sovereign capacity; that the rights and powers of the United States Government are defined and limited by the Federal Constitution, and these rights and powers cannot be enlarged or diminished except by an amendment to the Constitution.

Resolved—

All the Democrats voting for it; and many intelligent and just Republicans voting along with them—

That the rights of States have the same sanction of security in the Constitution as the rights and powers of the Federal Government; and that local domestic government by the several States, within the limits of the Constitution, is absolutely necessary for the preservation of the liberties of the citizen and the continuance of a republican system of government.

This resolution which I offered embodies my own belief in the State and Federal relations. These are the sentiments of every honest man who loves the country in its entirety and desires to bury its saddest, direst trial.

Resolved, That the doctrine that any State has the right to secede from the Union is in conflict with the idea of a perpetual Union as contemplated by the Constitution, and should be regarded as being forever extinguished by the result of the recent conflict.

Why not, Mr. Speaker, allow this oblivion to remain? Why disinter the hates which it buried? Some gentlemen smile. Why smile? It is not a happy smile. Would you have voted against it? Oh, no! Many of the gentlest gentlemen on that side voted for it, and every Democrat on this side of the House gave it his sincere sanction. It was a second Declaration of Independence. It made new devotion to our best emotions, and from all sections. It made secession forever obsolete. Cannot we stand on that? Must we resurrect it to make new revenges?

Having purified secession of its troubles and miseries, having stamped it out of existence forever, and by the consent of its devotees, are we to summon its ghost on every occasion, whenever some man whose record needs strengthening comes here to invoke the bad passions of sectionalism and the spites and diabolism which sometimes—alas! too often—result from civil strife?

I trust, in the name of that Heavenly Father whom we revere and who pardons even the worst criminals, even the thief upon the cross—I trust there is goodness enough on that side of the House to affirm and reaffirm this resolution whenever these malcontents in Congress bring up this question on matters so insignificant as a Washington police bill.

Mr. HOLMAN rose.

Mr. NEAL. I regret very much that, as the gentleman from New York has said, so insignificant a matter as the appointment of policemen should have invoked such a political discussion as this. I have been in the habit of following the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROBESON] to a very great extent, having confidence in his judgment when he knows what the facts are; but when he does not know the facts then I do not think his judgment is entitled to be followed by any person.

What, then, are the facts? And I should be glad if the gentleman from New Jersey, who has misrepresented the chairman of this committee and other members upon this floor, will pay attention to the law. Section 340 of the code of the District of Columbia provides that—

> The police force shall consist of the following officers, namely: one major * * * and such number of privates, not exceeding two hundred for the regular service, as the board may deem necessary.

Then section 354 provides that—

> No person shall be appointed to office or hold office in the police force who cannot read and write the English language, or who is not a citizen of the United States, or who shall ever have been indicted and convicted of crime; and no person shall be appointed as policeman or watchman who has not served in the Army or Navy of the United States and received an honorable discharge.

That law applies to the two hundred men now on the police force. So far as they are concerned we do not propose to strike that down or interfere with any one of these provisions.

Mr. ROBESON. Will the gentleman permit me right here——

Mr. NEAL. For a question; nothing more.

Mr. ROBESON. Merely for a question. Are not these policemen dischargeable at the will, day by day, of the commissioners, and are they not put out every day and every week?

Mr. NEAL. No, sir; they are not.

Mr. ROBESON. Are they appointed for a particular term, or for a life term?

Mr. NEAL. They are appointed substantially for a life term.

Mr. ROBESON. I am asking how it is, not substantially, but legally?

Mr. NEAL. Legally, they are appointed during the pleasure of the commissioners.

Mr. ROBESON. And may be turned out, all of them, to-morrow, if the commissioners choose?

Mr. NEAL. But they are appointed substantially for life. There is no policeman, except for dereliction of duty, when he has been tried and convicted, that has ever been discharged since I have been a member of the Committee on the District of Columbia that I have knowledge of.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. NEAL. Yes, sir.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. If this measure shall pass, would you not be clothing the commissioners with power to drive every soldier out of the police force, and make the entire force of three hundred to be composed of men who were not in the Army or Navy at all?

Mr. NEAL. I suppose they might have that power. But I will say to the gentleman that this does not apply to the old policemen at all. The provision here is as to the one hundred additional. It is expressly limited to them.

Mr. ATKINS. I desire to ask the gentleman one question. By how many policemen does this bill increase the force?

Mr. NEAL. It adds one hundred. Now, Mr. Speaker, here are the facts in regard to the discipline. I will state the number cited before the trial board of the police force. For desertion, one; for gross neglect of duty, six; for insubordination, one; for intoxication, three; for intoxication on duty, five; for neglect of duty, thirteen; for miscellaneous violations of rules and regulations, forty-five.

Here is what the commissioners say in regard to members of the force whose efficiency has been impaired by their many years of active duty:

> They have been faithful and untiring in the performance of the work assigned to them, and are willing to-day to attempt, at least, the same amount of duty which the younger and more able-bodied men are better able to execute. But their age renders their service, to a certain degree, inefficient, and their places should be filled by men whose quick, sharp perceptions are needed in the prevention of crime and in the detection of the criminals when crime has been committed. At the same time it would be a positive wrong to remove these men after twenty years' faithful service without making some provision for their old age.

I want to say, Mr. Speaker, to the credit of the present board of commissioners, who are appointed and removable by the President of the United States, whose ear my friend from New Jersey has perhaps as closely as any member of this House, these men, during the time I have been a member of the District Committee in the Forty-sixth and in this present Congress, have not discharged, so far as I know, one single policeman for anything except for inefficiency in the discharge of duty.

The gentleman from New Jersey says the committee have tried to strike down this provision. We are not trying to do anything of the kind. If there is any single sentence of that amendment which interferes in any respect with the two hundred policemen that are now on duty, or which authorizes the filling of any vacancies which may occur on the present force that will justify anything like the striking down of that provision of law, let the gentleman from New Jersey point it out, and I will at once move an amendment. But it does appear to me that for the efficiency of this service a discretion should be vested in the commissioners to select men who may not have belonged to the Army and Navy, if by so doing they can make a more efficient service. Let any man who favors this come here and tell me what was the fact in regard to his own city and town. I undertake to say there is not a city or town in the United States, whether east or west, north or south, where any such provision is in force as in this. If so, it is a very small one.

I move the previous question.

Mr. ROBESON. I desire to say a few words.

Mr. HOLMAN. I was recognized I believe by the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognized the gentleman from Indiana only on the supposition that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. NEAL] yielded to him for a question. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield?

Mr. NEAL. I withdraw the demand for the previous question.

Mr. HOLMAN. This bill contains two provisions. One increases the police force of this District from two hundred to three hundred policemen, thereby adding about one hundred thousand dollars annually to the expense of this force. If I am mistaken about this I hope the gentleman from Ohio will correct me.

Mr. NEAL. What is the statement?

Mr. HOLMAN. This bill increases the police force from two hundred to three hundred persons, and increases the annual expense of that force by about one hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. NEAL. By $75,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. Seventy-five thousand dollars?

Mr. NEAL. Yes.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am glad to be corrected. Now, on that point, judging from all the opportunities which present themselves to casual residents of this city, I think the present force is very ample, and that there is no public reason why the force should be increased.

The second section of this bill is more remarkable. The law, as it now stands, has stood for a number of years, contains this very proper provision:

> No person shall be appointed as policeman or watchman who has not served in the Army or Navy of the United States, and received an honorable discharge.

It is proposed by the second section of this bill to repeal that provision; to repeal it, and that, too, in a House of Representatives controlled by the Republican party. I have very seldom had occasion to refer to the political differences here, but I cannot refrain from doing so in considering such an extraordinary provision as this. The Democrats had control of this House for six years, with ample majorities and ample opportunities, and for a time the control of both House and Senate, yet a proposition to strike down this provision, made in behalf of the Union soldiers and sailors, has never been suggested before, so far as I am informed. It had to wait, so far as the police force of this District is concerned, until the party came into power which professes to monopolize all the loyalty of the country before a measure could be brought forward for the repeal of this law, and it is brought forward at the first session after this party again came into the control of both House and Senate.

What will be the effect of this section striking down this provision in behalf of the Union soldiers and sailors and leaving it discretionary with the three commissioners of this District? It will be simply to supplant the Union soldier and the sailor, and to put local politicians in their places on the police force. Those places pay very well. The salaries range from $900 to $1,000 for the privates on the force and ample salaries for the officers, and they are very desirable positions for men who are even partially disabled, adding very materially in some instances to the small pensions which some of these veterans may have for the support of their families.

At this time there are in this District and in every State of the Union men who served the Government bravely and well during the war for the Union, and who are amply qualified to fill these places. Many of them are poor and need such positions. They are now entitled to these police offices by law, and it is now proposed that they shall not enjoy this right, but that these three commissioners of the District, not one of whom, so far as I am aware, has ever been identified with the volunteer military service, shall have the right to turn them out of office, to supplant them by the appointment of others. I am opposed to that. I am in favor of this law just as it stands. These places are in the main easily filled, in some degree sinecures; pleasant, easy places in a pleasant, quiet city, and well paid, running down from the office of major to privates with $900 a year. I am not willing by any vote of mine that the men who imperiled their lives in defense of the Union shall be deprived of the offices they hold under this law. I am not willing that the law which gives them those offices to the exclusion of others shall be repealed. I am not willing that these three elegant gentlemen who compose the board of commissioners of this District shall have it in their power to displace these men and put their favorites and politicians in their places.

I apprehend that one object of this proposed repeal may be this: these soldiers on the police force in this District are not all Republicans, they are not all Democrats; some of them are Republicans and some of them are Democrats. In making up such a force like this, where soldiers must be appointed, it is very likely that some Democratic soldiers have obtained employment, for the Union Army was composed of Republicans and Democrats alike patriotic and devoted to their country. I do not wish to see either the Republican soldiers or the Democratic soldiers turned out of office.

Now, by a repeal of this provision of the statutes it is proposed to put it in the power of these commissioners to remove all those men and put the favorites of the commissioners in their places. I am opposed to it. Gentlemen cannot escape the responsibility by saying that it is left discretionary with the commissioners. Will those commissioners give the soldiers the preference? What has been the experience under similar provisions of law scattered all over your statute-books? The experience has been, in matter of appointment, where a discretion was left that the advantages were obtained by civilians, not by men who had served in your Army and Navy, for the reason that the politician is on the alert for office, and your Army and Navy were in the main filled by laboring-men not accustomed to the methods of obtaining office.

Mr. COOK. Will the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes.

Mr. COOK. If the same provision applied to the honorable gentleman from Indiana and to other members here who have not served in the Army or Navy, where would he be?

Mr. HOLMAN. I think that neither my friend from Georgia nor myself would be here unless for sufficient reasons our constituents thought our services would be of value. I am speaking of the appointing power.

Mr. ROBESON. Will the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] allow me to ask the gentleman from Georgia a question?

Mr. HOLMAN. A question simply.

Mr. ROBESON. The gentleman from Georgia was a gallant soldier in the late war. I wish to ask him whether, if he had been wounded, he would come here and ask for a pension? That is the distinction I make. Nobody will deny to me the credit, if credit it is, that I am ready to yield to our Southern brethren who engaged in the last war every right that they have to the very last feather; I am ready to concede everything of personal feeling or of personal concession. But when they come here and ask favors of the Government, we reserve them for our own soldiers and do not feel that we ought to give them to the soldiers on the other side.

Mr. HOLMAN. I cannot yield further.

Mr. COOK. I hope the gentleman will yield to allow me to answer the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ROBESON.]

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to proceed without interruption. I will answer him myself.

Mr. COOK. I want to say this: that in the time I have been here, in the nearly ten years that I have served in this House, except in one or two instances, there never has been a member on the other side of the House or on this who himself had served in the Army on that side, who has ever offered any insult or indignity to any soldier or man who served in the confederate service. It is only that class of gentlemen whose courage and patriotism kept them far in the rear during the war who now come to the front and seek to insult us and annoy us whenever they can do so. The loyal men on that side who fought in the Army—not like some gentlemen who never saw a rebel during the war unless the poor fellow was in prison—the loyal men on that side are not the men who now come forward in time of peace when our arms are laid down and seek on every possible occasion that presents itself to rise up here and say what they did for the country. We have by our legislation removed two planks from the platform of the Republican party—the Chinese plank and the Mormon plank; and now, after we are done with the "bloody shirt" and the question of disloyal claims, I do not know what some gentlemen will have to bank upon as political capital, certainly not any service that they have rendered to their country during the war.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I have not yielded for a speech. I intended to answer the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. COOK] by saying that he holds his place here by virtue of the votes of his people and as their Representative. I hold my position by the same right. But I do not see how his question or the discussion between himself and the gentleman from New Jersey could be pertinent to this discussion. The existing provisions of law giving to Union soldiers and sailors the right to form this police force—a law which Congress had the power to enact—it is proposed to repeal. That is the question and the only question before the House. I am opposed to the repeal. I am opposed to this bill, because it increased unnecessarily the expenses of the District of Columbia to be paid in part out of the public Treasury. I am assured by a gentleman well informed on the subject, and who has been identified with the government of this city, that the increase of expense will be $100,000. I undertake to say, judging from the experience of other cities, that the police force now employed in this city is ample, and there is no excuse or justification for adding to the expenses of the District $100,000.

In addition to that, I will not consent either by my vote or by my silence that the Union soldiers and seamen who by law are now entitled to fill this police force shall be placed at the mercy of three District commissioners to be turned out at their pleasure. No Union soldier shall leave that police force by my vote. These three gentlemen who compose your District commission shall never have it in their power by my vote to say that men who have been honorably discharged from the Army and Navy of the Union shall not hold the positions guaranteed to them by existing law. [Applause.] The pretense that these men are too old to render efficient service is too ridiculous to require answer. These places are easily filled, in some instances almost sinecures; and the salaries, high as they are, have been acquiesced in as a merited compensation to men who have imperiled their lives in the service of the Republic.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. I wish to ask the gentleman a question. Suppose there were two applicants for a policeman's place, one a discharged Federal soldier, the other a man of twenty-five years of age, the son of a dead Federal soldier. Upon what principle would the gentleman legislate the young man out of office to get the old man in?

Mr. HOLMAN. Legislate him out? There is no proposition of that kind.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. But it is proposed not to let the young man get in because he never was in the Army. Now, upon what principle will you make a law giving a preference to the old man over the young man? Where in the Constitution have you any authority for making that particular qualification for holding office in this District?

Mr. HOLMAN. Well, there is no limitation upon the power of Congress in legislating for this District; and if the old man who served his country, who bore the flag of the Republic during war, is holding a position, and his son of twenty-five years of age wants to crowd him out, I would not give the son the opportunity.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. Not his son. In the case I put, I supposed one of the applicants to be the son of a Federal soldier who had been killed in the war.

Mr. HOLMAN. Here is a soldier who has suffered the hardships of war, and is now holding the office of policeman; and another man who has not suffered the perils and hardships of war wants his place. That is the case as I understand the gentleman from Georgia. I say the soldier who bore the burden and heat of the war should not be turned out for the benefit of the man who did not, although the son of a soldier.

Mr. NEAL. I want to know whether the gentleman since he has been in Congress has ever heard of any Union soldier being turned out of the police force here?

Mr. HOLMAN. There is no opportunity, I think, under this law.

Mr. NEAL. Why?

Mr. HOLMAN. How could it be?

Mr. NEAL. Does not the law authorize the commissioners to dismiss policemen at their pleasure?

Mr. HOLMAN. At their pleasure?

Mr. NEAL. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOLMAN. Do they not have to appoint soldiers in their places?

Mr. NEAL. Has the gentleman ever known them to turn out a Union soldier?

Mr. HOLMAN. I have never had occasion to inquire into the matter. I cannot see what motive the commissioners would have to dismiss one soldier who is discharging properly the duties of a policeman for the purpose simply of putting in another soldier. But I do not propose to put it in the power of these commissioners to displace these men. I do not propose to give them the discretion to do it. The existing provision of law seems to me wise and proper; and for my part I am perfectly content with it. These veterans fill these places very well, and I do not wish to invest any commission, however reputable, with the power to remove them while they are able to perform their duties and do perform them faithfully. Let the roll of this force be a soldiers' roll. I think the present law is good enough, wise enough, patriotic enough; and I think the proposed amendments are not.

Mr. NEAL. I am sorry the gentleman cannot answer a question categorically.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have answered it.

Mr. NEAL. I ask have you ever heard of such a case?

Mr. HOLMAN. I have not inquired into the subject.

Mr. NEAL. Have you ever heard of such a case; say yes or no.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will not answer it when put in that way. All I will say to the gentleman is that if he wishes to remove these Union soldiers from that force let him pass this bill.

Mr. NEAL. I wish to ask the gentleman from Indiana a question. Does he know whether there is a Union soldier on the police force?

Mr. HOLMAN. I know nothing about it except what the law provides. I take it for granted these commissioners have not violated the law. If they had violated the law I think we would have heard of it before this time.

Mr. NEAL. Will the gentleman vote for an amendment of this character: that all policemen now upon the police force of the city who have not served in the volunteer service of the United States during the war of 1861–'65 and were not honorably discharged therefrom shall be forthwith discharged therefrom, and hereafter no person shall be appointed thereto who has not served and received an honorable discharge as aforesaid?

Mr. HOLMAN. Is not that the law now?

Mr. NEAL. No; it is not the law now.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. You confine it to the volunteer service.

Mr. NEAL. Certainly.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have no objection to that; I see no reason to oppose that. Will the gentleman now let me ask him a question?

Mr. NEAL. Certainly.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is the soldier who served in the volunteer force entitled to any greater consideration on the score of patriotism than the man who rendered the same kind of service in the regular Army? The gentleman does not think it proper to answer my question. I will put the question again to the gentleman from Ohio in this form——

Mr. NEAL. I beg the gentleman's pardon, I was interrupted and did not hear his question.

Mr. HOLMAN. Suppose one soldier served during the period of the war in the volunteer Army and was honorably discharged, and another was in the service during the period of the war and also honorably discharged from the regular Army, does the gentleman from Ohio wish to discriminate between them? Were they not equally American citizens and American soldiers, and are they not equally entitled to the honor of the country?

Mr. NEAL. Certainly.

Mr. HOLMAN. Why do you then wish to discriminate between them?

Mr. NEAL. I will tell the gentleman why. The appointees on the police force now are, to a very great extent, as I understand from the commissioners themselves, confined to persons who have served since the war in the Army and Navy of the United States. It is that class of persons who, I claim, are not entitled to any consideration in the American Congress. The police force is not made up of the Union soldiers to whom the gentleman refers.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have no objection to the gentleman's amendment as he read it.

Mr. STEELE. Have not the commissioners adopted a rule which practically excludes Union soldiers of the late war from the police force, in the first place by declaring they must have a residence here of two years, and in the next place they shall be under forty years of age?

Mr. HOLMAN. Why did not the gentleman from Ohio repeal those provisions?

Mr. NEAL. I will answer.

Mr. STEELE. I should like to have the gentleman answer. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. NEAL. It is true there is a regulation which has been in force long before the appointment of the present commissioners. It was adopted when General Ketcham of New York Governor Denison of Ohio, and Captain Phelps of this city, three of as self-sacrificing Republicans as there are anywhere in the United States, were commissioners of this District. They made that regulation because from experience of mankind persons under forty years of age are found to make better policemen than those who are older. In addition to that, it has been the policy of the commissioners of the District, and has been ever since I have had any knowledge of District affairs, to keep in office policemen once appointed until they have been incapacitated by age or disease from discharging their duties.

In addition to that persons incapacitated from active duty are provided for otherwise, by being made station-keepers or put on some light duty, so that their services are not dispensed with entirely.

Mr. STEELE. Let me ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. NEAL. Not now. I want to answer the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HOLMAN. I want to ask the gentleman from Ohio another question. Does he propose to repeal the rule which requires policemen to be under forty years of age?

Mr. NEAL. I have not proposed anything of the kind.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does not the gentleman from Ohio know that if he passes this bill, as now proposed, repealing the clause requiring the appointment of soldiers, and leaving this provision that they shall be under forty years of age, that it shuts out nearly every soldier who served in the late war?

Mr. NEAL. I cannot make the gentleman from Indiana understand that this bill does not interfere with a single soldier or appointee who is over forty years of age.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is just what I am complaining of. You allow that rule to remain untouched. The very effect of the rule will be to exclude every soldier who happens to be over forty years of age.

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Speaker, I will endeavor to explain this in such a way that I think the gentleman cannot avoid understanding it. The police authorities appoint no man who is over forty years of age, but they do not turn out a man who has been appointed and served until after he has reached the age of forty.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is exactly as I stated; what I have complained of is you allow the old rule adopted by the commissioners to stand, and make no provision for its repeal, and yet you tell me that a soldier who may happen to be forty-five, fifty, fifty-five, or sixty years of age is not able to serve this city as a policeman, when the fact is well known that the police force is full of sinecures.

Mr. NEAL. Full of what?

Mr. HOLMAN. Sinecures; and there is scarcely a soldier who served in the late war who is not amply qualified physically and otherwise to fill the place, although the great majority of them are over forty years of age, as the gentleman well knows.

Mr. NEAL. If the gentleman from Indiana will show me a single sinecure position on the entire police force of this city I will bring in a bill to have the position abolished.

Mr. HOLMAN. Why, the gentleman must know that in the very nature of things there are many of them. In fact, the very office itself is a sinecure in a measure. Here is a quiet country and town over which their duties extend; a peaceable, law-abiding population with two hundred policemen. A large body of that number, from the very necessity of things, cannot be employed at all. There is no public necessity requiring such a large force of men; and yet, notwithstanding that fact, the gentleman brings in a bill here to increase the number to three hundred men and turns the soldiers out.

Mr. NEAL. The gentleman from Indiana has shown exactly what is the trouble with a great many members on this floor, that he does not know anything about the question he is discussing. [Laughter.] He talks about sinecures on the police force. I will say to the gentleman that there is no city in the United States where policemen are worked so hard as they are here. In this city there is one policeman for about every one thousand people, while in other cities, so far as I have examined, the proportion is, perhaps, one to every five hundred of population.

In New York City they have one policeman to every four hundred and fifty people. There are 2,200 policemen in New York; and in other cities, as far as I know, there is a like proportion to the population, while here in the District of Columbia there is but one policeman to every thousand people. In addition to that the police force of the District of Columbia was created at a time when the population of the city was only about eighty thousand. To-day the fixed population, without taking into account the floating population, is over one hundred and sixty thousand, and if you embrace the floating population in the numbers it is estimated that we have a population of two hundred thousand people. So the gentleman from Indiana shows that he does not understand the situation here when he talks of the place of a policeman being a sinecure, or of their not being employed.

Sir, it is well known by every one who reads the papers at all that the amount of crime here is enormous, while the number of persons arrested is necessarily small in proportion to the number of crimes committed. And that is very easily understood if gentlemen will take into consideration the fact that the present police force is inadequate to perform the duty. The result of it is that we have here the most ineffective police system in the United States. The policeman who has once passed over his beat cannot again go over it, by reason of its length, under four or five hours, and it is easy for burglars and thieves to do their work after the policeman has passed. There is substantially no protection whatever for life or property here. Another thing, this bill, as I have stated, does not interfere with the law as it now stands. The law provides for the appointment of two hundred policemen who must have been honorably discharged from the Army or Navy of the United States. This bill does not interfere with that provision, but only provides that this addition to the force may be appointed by the commissioners, preference being given to persons who have been honorably discharged from the volunteer service of the United States. That is all there is of it. There is not a city in the United States of any size that I know of where the appointment of policemen is so hampered and restricted as it is in this city. Do any of the towns or cities represented by the gentleman from New Jersey make any such restrictions? I guarantee that he cannot point me to any such provision in their laws. We do not propose to strike at the Union soldiers.

This bill was introduced by a prominent Democrat, the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. PHELPS.]

A MEMBER. And you approve of it?

Mr. NEAL. The bill, as originally introduced, contained a clause which repealed the law requiring these policemen should be honorably discharged soldiers and sailors from the Army and Navy of the United States. The Committee on the District of Columbia, without any objection on the part of any member, even of those who served honorably in the confederate army, approved of the motion made in the committee to strike out that clause and leave the present law as it now stands in regard to the appointment of the present police force; but they thought, inasmuch as we could get younger men, and abler men probably, by giving some discretion to the commissioners, they should have that discretion, but that the present law and regulations should continue as to the existing force.

Mr. ROBESON. I desire to ask the gentleman one question before he sits down. He says that this does not apply to the old force, and he founds that argument on the expression in the amendment which says that in the appointment of policemen under this act the commissioners shall give preference to soldiers. Now that provision only applies to the policemen appointed under this act; but at the same time the gentleman undertakes to repeal the section of the Revised Statutes.

Mr. NEAL. Not at all; we strike out that repealing clause. The gentleman can see for himself that is all stricken out as the bill is reported from the committee. Let the gentleman read it for himself.

Mr. ROBESON. You propose to strike out that clause and insert in its place this discretionary power.

Mr. DEZENDORF. I desire to offer an amendment to section 2, as reported by the committee, as follows:

In line 4 strike out the words "give preference to," and insert the word "appoint;" so that it will read:

"In the appointment of policemen under this act the District commissioners shall, when all other qualifications are equal, appoint those applicants who have been honorably discharged from the volunteer service of the Union Army or Navy."

Mr. ROBESON. Is that any better than the Revised Statutes as they now stand?

Mr. RYAN. That amendment is of no consequence.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. DEZENDORF] that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MILLER] is first in order. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Virginia is not in order pending the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania to that portion of the recommendation of the committee which proposes to strike out section 2 and insert a new section. The Clerk will read the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the section the following:

"Provided, That the commissioners of the District shall not be permitted to make any rule or regulation as to age or residence that will discriminate against honorably discharged soldiers and sailors of the Union Army and Navy."

Mr. NEAL. I move the previous question on the bill and amendments.

Mr. URNER. Before that is done I ask unanimous consent to insert the words "or Navy" after "Army." In the new section those words were inadvertently left out by the Clerk.

Mr. ROBESON. I move to strike out section 2 of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that would not be in order now.

Mr. ROBESON. I move that as a substitute to the proposition of the committee. The committee propose to strike out that section and insert another. I propose to strike it out.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. NEAL] demands the previous question on the bill and pending amendments, the understanding being that the amendment recommended by the committee, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. MILLER,] and the substitute offered by the gentleman from New Jersey are pending.

Mr. URNER. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. URNER. The gentleman from New Jersey moves to strike out the second section of the bill as referred to the committee. I want to know whether that section is before the House. The committee report in favor of striking that out and recommend a substitute.

The SPEAKER. The committee merely recommend striking out that section, but it is still before the House.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is first on the substitute offered by the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ROBESON.]

Mr. CAMP. Is it not necessary to perfect the original text first?

Mr. NEAL. I would inquire whether voting down the amendment suggested by the committee would not answer the same purpose as voting on the substitute offered by the gentleman from New Jersey?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the one proposition is to strike out the section and insert; the other is to strike out absolutely. The question is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey by way of substitute for the pending amendment, the proposition of the gentleman fom New Jersey being to strike out section 2 of the original bill.

The question being taken on Mr. ROBESON's substitute; there were—ayes 56, noes 58.

Mr. ROBESON. I call for the yeas and nays.

On the question of ordering the yeas and nays there were ayes 38.

So (the affirmative being more than one-fifth of the last vote) the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DUNNELL. Will the Chair state what is the question?

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROBESON] to strike out section 2 of the original bill.

Mr. NEAL. I ask what will be the effect if that motion prevails. Will not the vote then properly come on the substitute offered by the committee?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will decide that question when it is reached.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 104, nays 77, not voting 110; as follows:

Mr. KELLEY with Mr. UPSON.
Mr. RANNEY with Mr. WILLIAMS of Alabama.
Mr. SCALES with Mr. ERRETT.
Mr. BINGHAM with Mr. CLARK.

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

The SPEAKER. The question is now upon the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MILLER] to the amendment reported from the committee.

Mr. NEAL. Let the amendment be reported.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will first read the proposed section reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The Clerk read as follows:

In the appointment of policemen under this act the District commissioners shall, when all other qualifications and claims are equal, appoint those applicants who have been honorably discharged from the volunteer service of the United States Army or Navy. No appointment shall be made to the police force of any person who has not been a resident of the District for three months immediately preceding his appointment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now report the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. MILLER.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Add the following:

"Provided, That the commissioners of the District of Columbia shall not be permitted to make any rule or regulation as to age or residence that will discriminate against honorably discharged soldiers or sailors of the United States Army and Navy."

The question was taken upon the amendment to the amendment, and it was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs upon the proposed section as amended.

Mr. ROBESON. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ROBESON. Was not my proposition, which has just been sustained by the House, a substitute for the proposition of the Committee on the District of Columbia?

The SPEAKER. The proposition of the gentleman from New Jersey, which has been adopted by the House, acts simply to strike out section 2. Had that not been adopted, the question would now have been upon the motion to strike out and insert the section proposed by the committee. The motion of the gentleman from New Jersey having been adopted, that does not cut off the right to insert a new section.

Mr. ROBESON. The motion of the committee was to strike out and insert, which motion was not divisible.

The SPEAKER. It was not divisible.

Mr. ROBESON. I moved as a substitute for that motion to strike out the section entirely, and my motion has been adopted.

The SPEAKER. And the section has been stricken out; that is therefore at an end. The right to insert a new section still remains, if the House chooses to vote it in, although the question will not now be presented to the House in the form in which it was reported from the committee.

The question was taken upon agreeing to the proposed section as amended; and upon a division there were—ayes 26, noes 47.

Mr. WISE, of Virginia, and Mr. KLOTZ called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

So the proposed section was not agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. NEAL. I call the previous question on the passage of the bill.

Mr. McLANE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Is not a motion to recommit in order?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. NEAL] has demanded the previous question; the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. McLANE] may make his motion pending that demand.

Mr. McLANE. I would like the attention of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. NEAL.] I propose to move that this bill be recommitted.

Mr. NEAL. Let us pass it or defeat it, one or the other.

Mr. ROBESON. It will have no opposition now.

Mr. JACOBS. I would like to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield?

Mr. NEAL. No, sir; I do not.

Mr. JACOBS. The gentleman has said all the while that he wanted this qualification of two years' residence corrected.

Mr. NEAL. I will withdraw the demand for the previous question, and give up the management of this bill to some other gentleman.

Mr. JACOBS. I desire to offer an amendment to the first section of the bill.

Mr. McLANE. I have not withdrawn the motion to recommit. I desire the gentleman from Ohio to give me his attention.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio has withdrawn his demand for the previous question.

Mr. McLANE. The motion to recommit, with or without instructions, would be in order, I understand, even after the ordering of the previous question. I do not suppose that the gentleman from Ohio, although he shows some impatience at the opposition this bill has received, will object to our sending it back to his committee, that he may have the opportunity——

Mr. DUNNELL. Let the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. JACOBS] be read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the proposed amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the first section of the bill by adding, after the word "force," in the last line, the words "there shall be hereafter no limitation or restriction of place of residence as to any member of the police force, any law to the contrary notwithstanding.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that as the bill has been engrossed and read a third time, it cannot now be amended except by unanimous consent.

Mr. NEAL. Then I object.

Mr. McLANE. I now move to recommit the bill to the Committee on the District of Columbia. As the previous question has not been ordered——

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I move to amend the motion of the gentleman from Maryland, by adding——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. VAN VOORHIS] will permit the gentleman from Maryland to state his motion.

Mr. McLANE. I desire to say, Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his motion.

Mr. McLANE. I suppose it is in order for me to make any remarks I please upon the motion to recommit, the previous question not having been ordered.

Mr. ROBESON. Is the motion to recommit debatable?

Mr. McLANE. I propose to move to recommit with instructions. That motion is debatable; and I want to say to the gentleman from New Jersey——

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I rise to a point of order. When the motion of the gentleman from Maryland has been stated I desire to move to amend it.

The SPEAKER. When the gentleman from Maryland yields the floor that will be in order.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. My point of order is that he has not the floor for the purpose of debate.

The SPEAKER. Under what rule?

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I think I can refer the Chair to the rule.

Mr. McLANE. I move to recommit the bill to the Committee on the District of Columbia with instructions to provide that when discharged soldiers or sailors of the Union cannot be obtained, the commissioners shall then have authority to appoint whomsoever they please. [Cries of "Oh, no!"]

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not mean to take exception to the attitude in which the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROBESON] has placed the House, nor to impugn his motives, nor to resent the very ungraceful manner in which he has berated this side of the House.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. Is the motion debatable?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. McLANE. Carried away by his old war fervor, the gentleman from New Jersey chose to make a discrimination between the honorable gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] personally and the party with which he is associated. He was not on that occasion more logical or more serious than is his habit. For one, I feel that the party with which the honorable gentleman from New York is associated is quite as much entitled to the respect of the gentleman from New Jersey as the honorable gentleman from New York is personally; and I know very well that the honorable gentleman from New York sympathizes with me in that sentiment.

Throughout this whole proceeding I have not forgotten that under the law by which discharged soldiers and sailors may become policemen many more Democrats than Republicans are likely to be appointed.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. How do you make that out?

Mr. MILLER. Why did you not vote to strike out that section?

Mr. McLANE. I will tell you. Because I have some respect for my responsibility as a member of this House. [Laughter and applause.] I understand, Mr. Speaker, this Congress is charged with the responsibility of governing the District of Columbia, and I cannot imagine a greater dereliction of duty than the principle stated here by the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ROBESON.] And I am only sorry my friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] followed so bad an example. And I say, Mr. Speaker, that the motive which might lead an honorable gentleman on this side to follow that example is no more respectable than the motive which induced the gentleman from New Jersey in his opposition to the bill.

Mr. ROBESON. The gentlemen will pardon me.

Mr. HOLMAN. Allow me to make an explanation.

Mr. ROBESON. I did not hear exactly what the gentleman said.

Mr. McLANE. I will repeat it.

Mr. ROBESON. Do if you please.

Mr. McLANE. I say I can very well understand the motive which induced the honorable gentleman from Indiana to follow the example of my friend from New Jersey was not more respectable than the original motive.

Mr. ROBESON. Does the gentleman call me his friend from New Jersey and say my motive was not reputable? Is that what the gentleman means?

Mr. McLANE. I do not feel, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. ROBESON. My objection is that a gentleman because he does not agree with me in parliamentary policy should assume to lecture me on motives and say my action puts him in an unpleasant position. I know it does.

Mr. McLANE. Before I answer I will withdraw the term "my friend from New Jersey." [Laughter.]

Mr. ROBESON. And I am glad the gentleman does it before he repeats an expression unauthorized as that.

Mr. McLANE. Very well. Now I withdraw the term, the designation of my friend from New Jersey, if I am taking an unauthorized or improper liberty in adopting it, and I now allude to the honorable gentleman from New Jersey. [Laughter.] He stands here to-day in the open sunlight of observation, and when his motive is transparent why should I not perceive it? How can I avoid perceiving it? And perceiving it, why may not I express it? I am entirely responsible for the expression of it, whether I give offense or not. If I have perceived the motive correctly, I ought not to give offense. The gentleman from New Jersey is not so immaculate, nor, I suppose, are any of us, that we may not sometimes be influenced by motives not strictly those which ought to guide us in the discharge of our responsible duty. And the point of the interruption of the honorable gentleman in front of the gentleman from New Jersey, whom I am not able to designate by his State—— [Laughter.]

A MEMBER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MILLER. I will call over and introduce myself.

Mr. McLANE. He asked me why I did not vote for it? I told him because I felt my responsibility as a member of this House; and that I think respectable. And when I depart from that and vote without reference to my responsibility as a member of this House, then I think it is not respectable. When I perceive the gentleman from New Jersey, followed in very large part by all his friends on that side of the House, because even the honorable gentleman from Ohio, who told us he could not follow him when he was not stating the facts, did before the close of the polling in this House follow him.

Mr. NEAL. I wish to correct the gentleman.

Mr. McLANE. I am glad to be corrected on that point.

Mr. NEAL. I voted to strike out, because that was right in accordance with the vote of the committee. We voted in committee to strike out and insert. When it came to inserting what the committee had reported favorably I voted for it.

Mr. McLANE. That is all right. I beg the honorable gentleman's pardon for misunderstanding his affirmative vote on the motion to strike out. I did misunderstand it.

Mr. NEAL. It was in accordance with the vote of the committee to strike that out.

Mr. McLANE. I understood that affirmative vote to yield the principle and the opinion which he had stated to the House, and to yield it to the honorable gentleman from New Jersey, when in the earlier part of the debate he said he would not follow him because he was not stating the facts of the case correctly.

Now, when the honorable gentleman from New Jersey proceeded with his objections to that second section and insisted that none but men who had been honorably discharged from the Army of the United States or its Navy should be appointed, and when it was perfectly apparent to me and to every member of this House that that might have for its result an inability to appoint at all, and leave the city without a police force, I did say that the gentleman from New Jersey was proceeding in this matter without regard to his responsibility as a member of this House, and that he was disregarding his duty to provide a police force for this city. This Congress has exclusive jurisdiction over that subject, and if this Congress does not provide a police force no power on earth can appoint it; and if any gentleman under a state of facts which makes it impossible to maintain a police force, and knowing that there is no provision for its maintenance, and knowing that a contemplated provision will effectually defeat the possibility of maintaining a police force, then I hold that he is indifferent to his obligation as a legislator for this District. That is what I meant when I said the motive was not respectable; and if I had not said it this result necessarily follows, and it certainly was not intended to be offensive.

Mr. ROBESON. If the gentleman has concluded I would like to answer him.

Mr. McLANE. I would rather not be answered here.

Mr. ROBESON. Very well; go on.

Mr. McLANE. And certainly I say it was not intended by me to be offensive; but, as I said before, using it as I did use it advisedly with reference to the results, and I had no other signification to give it, when a gentleman on either side of this House votes for a provision which, carried out to its final results, must accomplish the object I have indicated it is clear that he fails to perform his duties to this District, and if he leaves it without a police force simply because a particular character of men he desires to be appointed may not be appointed, such a condition indicates that the partisan dominates over the statesman, and never can a partisan dominate over the statesman without the loss of responsibility and respectability too.

Now, I am ready to answer the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. ROBESON. Does the gentleman yield the floor?

Mr. McLANE. I do not yield the floor, but only yield that the gentleman may answer.

Mr. ROBESON. Very well; I would rather answer now and give the gentleman a right to reply. What I desire to say is, that I have sat quietly, if not patiently, under this lecture from the gentleman from Maryland for more than one reason. First, because he is an old and experienced member of this House, who assumes often to call it and its members to order, and we feel some respect to his years, if not for his wisdom.

Second, because I think, and perhaps we all appreciate the fact, that when he rises to speak and indulges his critical taste in the application of epithets to the conduct of others, he is apt to use stronger language than he intends. That is the experience of this House, and more than one gentleman before myself has pardoned it. But I deny the gentleman's right to stand here and say that because I have resisted the repeal of a section that is upon the statute-book, and which has stood there for many years, and have resisted it in a mild and argumentative, though firm and decided manner, that I have been forgetting my responsibilities as a legislator. Let me remind the gentleman that it is a proposition the truth of which all men recognize, that those who have clear motives themselves are rarely found impugning the motives of others. [Applause on the Republican side.] And when I see a man who on every day and on every occasion is willing to express in strong language strong imputation upon the motives of others, and that without cause, it requires as much knowledge of his life and history as I have of the life and history of the gentleman from Maryland to relieve him in my mind from the effects of the principle I have stated, and which is undoubtedly a general one, but to which the gentleman may be, and I trust is, an honorable exception. But no man can say to me before this country and make me flinch from the mark one hair's breadth that I am disregarding my duties as a legislator here because I stand up and resist to the last any attempt to repeal any clause that is written upon the statute-book which looks to the honor, to the dignity, to the comfort, and to the welfare of the American soldier. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I cannot forget that when they marched from their peaceful homes to put down that great rebellion they bore on their bayonets not only the hopes and the safety of their own country and the freedom our fathers gave us, but the hopes and the destinies of freedom and the rights of men all over the world; and were it the last veto I should ever give it would be in earnest and an honest protest against anything that looked like attacking them.

This is my attitude from which I will not yield one hair, and yet while I stand in that attitude no gentleman can truthfully put me in the attitude of attacking any other people. I am not of those who would stand here and pour out the vials of abuse against those who took sides with their section in the South during the war, or who fought in its defense. But they were beaten in the arbitrament of arms to which they appealed, and the legislation of this country is, and must be, in direction and effect, in behalf of the saved country and the men who saved it. And it is no disparagement either of the character or the bravery of other men, that we insist upon standing right here in behalf of our own soldiers.

And now I will not impugn the motives of the gentleman. I understood what he meant when he said that my action had been unpleasant—I know it is unpleasant—I think that was the word.

Mr. McLANE. I used a stronger word than that.

Mr. ROBESON. The gentleman said my action had placed this House in an unpleasant position; and I think it did.

Mr. McLANE. I did not say that.

Mr. ROBESON. But if the principles and the votes of gentlemen place them in an unpleasant position it is not my fault. If the gentleman thinks he can only be true to his party by voting against the interests of the Union soldiers, I cannot help it. It is his party which puts him in that unpleasant position, not I. And when the gentleman rises to move to recommit this bill after it has received a vote, and the attempt to strike the Union soldier has been stricken out by this House I will not impugn his motive, and though it may perhaps be found in the fact that if the bill stands and passes as it now is he will not be able to employ any large numbers of men who vote in his district.

Yet it would be improper for me to impute that motive to the gentleman, and I will not do it, for I say that every man who stands here and takes his position on the floor and before the country in the exercise of his representative rights, responsible to the country and to his constituency, is entitled in the absence of proof to the contrary to be considered honest in his motives and respectable in his conduct. And therefore, in the face of much provocation to the contrary, unlike the gentleman, I yield to him the courtesy of his parliamentary position. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. McLANE. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New Jersey overlooks entirely, and it was certainly his duty not to overlook it——

Mr. ROBESON. I would rather the gentleman would not impugn my duty. Impugn my mind, impugn my manners, impugn my temper, but do not impugn my motives in the discharge of my duty.

Mr. McLANE. I shall take no liberties with the honorable gentleman from New Jersey at all.

Mr. NEAL. I rise to a question of order. Is not the question on the recommittal of this bill?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. NEAL] withdrew his demand for the previous question. The pending question is on a motion to commit, which is debatable.

Mr. GARRISON. And it is too late to make any such point now.

Mr. McLANE. The honorable gentleman from New Jersey has not only omitted all that was material in the first issue, but he has introduced some new matter which it will be my duty to notice. He spoke of my lecture, if lecture it was—I am not conscious of having given any occasion for the application of such a term. The only reason on earth I had to refer to the gentleman from New Jersey at all was that he had taken a very great liberty indeed, which he has entirely overlooked, and yet I stated it as distinctly as I was able to state it. I stated that that honorable gentleman, carried away by his feelings, carried away by his sympathy, carried away by his interest in these veterans of the war, had excluded the political associations of the gentleman from New York, had acquitted him, but had told him in distinct terms he could not do as much for his political associates.

Mr. ROBESON. Will the gentleman permit me one moment?

Mr. McLANE. No, sir; I am replying to you. I yielded all the time the gentleman desired. And when he tells the House to-day and now that he bore this lecture with patience, having given no occasion for it, I say in return to him he gave all the occasion possible. He indulged not only in a gratuitous but in a perfectly unfounded imputation on this side of the House. And now when he comes back upon me and would individualize it and give the suggestion to this House that I could be wanting in any way in sympathy for the Federal soldier or the Federal sailor, and adds to it the insinuation that I might not be so indifferent to one of my confederate constituents, I say that there again he is taking a much greater liberty with me than I am doing with him. And he has overlooked also what I said in that connection; because I told him, Mr. Speaker, that when those commissioners were obliged by law to appoint Federal soldiers and Federal sailors, they would appoint more Democrats than Republicans; and in that remark I did all that was in my power to refute what I considered calumnious if not offensive; because if the gentleman's observation had any sense at all it was that the Democratic party as an association were not entitled to the credit of loyalty, which he conceded to the gentleman from New York. Now, knowing what the gentleman knows, knowing that in his own State of New Jersey and in every other Northern State as many Democrats carried the flag as Republicans——

Mr. MILLER. Oh, no!

Mr. McLANE. I say, oh, yes!

Mr. MILLER. You did not live far enough North.

Mr. McLANE. Let the gentleman from Pennsylvania who interrupts me look at his own State, and let him say in the presence of my Democratic colleagues here, let him say in the presence of that distinguished gentleman known as the war governor of Pennsylvania, that I am not right!

Mr. MILLER. And a Republican all the time.

Mr. McLANE. And a Republican all the time; let him say in the presence of that distinguished gentleman that there were more Republicans in the Army from Pennsylvania than Democrats; let him say so.

Mr. MILLER. I venture to assert that without any fear of contradiction. And I know the fact that when they voted in the Army there were ten to one Republicans, when they voted for the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CURTIN.] I know the fact to be when the distinguished gentleman ran for governor in 1863, and when the Democracy tried to keep the soldiers in the field from voting for him, twenty to one of the soldiers' vote were cast for him there.

Mr. CURTIN. In 1863 the soldiers in the field from Pennsylvania did not have the right to vote, and I did not get one vote from them. [Great laughter.] And I will say also that when contributions had to be made to the Army by conscription, as controlling that conscription for the State of Pennsylvania, I never attempted to draw from one party more than from another. [Renewed laughter and applause.]

Mr. MILLER. I would like to ask the gentleman how he could have done so?

Mr. McLANE. I have often heard these calculations, and these various modes of making calculations. Although it is sometimes said that figures cannot lie, and that may be so, still the greatest lies that can be passed from man to man are oftentimes the deductions made from figures.

Now, when the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MILLER] undertakes to talk to me about the soldiers' vote, if he was in the war——

A MEMBER. And he was.

Mr. SPARKS. I have the Congressional Directory, and that does not show that he was in the war.

Mr. HOUK. I would ask the gentleman where he was during the war?

Mr. McLANE. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania was in the war and was one of those Pennsylvania soldiers who voted that Republican ticket, he may be able to tell this House how that soldiers' vote was generally manipulated; and if he will, then all these stories about tissue-paper and stuffing of ballot-boxes, whether in South Carolina or Mississippi or Alabama, would fade away into comparative insignificance.

Mr. MILLER. Does the gentleman mean to say—I made a mistake in fixing the year 1863 as the year of the soldiers' vote? It should be 1864. Does the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. McLANE] mean to say that the elections held in the field of 1864 were dishonest, or that the ballot-boxes were stuffed by the men who were then in the Army? Is that what he means?

Mr. McLANE. No; I did not say that.

Mr. MILLER. What does the gentleman mean, then?

Mr. McLANE. I may say what is not entirely agreeable to my friends on the other side of the House; but I want to have credit only for what I do say. I said nothing about stuffing ballot-boxes in the Army. I said that if the true history of the soldiers' vote, as it was cast in nearly all parts of the Army, was stated to this House, then these allegations and these reproaches about tissue-paper tickets and the stuffing of ballot-boxes would fade away into comparative insignificance.

What I had in my mind was that that soldiers' vote was a vote cast, if not under duress, yet in a state of army passion and army associations and oftentimes army management, which deprived it of the principal features of a free ballot. That is what I had in my mind to say. That is what I believe; that is what I have always heard to be the historical fact.

In other words, I was about to proceed to say that the soldiers' vote as cast in the field was no true index of the political character of the voter, and I do not think the gentleman from Pennsylvania will contradict me. That is all I intended to say.

I intended to call his attention, in connection with electoral figures and counts, to another view of the case, to another deduction from the figures. I intended to ask him to explain to himself how it was, when all the soldiers had gone to the war, the votes of the missing Democrats were measured exactly by the increase of the Republican votes at home. [Laughter and applause.] That is what I endeavored to say.

I did not mean, Mr. Speaker, I do not mean now, to enter into any exact calculation or to base my statement on any deduction from the return of votes in the field or votes at home. I mean simply to state what I believe to be a current historical fact; and I challenge any man, whether it be the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MILLER] or anybody else who lived in that day, to contradict the statement; the fact being that the soldiers of the war and the sailors of the war—I mean now the soldiers of the Union Army and the sailors of the Union Navy—the larger number of them I mean to say were Democrats. That is the fact I mean to state.

Mr. MILLER. I want to ask you one question. Is it not the fact that in 1864 the States of Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Kentucky, Ohio, Michigan, Iowa, Wisconsin, California, Minnesota, and Kansas gave a soldier's vote of 116,870 for Lincoln and only 33,748 for McClellan? And more than 50 per cent. of those who voted for McClellan did so not because they were Democrats, but because of his popularity as a soldier in the Army with the soldiers in the Army? Is not that the fact? And I want to call the attention of the gentleman to the further fact that in 1864 the soldiers' vote of Pennsylvania was 26,712 for Lincoln against 12,349 for McClellan. And how does he explain that? Does he undertake to say that that vote was manipulated? And if manipulated, by whom?

Mr. McLANE. I do not mean to say anything but what I have said. It is not necessary for the gentleman from Pennsylvania to put anything else into my mouth. What I have said may not be correct, but whether it be correct or not I am willing to let it stand. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania understands me. What I have said I am willing to let stand. My statement was that in the State of New Jersey and in every other Northern State I believe that the historical fact was that there were more Democrats in the Union Army and in the Union Navy than there were Republicans.

Mr. MILLER. Well, you said before in the whole North; now limit yourself to the State of New Jersey. How about Pennsylvania?

Mr. McLANE. I stated distinctly in New Jersey and the whole North, and then I particularized Pennsylvania.

Mr. ROBESON. The gentleman will pardon me. In New Jersey our soldiers in the field did not vote; the Democratic Legislature did not pass a law permitting them. Therefore, we had no opportunity of testing the matter. But at the first election after they came home they reversed a Democratic majority of 15,000 and elected a Republican governor that very fall by 3,000 majority. And, as the gentleman will remember, that vote, when the soldiers came back, drove that faithful but much-tried Northern Democrat, Petroleum V. Nasby, from New Jersey to the Confederate Cross-Roads in Kentucky. [Laughter.]

Mr. McLANE. As I have stated to the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the gentleman from New Jersey, I do not desire to deduce any opinions from the figures. I am quite willing to let my statements stand, and I am not acquainted with the history of the honorable Petroleum V. Nasby!

Mr. MILLER. I am not willing to let the statement stand without contradiction that the soldier vote in the Army was manipulated.

That is what the gentleman said, and I want it to appear in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland is entitled to the floor, and interruption must not be made without his consent.

Mr. McLANE. I had yielded to the gentleman, and am willing to do so again if he desires; but I beg him to get my permission before he interrupts me again.

Mr. MILLER. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. McLANE. Directly you may. All I ask is that you will not do it without my consent, as you have done several times.

I did not desire to sustain my assertion by any deduction from figures, either of the vote in the field or the vote at home. I was quite willing to let the statement go as my belief, leaving the gentleman from Pennsylvania free to gainsay it. But as he has chosen to force these figures and his deduction upon me, I have two things to say in reply. First, what I did say about the soldiers' vote. Now, what I have next to say is in reply to his figures. He will find that in the Presidential election to which we have referred Mr. Lincoln's vote was 1,857,000——

Mr. MILLER. I think the gentleman is reading from the figures for 1860.

Mr. McLANE. Now I want the gentleman from Pennsylvania to observe, this being Mr. Lincoln's vote in 1860, he has only to look to the number of soldiers that went into the war from the Northern States, and he will find, for the records of his country will show, that there were 2,600,000 men in the Union Army. Now, if Mr. Lincoln received 1,857,000 votes in 1860, where does the balance come from?

Mr. BINGHAM. The gentleman misunderstands the fact. The statement of 2,600,000 soldiers is upon the basis of service for the entire war.

Mr. McLANE. I am aware of that.

Mr. BINGHAM. I have had occasion to examine that statement.

Mr. MILLER. That includes every enlistment that was had—for three months, six months, nine months, one year, and three years.

Mr. McLANE. Now, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Pennsylvania will be good enough to give me his attention while I reply. I not only make to him the point that the difference between 2,600,000 and 1,857,000 was made up of Democrats; but I call his attention to the further fact that when the soldiers had gone to the war, every Northern State voted overwhelmingly the Republican ticket, but when they came back from the war how many of them voted the Democratic ticket?

Mr. MILLER. How many soldiers?

Mr. McLANE. No, sir; how many Northern States voted the Democratic ticket when the soldiers came back from the war? Ohio, New York, Indiana, Connecticut, Rhode Island, California, and Oregon.

Mr. MILLER. When did all that happen? What year?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is out of order unless the gentleman from Maryland yields.

Mr. McLANE. I have begged the gentleman from Pennsylvania not to interrupt me without my consent, and that he shall certainly have if he will allow me to answer one question before he asks me another.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that I have been driven to make this issue. I have no doubt that I am entirely correct. As for the agitation and feeling on the other side it is very natural at any time; but under the lashing they have received to-day, under the stimulant that the gentleman from New Jersey has administered to that side of the House, I am not surprised that they should feel somewhat awkward. When it was his pleasure to cast this reproach upon our side and throw out the insinuation against the political organization represented here, it must necessarily be unpleasant for him to find that he has perhaps fewer Union soldiers in his political ranks than we have in ours.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. May I suggest to my friend from Maryland to inquire of the gentleman from New Jersey why a Union soldier was turned out of the position of postmaster of Lynchburgh, Virginia, and a confederate put in his place? [Laughter and applause.] Will the gentleman please ask that question?

Mr. McLANE. No, I would rather not ask that question. I do not want to get further in the mire than I can help.

Mr. BINGHAM. I will answer the question. The gentleman who held that position resigned his commission. I had the honor of being for four years the classmate in college of the gentleman who has been postmaster at Lynchburgh; and with his own lips he told me that he resigned his commission and did not ask or wish a recommission. I have known that gentleman from 1861 up to to-day; and he is as good a Republican to-day, in office or out of office, as any man on this floor.

Mr. WISE, of Virginia. How about Norfolk?

Mr. BINGHAM rose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland, as the Chair understands, declines to yield.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman from Maryland allow me to ask him a question now? He told me that I should.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Will my friend allow me?

Mr. McLANE. I have yielded to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MILLER. The gentleman stated there were more Democrat soldiers enlisted in the Union Army than Republicans. Will he state to us how many more Republicans there were in the confederate army than there were Democrats? [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. McLANE. I do not hear your question. Ask it over again.

Mr. MILLER. Yes; I did.

Mr. McLANE. Ask your question again. I want the gentleman from Pennsylvania to repeat that question.

Mr. MILLER. I do not understand you.

Mr. McLANE. Repeat your question.

Mr. MILLER. The question I put was this: you stated there were more Democrats enlisted in the Union Army than there were Republicans. I now wish to ask you how many more Republicans there were in the Southern army than there were Democrats, and to prove it by the same figures you did relative to tissue-ballot voting you spoke about occurring in the Union Army?

Mr. McLANE. I have not as intimate acquaintance with the confederate army as I have with the Union Army.

Mr. MILLER. You lived as near to it as you did to the Union Army?

Mr. McLANE. Wait for an answer. I had not as much acquaintance with the condition of the confederate as with the Union Army, for I lived on this side of the line; and I know as much about the Union Army as the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania. If he will bear with me, I will tell him that in the confederacy there were neither Republicans nor Democrats! He knows very well that there was but one single party in the confederacy. There was no division of opinion in the confederacy—they were all confederates.

Mr. MILLER. What are they to-day?

Mr. McLANE. They were all confederates, even those loyal men whose claims are now pending in the Quartermaster-General's Department in this city. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. PETTIBONE. Let me ask the gentleman a question. [Cries of "Order!" and shouts of laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen must preserve order.

Mr. PETTIBONE. Let me ask the gentleman a question. [Cries of "Go on!"]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland is entitled to the floor and the House must be in order.

Mr. McLANE. Now, I have said what I have to repel the insinuations of the gentleman from New Jersey. He chose to make it. He had no justification for making it. It was not in order. It had nothing to do with our deliberations. It was altogether gratuitous. In my judgment, it was altogether unfounded. I will not say it was in bad taste. I am not nice upon such questions. He said I took occasion sometimes to say more than I intended. Well, now, I cannot accept that—perhaps I might call it that excuse, or that apology—for my language! What I will admit is that I have as much party zeal and party pride as he has. That I will admit freely, and neither he nor any other gentleman on that side of the House shall make what I consider a gratuitous and unfounded slur upon the political association with which I am connected unless I resent it, if I have the opportunity.

Mr. CURTIN. Will my friend allow me to interpolate a single remark?

Mr. McLANE. With pleasure.

Mr. CURTIN. I listen to insinuations of the political aspect of the people of Pennsylvania in that war with great pain. I allege neither in the history of the past nor of the present was there ever a great people more thoroughly united than the population of Pennsylvania in support of this Government when it was assailed, and that, too, without reference to politics, religion, or place of birth. There were a few who held back; I wish there had been none. It was the unanimity of sentiment to sustain this Government and to follow that flag that made that great State furnish the contributions for the support of this Government they did, ever to the glory of that great State. [Applause.]

Mr. BRUMM. Permit me to ask one question.

Mr. McLANE. No, sir.

Mr. BRUMM took the floor.

Mr. McLANE. Mr. Speaker, I claim the floor. I have not yielded the floor. Will the gentleman tell me what he wants me to yield the floor for?

Mr. BRUMM. To ask a question of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, my colleague.

Mr. McLANE. The gentleman from Pennsylvania wants to address a question to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. BRUMM. Yes, sir.

Mr. McLANE. Address it.

Mr. BRUMM. As to the unanimity of sentiment in Pennsylvania, I wish to ask the gentleman, our late governor, with reference to what is known as the Fishing Creek rebellion in Senator Buckalew's district, why troops were sent there, and how many regiments were sent into Luzerne, Schuylkill, and the anthracite-coal region for the purpose of keeping down the Democratic uprising against the draft?

Mr. CURTIN. I will answer the gentleman by saying that troops were sent into the coal region in 1863 for the same purpose for which they were sent there by the United States in 1877.

Mr. BRUMM. That will not do.

Mr. CURTIN. I do not understand that to have been an uprising or rebellion against the Government, requiring the presence of troops at all; and no county in Pennsylvania contributed her quota to the service of the Union more fully and more creditably and with more alacrity than the county of Schuylkill. I want him also to understand that Columbia County furnished her quota to the Army. And speaking of politics in Pennsylvania during that great struggle we should not have made our contributions to the General Government for the war, as the gentleman well knows, if we had been much divided. Men were divided in sentiment and had their political views, but I allude to the great body of the people of Pennsylvania. And, Mr Speaker, I should be ungrateful to the confidence and to the trust which that people have reposed in me if I did not do them the justice to say that during that trying season they were filled with a spirit of unity and alacrity in support of the Government which could not have been surpassed in any other State of this Union. [Applause.]

Mr. MILLER. And they opposed everything the gentleman, as the war governor of Pennsylvania, proposed. Everything; and voted against him in 1863 on the war issue.

Mr. McLANE. Now, Mr. Speaker, I decline to yield the floor further. Not only, I say, were a majority of Democrats in the Army and in the Navy but, sir, the commanders of the Army were Democrats. Now, Mr. Speaker, no man on this floor, whether he be from Pennsylvania or from New Jersey, has more respect or a better appreciation of the courage and the skill and the patriotism of the Union Army and the Union generals than I have; and in making this statement I am using a legitimate right, and I have a right to resent any reflection upon my judgment in the premises, whether addressed to me individually or in my political association. The honorable gentleman from New Jersey, at all times so conspicuous on this floor but particularly so at this time, takes it on himself to cast this reflection, an unfounded if not a calumnious one——

Mr. ROBESON. Will the gentleman permit a question right here as to what he means?

Mr. McLANE. I say the gentleman casts that reflection or insinuation on this side of the House, and whether he is solemn and serious or whether he is jocose is to me for the present moment a matter of perfect indifference.

Not only was the country saved, not only was the entire confederacy united to a man to dissolve its connection with it, but throughout these Northern States we would have been absolutely without hope but for the Northern Democracy. The confederate army came twice into the State of Pennsylvania, and no man who respects his own opinion dare say that we could have defended this territory without the support of the Democracy of Pennsylvania.

Mr. KASSON. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. McLANE. I beg the gentlemen not to interrupt me.

Mr. KASSON. I only wanted to say to the gentleman from Maryland, before putting the question of order before the House, that I have waited to enable him to answer everything that he might have regarded as of a personal nature, and after that I think the business of the House demands some attention under the fourteenth rule.

Mr. McLANE. That is a lecture, too.

Mr. KASSON. But if the gentleman from Maryland states that he has not finished with what he regards personal to himself, I shall certainly not make the point of order, but permit him to proceed.

Mr. McLANE. I am not sure but that this is more of a lecture than I addressed to the gentleman from New Jersey, although a somewhat suppositious case. I have not finished. I said not only a majority of the soldiers, but I said further, and this is said in proof of the unity of the people, that if they had not been united the Union would not have been preserved. If the North had not been solid upon the question without regard to party it would not have been preserved. Now, I say that this insinuation which has been hurled against the Democratic party is not true. It is an assertion that has no foundation in fact, and the man who asserts it can have its untruth demonstrated to him by any man who lived in that day.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. Does the gentleman from Maryland mean to assert that the Democratic party as a party during the war was in favor of suppressing the rebellion?

Mr. McLANE. Yes, sir, I do.

Mr. MAGINNIS. And sent as many men as your party did into the Army.

Mr. McLANE. Now, I have the floor and prefer not to be interrupted further.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. Did not the northern wing of the party declare the war for the Union a failure——

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen will come to order.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. And demand the immediate cessation of hostilities?

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I want to know whether the rules of this House are to be respected or not by gentlemen on the other side?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has been endeavoring to have gentlemen observe the rules.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I take notice that when a Democrat speaks in violation of the rules he is called to order by some one on the other side——

Mr. HASKELL. If so, you are a living monument of grace.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. McLANE] has the floor.

Mr. McLANE. I not only do not mean to say what the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] puts in my mouth but I mean to say that in the war—actually during the war—the Democratic candidate for the Presidency was the most accomplished and skillful general in the Union Army. That is what I meant to say. And although his fame was not recognized by his political opponents, that did not the less make him the peer of any of his own companions in arms. Although McClellan was discredited and persecuted by the political party in possession of the seat of Government, he not only remained the idol of the soldiers, but to this day he possesses the respect of the country. And he was the Democratic candidate for the Presidency during the war.

Mr. BINGHAM. What was the platform? Was it not that the war was a failure.

Mr. McLANE. The war a failure? Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BINGHAM,] who stands upon his feet and propounds this inquiry to me, consider that the war was a failure?

Mr. BINGHAM. At no period of the war, from the commencement to the end, was it a failure; because it was backed by the Republican loyalty of the North.

Mr. McLANE. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania if the war could be considered a failure by those who sustained the hero of South Mountain?

Mr. BINGHAM. It was not a failure with the hero of Appomattox. [Great applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. MAGINNIS. Was he a Democrat?

Mr. ROBESON. Why, yes. [Laughter and great applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. MAGINNIS. Was not Sherman a Democrat? And was not Hancock? Were not Sheridan and Rosecrans Democrats? Was not every distinguished general on that side during the war a Democrat, except Generals McDowell and Pope, who shed no particular glory on their party?

[The Speaker rapped to order, during which Mr. MAGINNIS and Mr. BINGHAM made some further remarks that were not distinctly heard.]

Mr. URNER rose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland on the left [Mr. URNER] is recognized.

Mr. URNER. I demand the previous question on the passage of the bill and on the pending motion to recommit.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask the gentleman from Maryland in charge of this bill to yield to me a few moments.

Mr. URNER. I will have to insist on the demand for the previous question.

Mr. RANDALL. Something has been said here as to Pennsylvania, and I desire to say a word in reply.

Mr. McLANE. Did I understand the Chair to say that my hour had expired?

The SPEAKER. The hour of the gentleman had expired.

Mr. RANDALL. Does the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. URNER] decline to yield five minutes?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I rise to a point of order. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. McLANE] moved to recommit the bill. While that motion is pending the previous question cannot be moved.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is not in order. The question is on ordering the previous question on the passage of the bill and the motion to recommit, made by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. McLANE.]

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. Is not the motion of the gentleman from Maryland, in that part of it which seeks to instruct the committee, amendable?

The SPEAKER. It is quite immaterial at present whether it is or not. The present question is on ordering the previous question on the passage of the bill and that motion.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 91, noes 70.

Mr. KLOTZ and Mr. RANDALL called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. RANDALL. The object I have in demanding the yeas and nays——

The SPEAKER. The question is not debatable.

Mr. RANDALL. I want a few moments. [After a pause.] I have come to an understanding with the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. URNER,] and I withdraw the demand for the yeas and nays.

Mr. KENNA. I renew it, unless it is understood that some of us can be heard. [After a pause.] I withdraw the demand for the yeas and nays.

So the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The first question is on the motion of the gentleman from Maryland to recommit this bill to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. URNER. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL.]

Mr. RANDALL. I almost hesitate to enter this bloodless arena amid this victorious army of warriors. But the truth ought to be stated, and ought to be impressed upon the record before the House and the country.

If this is a proposition designed as an assault upon the American soldier or sailor, I call the attention of gentlemen to the fact that it emanates from a committee having a Republican as its chairman and a majority of Republicans in its composition; and, if I am not informed incorrectly, it came from that committee without dissent. So that the reflections that have been sought to be cast on this side have been without the slightest warrant.

Now, as to the gentleman from Pennsylvania from the twenty-sixth district, [Mr. MILLER,] who has sought to reflect upon a portion of his fellow-citizens, I want to say this, that there is not an act of the Legislature of Pennsylvania increasing the powers of the governor, providing means for the support of the government, adding to the Pennsylvania force every man that was necessary, that did not receive the unanimous support of the members of the Legislature of both sides politically.

I want to say more—that I differ with the gentleman from Pennsylvania of the twenty-sixth district when he seeks to say that there was any want of alacrity on the part of the Democratic masses of Pennsylvania in responding to the requirements of the war for the Union. I want to say a little more, that I fear but for the Democrats in the Army a different result might have been from that which, thank God, was reached.

A MEMBER. Which Army?

Mr. RANDALL. I mean, of course, the Union Army; the one I had the honor to be in. Perhaps the gentleman from the twenty-sixth district had not that honor. So far as I am able to read our respective autobiographies, I discover the record does not show either of us was in the Army. My record is left out because of good taste; his may be left out because of necessity.

I had hoped that the time had come when all this character of debate may be put a stop to. I belong to a party that, when the surrender at Appomattox took place, ceased to fight. We then struggled to build up, to make the South what nature had intended her to be, so that she might blossom as the rose; to add to the progress of the American Union, so that the credit of the United States and the welfare of her people might continue to the end of time.

But I have noticed one thing most significant in all these struggles on the floor of the House of Representatives: those warriors who now come to the front and advocate violence and vengeance and bloodshed are generally men who in war were men of peace, and seem now in times of peace to be fierce warriors. [Laughter and applause.]

I thank the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. URNER] for his courtesy in yielding me this time.

Mr. MILLER. I desire a few words in reply.

Mr. URNER. I will yield four minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. MILLER. This discussion was not of my seeking. When the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MCLANE] arose in his place and stated that there were more Democratic soldiers in the Union Army than there were of Republicans I challenged that statement, and that was all. When the gentleman from Maryland said that the Democracy of the Northern States had done as much as or more to sustain the Union in the years 1861 to 1865 than the Republicans had done, and challenged a contradiction, I contradicted that statement. I recalled the fact that in 1863, when the army of the rebellion was on Pennsylvania soil, besieging Chambersburgh, the Democracy of my own State (and I regret that it was so) was then sitting in convention in Harrisburgh, the capital city. While the rebel cannon was thundering upon the soil of our own State the Democracy, in that convention, passed this resolution:

Resolved, That we have heard with intense alarm and deep indignation that some of our political opponents claim for the President of the United States a power hitherto wholly unknown in America, and never exercised in Europe or Asia except by the most despotic monarchs, namely, the power to arrest free citizens for the expression of their honest opinion on public affairs; and that the President has not only presumed to exercise this power himself, with the moderation and mercy which his own nature might permit, but has delegated it to many subordinates, and they again to others in every part of the country, until its hideous presence is seen and felt all over the United States.

The convention passed this resolution at a time when the reverberations of the enemy's cannon could be heard in the Hall where these representatives of the Democracy of Pennsylvania were assembled. I deny, sir, that there was any foundation in fact on which to base this resolution. Why, then, was it passed if the Democracy of Pennsylvania was, as has been asserted by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MCLANE] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] as loyal as the Republicans of that State? On behalf of the Republicans of my State and of the distinguished gentleman [Mr. CURTIN] who now occupies a seat on the opposite side of this Chamber, but who in that memorable campaign of 1863 was the standard-bearer of the loyal citizens of the Keystone State—on behalf of them and him I challenge the statement. The men who sat in that convention and who placed in nomination for governor the hero of "Fishing Creek" were not as loyal as the men who in 1863 voted for the re-election of Pennsylvania's gallant war governor, ANDREW G. CURTIN. But, sir, that convention did not stop here. It further resolved:

That we heartily thank the lion hearted Democracy of Ohio for the manly vindication they have given to the Constitution against the great crime committed upon it in the arrest and deportation of Vallandigham; and we assure them of our cordial sympathy in the great struggle they are making for their undoubted rights.

And when the "lion-hearted" Democracy of Ohio placed in nomination that arrant sympathizer with treason, Vallandigham, the loyal people of the Buckeye State decided, by a majority exceeding 100,000 votes, that his deportation was not "a great crime" and that they did not give him their "cordial sympathy," even if the Democracy of Pennsylvania, subdued and chastened by the roar of rebel artillery, did in convention assembled.

I fear, sir, that the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] had forgotten this scrap of history, as made by him and the other leaders of his party in 1863, and that the distinguished war governor [Mr. CURTIN] must also have forgotten this when he offered himself as a witness to prove the assertions of the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. MCLANE.] It was against his party in 1863 that the Pennsylvania Democracy fulminated these charges. Then he stood up gallantly for the Union. Then his eloquent tongue arraigned the party of the gentleman from the third Pennsylvania district, [Mr. RANDALL.] And when the battle of ballots was over on the evening of that October election in 1863, the telegraph bore joyous news to the Union armies, and disheartening news to soldiers on the other side, for it announced that the Pennsylvania Democracy had been again routed—horse, foot, and dragoon—and that the party of the Union had again triumphed. Because of the distinguished services rendered by the Representative of the twentieth Pennsylvania district, [Mr. CURTIN,] the loyal people of his State, while regretting, overlook the fact that he has fallen into such questionable company in these latter days.

But, sir, the war history of the Democratic party does not stop here. The Democracy, in national convention assembled in 1864, again put themselves upon record. In that convention Pennsylvania was represented by no less a distinguished gentleman than Hon. William A. Wallace, the late Democratic Senator. He was on the committee on resolutions, and among others reported the following:

Resolved, That this convention does explicitly declare, as the sense of the American people, that after four years of failure to restore the Union by the experiment of war, during which, under the pretense of a military necessity, or war power higher than the Constitution, the Constitution itself has been disregarded in every part, and public liberty and private right alike trodden down and the material prosperity of the country essentially impaired, justice, humanity, liberty, and the public welfare demand that immediate efforts be made for a cessation of hostilities with a view to an ultimate convention of the States, or other peaceable means, to the end that at the earliest practicable moment peace may be restored on the basis of the Federal Union of the States.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MILLER. A single moment more.

Mr. URNER. Very well.

Mr. MILLER. I read this not to show——

Mr. SPARKS. I call the gentleman to order; his time has expired.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is speaking in additional time yielded to him, and will proceed.

Mr. MILLER. If the gentlemen on the other side will compose themselves I will not paint their record any darker than they wrote it themselves. I am only trying to demonstrate that the Democrats were not quite so loyal as were the Republicans during the war, as asserted by gentlemen upon your side who have preceded me. I was about to say that I refer to these resolutions not to demonstrate that the great mass of the rank and file of the Democratic party sympathized with the people of the South, who were in open rebellion, but to show the animus of the leaders of the Democratic party of Pennsylvania during the war. I know, sir, that all the Democrats did not indorse these resolutions adopted at Harrisburgh in 1863, and that many of them, disgusted at the want of loyalty of their leaders, either staid at home on the day of election, or, going to the polls, erased the name of the Democratic candidate and inserted in its place the name of the Republican candidate, thereby swelling his majority.

I know, sir, that not all of the Democrats of my own State in 1864, and of other Northern States, indorsed the resolution of the Democratic national committee which I have just read, and that their votes helped to swell the majorities by which the Northern States were carried for the re-election of Abraham Lincoln to the Presidency; and when gentlemen on the other side assert that during the war the Democratic party, as a party, were as loyal as the Republican party I challenge the statement. When gentlemen on the other side assert that the Democratic party furnished from its ranks as many men to put down the rebellion as did the Republican party I not only challenge but I deny the statement; and I point to the figures for proof that in 1864, in the field, that notwithstanding the great popularity of General McClellan with the soldiers, not one in four voted for him.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] need not assert that this side of the House forced this discussion. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MCLANE] deserves the credit for this.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. URNER. Mr. Speaker, before asking a vote on this bill I desire in behalf of the Committee on the District of Columbia to call attention again to a mistake which has been fallen into, it seems to me, on both sides of the House. It has been asserted and reasserted that the report of this committee proposed to repeal section 354 of the Revised Statutes of the District of Columbia, providing that—

No person shall be appointed a policeman or watchman who has not served in the Army or Navy of the United States, and received an honorable discharge.

A provision repealing that section was in the bill originally, but the report of the committee struck out that repealing provision. Now, I wish to say that while this debate has been somewhat entertaining, yet the fact remains that the District of Columbia has to look for legislation entirely to Congress; it has but one day in every two weeks; and if, whenever a District bill is called up here for consideration the whole time is to be consumed in political discussion, I ask when shall the people of the District of Columbia get the legislation they so much need? In their interest I now ask that a vote be taken.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield to me for one moment?

Mr. URNER. Yes, sir.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. I desire to call the attention of the House and the country to the declaration of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] that if the bill presented to-day wrongs in any degree the Union soldier it emanates from the Republican side of this Chamber and from a Republican committee. While the gentleman seems anxious to have that declaration go to the country, he is careful to conceal the fact that when the proposition was made by this side of the Chamber, upon the recommendation and with the full approval of the Republican members of the committee, to strike out the second section of the bill, which contemplated a repeal of that statute which permitted only honorably discharged Union soldiers to be employed on the police force of this city—I say when such a motion was made the record shows the Democratic party voting against it, and therefore in favor of the repeal of that statute favoring the Union soldier, while every Republican, including those on the committee, voted in the affirmative and therefore in favor of the employment of Union soldiers only. Let the country understand that.

Mr. RANDALL. I suppose the respective sides are satisfied with the records they have made.

Mr. URNER. I would like to say one word in reply to the gentleman from Michigan. He has evidently fallen into an error when he says that it was the purpose of the Republican side of the House to rebuke the committee. The Republican side of the House has done no such thing. The Committee on the District of Columbia, in reporting back the bill referred to it, struck out the provision repealing that section of the Revised Statutes which gave protection to the soldier; and when the vote was taken nearly every member of the committee, certainly on this side of the House, voted for the motion of the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ROBESON,] because it accomplished what they wanted. We were opposed to striking out that section of the Revised Statutes.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. I was not criticising the gentleman from Maryland, but simply replying to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. URNER. I ask a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MCLANE] to recommit the bill to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. MCLANE. I withdraw that motion.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to lay the bill on the table.

The motion of Mr. HOLMAN was not agreed to; there being—ayes 26, noes 93.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the reading of the bill as engrossed.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That section 340 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the District of Columbia be, and the same hereby is, amended so as to read as follows:

"The police force shall consist of the following officers, namely: one major, one captain, ten lieutenants, twenty sergeants, such number of privates, not exceeding three hundred for the regular service, as the board may deem necessary, and eight detectives; and all promotions to the position of captain, lieutenant, and sergeant shall be made from the next succeeding grade or rank on the force."

SEC. 2. That the commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized to appoint one additional clerk for service at police headquarters.

Mr. NEAL. I understood that the report of the committee proposed to strike out the last section which the Clerk has read.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no.

The SPEAKER. The third section, as it was in the printed bill, has simply taken the place of the second section, which was struck out. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 91, noes 51.

Mr. ATKINS. I call for the yeas and nays.

The question being taken on ordering the yeas and nays, there were—ayes 37, less than one-fifth of the last vote.

Mr. SPARKS. I call for tellers on ordering the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. ATKINS and Mr. URNER were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 43, more than one-fifth of the last vote.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 117, nays 66, not voting 108; as follows:

So the bill was passed.

During the vote the following additional pairs were announced from the Clerk's desk:

Mr. POUND with Mr. PHISTER.

Mr. RYAN with Mr. LE FEVRE.

Mr. DE MOTTE with Mr. THOMPSON of Kentucky.

Mr. HOUK with Mr. DUGRO.

Mr. BROWNE with Mr. SINGLETON of Mississippi. Mr. BROWNE would vote "aye."

Mr. RICHARDSON, of South Carolina, with Mr. MOREY.

Mr. DWIGHT with Mr. ROBINSON, of New York.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. URNER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CAPITOL, NORTH O STREET AND SOUTH WASHINGTON RAILWAY.

Mr. PEIRCE, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, moved to take from the House Calendar and put on its passage as it was reported back from that committee the bill (H. R. No. 2871) to provide for the extension of the Capitol, North O Street and South Washington Railway.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Capitol, North O Street and South Washington Railway Company is hereby authorized to extend its line, by laying a single or double track, and running its cars thereon, on the following streets in the city of Washington, namely: commencing with the intersection of its present line at Eleventh and E streets northwest, and running east along E to Tenth street; thence south along Tenth to D street; thence east along D to Ninth street; thence south along Ninth street to Louisiana avenue; thence southwest along said avenue to Ohio avenue; thence west along Ohio avenue to its intersection with its present line at the junction of Ohio avenue and Twelfth street northwest.

SEC. 2. That unless said extension is constructed and the cars run thereon within six months from the passage and approval of the act all rights granted hereunder shall be void: Provided, That no new track or tracks shall be laid along Ninth street from D street to Louisiana avenue, but said company may use the tracks of the Metropolitan Street Railway Company between said points, upon such terms and conditions as may be provided in the original act of incorporation of said Capitol, North O Street and South Washington Railway Company.

Mr. PEIRCE. The bill has been read as it was amended by the Committee on the District of Columbia. It is for the purpose of extending this line of railway to the general market of the District. It explains itself and there is no objection to it.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. PEIRCE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MARYLAND RAILROAD COMPANY IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. PEIRCE. I am directed by the Committee on the District of Columbia to move that the House Calendar be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4842) to authorize the Southern Maryland Railroad Company to extend a railroad into and within the District of Columbia, and it be put on its passage as it was recommended to be amended by that committee.

The bill was read, as follows:

Whereas it is represented to this present Congress that the Southern Maryland Railroad Company, organized under the provisions of the act of the General Assembly of the State of Maryland, entitled "An act to incorporate the Southern Maryland Railroad Company," approved March 20, 1868, desire to extend their railroad into and within the District of Columbia: Therefore,

Be it enacted, &c., That the Southern Maryland Railroad Company shall be, and they are hereby, authorized and empowered to extend their railroad into and within the District of Columbia, by and over the route or routes and from or to the terminal point or points following, that is to say: entering said District near its northeastern angle and proceeding thence in a northwestwardly direction across the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad near Benning's Station, on that road, and across the Eastern Branch of the Potomac River about one thousand feet above and north of Benning's Bridge, and running thence southward of Mount Olivet Cemetery across the Washington Branch of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad near the southern angle of the National Fair Grounds, and thence across the old Bladensburg road at the head of the National Fair Grounds Valley, and thence to a junction with the Metropolitan Branch of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad at or near the two-mile post on said Metropolitan Branch of said railroad, which said point of junction shall be the northern terminus of said Southern Maryland Railroad. And the said Southern Maryland Railroad Company are hereby authorized to exercise the same powers, rights, and privileges, and are subject to the same restrictions, in the extension and construction of their said railroad into and within the said District as may be now exercised by railroad companies organized under the general laws in force for the incorporation of railroad companies in the District of Columbia, it being expressly understood that the Southern Maryland Railroad Company shall have power to construct a railroad within the said District only along the routes and from and to the terminal points hereinbefore indicated.

SEC. 2. That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to authorize the said company to enter upon and take any cemetery, or any part of the property known as the Soldiers' Home, or any lot or square, or part thereof, owned by the United States, within the limits of the city of Washington, for the purpose of locating or constructing said railroad, or for the purpose of excavating the same or taking therefrom any materials, or for any other purposes or uses whatsoever; and the said Southern Maryland Railroad may connect within said District with any railroad or canal company chartered or hereafter to be chartered, by such route or routes within said District as have been or as may be hereafter determined by Congress, and upon such terms as may be agreed upon by the said companies respectively. In crossing the track of any other railroad, said Southern Maryland Railroad Company shall construct its road either above or below the grade of said road.

SEC. 3. That the said Southern Maryland Railroad Company may charge and receive for tolls and transportation of freights on the part of said railroad within the District of Columbia at the same rates that it shall charge and receive therefor on the part of said road without the said District, and the same rate of passenger fare may be established for distances along said road within the said District as shall be established for like distances along said road without said District.

SEC. 4. That said company are also hereby authorized and empowered to make such special contract with any duly authorized officer or agent of the United States for the conveyance of the mail or the transportation of persons or property for the use of the United States on any railroad which shall be constructed by the said company, and on such terms as shall be approved of by such duly authorized officer or agent of the Government as aforesaid.

SEC. 5. That unless the said company shall commence the construction of said railroad within one year, and shall complete the same, with at least one set of tracks, within two years from the passage of this act, then this act and all rights and privileges hereby granted shall cease and determine.

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask attention to the fourth section, that said company are also hereby authorized and empowered to make such special contract with any duly authorized officer or agent of the United States for the conveyance of the mail or the transportation of persons and property for the use of the United States on any railroad which shall be constructed by the said company, &c. Now, as to carrying the mails there is a general law prescribing what shall be paid by the Government to railroad companies. What is the necessity of this provision for special contract?

Mr. PEIRCE. It was in the bill as it was introduced. If there is objection to it the gentleman from Georgia can move to strike it out.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move to strike out the fourth section.

Mr. NEAL. Is it not a fact that the Postmaster-General does make special contracts with railroad companies?

Mr. BLOUNT. No. On the contrary there is a general law on the subject prescribing they shall be paid by weight.

Mr. NEAL. We do not object to the motion to strike it out.

Mr. BLOUNT. I have made that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. REAGAN. I wish to ask the gentleman if there is a reservation in the bill of the right on the part of the Government to regulate passenger and freight rates?

Mr. BLOUNT. No, sir.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to offer an amendment to come in at the end of the bill, at the close of the last section.

The SPEAKER. The amendment will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided Congress reserves the right to regulate the rates on passengers and freight on said railroad.

Mr. RANDALL. I suggest to the gentleman from Texas that that amendment should come in at the end of the third section.

Mr. REAGAN. Very well; I have no objection to that.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PEIRCE. I desire now to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The amendment will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out of line 12, in section 2, the words "within the limits of the city of Washington."

Mr. PEIRCE. The reason of that amendment is that the railroad does not enter into the limits of the city, nor does it come within a less distance than three miles of it; and these words are therefore unnecessary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PEIRCE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

J. H. MERRILL.

Mr. NEAL. I am authorized by the Committee on the District of Columbia to report for adoption the following bill.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill for the relief of J. H. Merrill.

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to J. H. Merrill, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $41.48, the same being an erroneous charge for special improvements against part of lot 4, square 684, one-half of said sum to be charged to the revenue derived from taxation on the property of the District of Columbia.

Mr. RANDALL. Is that bill in print?

Mr. NEAL. No; it is only a manuscript bill; but I want to state the reason for offering it. The commissioners of the District of Columbia report that this sum has been collected on account of erroneous assessment. The old man is eighty years of age, and the claim should be paid without going through the formality usually required and keep him long waiting.

Mr. KLOTZ. That bill is all right. It ought to pass.

The bill (H. R. No. 5996) was read a first and second time, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. NEAL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

OUTSTANDING CERTIFICATES OF ASSESSMENT.

Mr. NEAL. I am authorized by the Committee on the District of Columbia to ask to take up the bill (H. R. No. 5772) to provide for the redemption of outstanding certificates of assessment issued by the late corporation of Washington in cases where the Congress of the United States has since then relieved the property assessed from the lien of said assessment, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized and directed to redeem all outstanding certificates of assessment issued under the laws and ordinances of the late corporation of Washington, in the District of Columbia, by issuing to the bona fide owners thereof drawback certificates in amount equal to the value of the work actually done and materials furnished therefor upon the improvements ordered to be made and for which said certificates were issued, the value of said work done and materials furnished to be ascertained as near as may be by said commissioners before said drawback certificates shall be issued, together with interest thereon from the completion of said work or the furnishing of said certificates, in all cases where the property against which said certificates were issued have been subsequently released therefrom by operation of law or by act of Congress, which drawback certificates shall be receivable for all arrears of general or special taxes due prior to July 1, 1879.

Mr. NEAL. I will make an explanation of this bill, and I think every member present will see the entire propriety of passing it.

Assessments, as is well known to every member here, were formerly made against property which was improved. In other words, property was assessed for the value of improvements made thereon according to front feet or the appraised value of the property. These assessment certificates were delivered to contractors who did the work. Now, the Government of the United States, after this work had been done, in several instances where property of churches had been assessed, passed a law relieving them from assessment. The improvements were made and the contractors who did the work consequently never received their money. Congress passed laws to release all that property from the amount of the assessment, and consequently, as I have said, the contractors to whom these certificates of assessments had been given in payment could not realize upon them, and therefore could not get their money. Now, we have provided that these outstanding certificates shall bear only 6 per cent. in place of 10 per cent., as they formerly bore, and that the certificates shall be receivable for all arrears of general or special taxes due prior to July 1, 1879, and that where work has been actually done, and the certificates taken therefor, provision is made for relieving the contractors.

Then, instead of paying them money, we simply authorize the issue of drawback certificates, which shall be receivable for arrears of general or special taxes due prior to July 1, 1879. It appears to me it is an act of the sheerest justice, and there can be no possible objection to it.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. NEAL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SOLDIERS' MONUMENT ASSOCIATION AT BIRMINGHAM, CONNECTICUT.

Mr. PEELLE. On Friday evening, while sundry bills were being passed donating cannon for monumental purposes, I suggested that a bill introduced by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. PHELPS] be passed over, thinking it was an exact copy of a bill which had previously passed. My attention was called to it the next morning, and I wish to ask unanimous consent now that that bill, which provides for the donation of four condemned cannon and thirty-six cannon-balls for a soldiers' monument at Birmingham, Connecticut, may be taken up and passed. I ask this that I may, as far as possible, make reparation to the gentleman from Connecticut for my unwittingly asking that the bill be passed over.

There being no objection, the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2202) donating condemned cannon and cannon-balls to the Soldiers' Monument Association of Birmingham, Connecticut, and it was brought before the House for consideration.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of War be, and he hereby is, authorized to deliver, if the same can be done without detriment to the Government, four condemned cannon and thirty-six cannon-balls to the order of the Soldiers' Monument Association of Brimingham, Connecticut, to be used in connection with a soldiers' monument now in process of erection by said association.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PEELLE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Indiana that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KLOTZ] desires to ask concurrence in Senate amendments which simply affect a name in a House bill and in no sense go to the merit of it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I withdraw the motion to adjourn for the present.

APPOINTMENT OF ORDNANCE STOREKEEPER.

Mr. KLOTZ. I ask unanimous consent that the bill (H. R. No. 721) to authorize the appointment of V. McNally as an ordnance storekeeper in the Army be taken from the Speaker's table and that the Senate amendments be concurred in.

The amendments of the Senate were read, as follows:

Amend, in lines 2 and 3, by striking out the words "V. McNally, the present chief clerk of the Ordnance Department."

Amend the title so as read, "to authorize the appointment of an ordnance storekeeper in the Army."

The amendments were concurred in.

Mr. KLOTZ moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

THOMAS FISHER.

Mr. BARBOUR, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5997) for the relief of Thomas Fisher; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

NIEL NIELSSON.

Mr. STEELE, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Pensions, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. No. 3865) for the relief of Niel Nielsson; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

PRISCILLA DECATUR TWIGGS.

Mr. STEELE also, by unanimous consent, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 5998) for the relief of Priscilla Decatur Twiggs for an increase of pension; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

LANDS IN VIRGINIA MILITARY DISTRICT.

Mr. CONVERSE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5999) to give effect to patents for lands in the Virginia military district of Ohio, and to construe and define sections 2 and 3 of the act approved March 27, 1880, entitled "An act to construe and define an act to cede to the State of Ohio the unsold lands in the Virginia military district, in said State, approved February 18, 1871, and for other purposes," and to further extend the time for making surveys in said district, and for filing plats, certificates, and warrants, or certified copies of warrants, at the General Land Office, for patent; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

SARAH C. GOLDERMAN.

Mr. DINGLEY. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. No. 603) granting a pension to Sarah C. Golderman, for reference to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

There was no objection; and the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER COMMISSION.

Mr. KING, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 6000) making an appropriation for the payment of the surveys and examinations and the necessary salaries and other expenses of the Mississippi River commission for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

NATIONAL BOARD OF HEALTH.

Mr. KING also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 6001) making an appropriation for the payment of the salaries and expenses of the National Board of Health, and to carry out the purposes of the various acts creating the same, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

HONORA KELLEY.

Mr. KING also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 6002) granting a pension to Honora Kelley; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

MANUEL TIBBS.

Mr. KING also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 6003) granting a pension to Manuel Tibbs; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

MARGARET M'CORMICK.

Mr. WALKER. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. No. 3776) granting a pension to Margaret McCormick, returned from the Senate with an amendment, for the purpose of concurring in the amendment of the Senate.

The amendment was to add to the bill the following:

And pay her a pension as the widow of the said Robert McCormick.

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the Speaker's table and the amendment of the Senate concurred in.

Mr. WALKER moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the Senate was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REFERENCE OF CLAIMS TO THE COURT OF CLAIMS.

Mr. MANNING. I ask unanimous consent that the bill in charge of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOWMAN,] to refer claims to the Court of Claims, with the amendments to it adopted on motion of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] be printed in the RECORD; and also that the substitute offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUSE] be also printed in the RECORD to-morrow, so that members may be able to see it.

Mr. BOWMAN. I understand that is the bill now before the House, in its final shape, as it has been amended. I understand the gentleman to ask that that be printed in to-morrow's RECORD?

Mr. MANNING. That is my request; that and the substitute of the gentleman from Tennessee.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The bill reported by Mr. BOWMAN, as amended on motion of Mr. HOLMAN, is as follows:

A bill (H. R. No. 684) to afford assistance and relief to Congress and the Executive Departments in the investigation of claims and demands against the Government.

Be it enacted, &c., That whenever a claim or matter is pending before any committee of the Senate or House of Representatives, or before either House of Congress, which involves the investigation and determination of facts, the committee or House may cause the same, with the vouchers, papers, proofs, and documents pertaining thereto, to be transmitted to the Court of Claims of the United States, and the same shall there be proceeded in under such rules as the court may adopt. When the facts shall have been found, the court shall not enter judgment thereon, but shall report the same to the committee or to the House by which the case was transmitted for its consideration.

SEC. 2. That when a claim or matter is pending in any of the Executive Departments which may involve controverted questions of fact or law, the head of such Department may transmit the same, with the vouchers, papers, proofs, and documents pertaining thereto, to said court, and the same shall be there proceeded in under such rules as the court may adopt. When the facts and conclusions of law shall have been found, the court shall not enter judgment thereon, but shall report its findings and opinions to the Department by which it was transmitted for its guidance and action.

SEC. 3. The jurisdiction of said court shall not extend to or include any claim against the United States growing out of the destruction or damage to property by the Army or Navy during the war for the suppression of the rebellion, or for the use and occupation of real estate by any part of the military or naval forces of the United States in the operations of said forces during the said war at the seat of war; nor shall the said court have jurisdiction of any claim against the United States which is now barred by virtue of the provisions of any law of the United States.

SEC. 4. In any case of a claim for supplies or stores taken by or furnished to any part of military or naval forces of the United States for their use during the late war for the suppression of the rebellion, the petition shall aver that the person who furnished such supplies or stores, or from whom such supplies or stores were taken, did not give any aid or comfort to said rebellion, but was throughout that war loyal to the Government of the United States, and the fact of such loyalty shall be a jurisdictional fact, and unless the said court shall, on a preliminary inquiry, find that the person who furnished such supplies or stores, or from whom the same were taken as aforesaid, was loyal to the Government of the United States throughout said war, the court shall not have jurisdiction of such cause, and the same shall, without further proceedings, be dismissed.

SEC. 5. That the Attorney-General, or his assistants, under his direction, shall appear for the defense and protection of the interests of the United States in all cases which may be transmitted to the Court of Claims under this act, with the same power to interpose counter-claims, offsets, defenses for fraud practiced or attempted to be practiced by claimants, and other defenses in like manner as he is now required to defend the United States in said court.

SEC. 6. That in the trial of such cases no person shall be excluded as a witness because he or she is a party to or interested in the same.

SEC. 7. That reports of the Court of Claims to Congress under this act, if not finally acted upon during the session at which they are reported, shall be continued from session to session and from Congress to Congress until the same shall be finally acted upon.

The substitute of Mr. HOUSE is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That Congress shall not authorize the payment of any private claim not payable under existing laws until the facts on which such claim is based shall have been judicially established and reported as hereinafter provided.

SEC. 2. Any person having a claim or matter against the United States in respect of which he desires relief by special act of Congress, and of which the Court of Claims could not under existing laws take jurisdiction, may, before applying to Congress for such relief, file a petition in that court stating the facts and grounds on which the relief is sought, and praying the court to find the facts; and the court, under such rules as it may adopt, shall find the facts as established by the evidence, and report the same, with a copy of the petition and answer of the Government, to either House of Congress.

SEC. 3. Whenever a claim or matter is pending before any committee of the Senate or House of Representatives, or before either House of Congress, which involves the investigation and determination of facts, the committee or House may cause the same, with the vouchers, papers, proofs, and documents pertaining thereto, to be transmitted to the Court of Claims, and the same shall be there proceeded in under such rules as the court may adopt. When the fact shall have been found, the court shall report the same to the committee or to the House by which the case was transmitted for its consideration.

SEC. 4. In any case of a claim for supplies or stores taken by or furnished to any part of the military or naval forces of the United States for their use during the war for the suppression of the rebellion, or for the destruction of or damage to property by any part of said forces, the petition shall aver that the person who furnished such supplies or stores, or whose property was so taken, destroyed, or damaged, did not give any aid or comfort to said rebellion, but was, throughout that war, loyal to the Government of the United States; which averment shall be investigated, and the facts in relation thereto found and reported by said court.

SEC. 5. All private claims pending in either House of Congress at the final adjournment thereof, involving an investigation or determination of facts shall, with all papers connected therewith, be transferred to the Court of Claims, to be there proceeded with in the manner hereinbefore prescribed.

SEC. 6. No private claim which accrued of the character described in section 2 of this act, prior to the year 1866, and which has not been pending before Congress or some one of the Executive Departments since the year 1860, shall be heard by the Court of Claims, or considered by Congress, or any of the Executive Departments. All other such claims now existing shall be presented to that court, in the manner and for the purpose aforesaid, within two years after the passage of this act, and all claims hereafter accruing shall be so presented within six years after they accrue, in default whereof, in either of said cases, the claims shall be barred: Provided, That the claims of married women, which first accrued during their marriage, and of infants, idiots, insane persons, and persons beyond the seas when the claim accrued, entitled to the claim, shall not be barred if the petition be filed in the court as aforesaid within two years after the disability has ceased; but no other disabilities than those enumerated shall prevent any claim from being barred, nor shall any of the said disabilities operate cumulatively.

SEC. 7. Whenever there shall be pending before the Department of State a claim in behalf of any alien against the United States, founded on or growing out of any treaty with a foreign power or any international obligation, the Secretary of State may, with the consent of the representative of the government of such alien, refer such claim to the Court of Claims; which shall thereupon have jurisdiction to hear and determine the same upon the principles of justice and international law, and to render such judgment as those principles shall require. From any such judgment, when the amount in controversy is $3,000 or more, either party may appeal to the Supreme Court in the manner provided by law in other cases of appeal from the Court of Claims.

SEC. 8. When a claim or matter is pending in any of the Executive Departments which involves controverted questions of fact or law, the head of such Department may transmit the same, with the vouchers, papers, proofs, and documents pertaining thereto, to said court, and the same shall be there proceeded in under such rules as the court may adopt. When the facts and conclusions of law shall have been found, the court shall not enter judgment thereon, but shall report its findings and opinions to the Department by which it was transmitted.

SEC. 9. The Attorney-General, or his assistants under his direction, shall appear for the defense and protection of the interest of the United States in all cases which may be brought in the Court of Claims under this act, with power to interpose counter-claims, offsets, defenses for fraud practiced or attempted to be practiced by claimants, and other defenses, as fully as he is now required or authorized to do in other cases in said court.

SEC. 10. In the trial of such cases no person shall be excluded as a witness because he is a party to or interested in the same; and any claimant or party in interest may be examined as a witness on the part of the Government, and when refusing so to testify, or willfully testifying falsely, shall not be entitled to relief.

SEC. 11. If it shall appear to the court that in any case referred to it under the provisions of this act testimony has been duly taken by either party, the same, so far as relevant and competent, may be used, subject to such rules as the court may see fit to adopt.

SEC. 12. In every case which shall come before the Court of Claims under the provisions of this act, if it shall appear to said court upon the facts established that it has jurisdiction to render judgment thereon under existing laws, it shall proceed to do so, and report its proceedings therein to either House of Congress, or to the Department by which the same was referred to said court.

SEC. 13. Reports of the Court of Claims to Congress under this act, if not finally acted upon during the session at which they are reported, shall be continued from session to session and from Congress to Congress until the same shall be finally acted upon.

"CUSTOM-HOUSE LOT," BERMUDA HUNDRED, VIRGINIA.

Mr. WISE, of Virginia. I ask consent to take from the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union the bill (H. R. No. 4133) to authorize the sale of certain property at Bermuda Hundred, in the county of Chesterfield, in the State of Virginia. I think there can be no objection to it.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to sell, either at public or private sale, and on such terms as he may deem best, a certain half-acre lot of unimproved land situated at Bermuda Hundred, in the county of Chesterfield, in the State of Virginia, and known as the "custom-house lot."

Mr. HOLMAN. Is there any report on that bill?

Mr. WISE, of Virginia. It is an unimproved lot which has been owned by the Government since 1790, and has never been used.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is it recommended by the Department?

Mr. WISE, of Virginia. The Secretary of the Treasury recommends it, and it has been reported favorably by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the Calendar and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WISE, of Virginia, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MOUND CITY NATIONAL CEMETERY, ILLINOIS.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported, as a substitute for House bill No. 3586, a bill (H. R. No. 6004) making an appropriation to construct a road and approaches from Mound City, Illinois, to the national soldiers' cemetery, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

EUGENE WELLES.

Mr. BRAGG. I ask unanimous consent that Senate bill No. 416, for the relief of Eugene Welles, be taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

There was no objection; and the bill was accordingly taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

MUSTER OF VOLUNTEER OFFICERS.

Mr. STEELE. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union the bill (H. R. No. 3856) to provide for the muster and pay of certain officers of the volunteer forces and put it on its passage at this time.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman will not press that bill now.

Mr. STEELE. You are interested in that bill for your constituents, and I hope you will not make any objection.

Mr. HOLMAN. I must insist upon the regular order.

Mr. STEELE. This is a bill relating to the muster of volunteer officers.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does my colleague want to pass that bill at this late hour?

Mr. STEELE. Yes; it will take but a few minutes, and you yourself have been urging the bill.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to correct the muster-rolls of the volunteer forces of the United States in the late war so that the muster of officers therein shall cover the whole period during which they were regularly commissioned and actually performed the duties to which they were so commissioned, in all cases where no charges are pending against them, and there was no neglect on their part which delayed their muster-in, and where the commissions bear date prior to the 18th day of June, 1863, or after that date when their commands were not below the minimum number entitling them to such officers at the date of the commission.

SEC. 2. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to cause to be paid to all officers mustered under the provisions of the preceding section the amounts of pay and allowances to which they would have been entitled if originally so mustered, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

SEC. 3. That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have no objection to that bill.

Mr. CONVERSE. I object.

Mr. STEELE. I wish the gentleman would hear an explanation of the bill before he objects.

Mr. RANDALL. That bill I understand is reported unanimously from the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. STEELE. It is reported unanimously.

Mr. CONVERSE. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. STEELE. I move to amend the first section of the bill by correcting the date from the "eighteenth" to the "twentieth" of June, 1863, so as to make it correspond with the law; also to insert the words "or were prisoners of war or were in hospital."

The amendments were agreed to, and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STEELE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

KICKAPOO INDIAN LANDS.

Mr. HASKELL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 6005) to provide for the sale of certain Kickapoo Indian lands; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

MARIAN A. MULLIGAN.

Mr. ALDRICH, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 6006) granting an increase of pension to Marian A. Mulligan; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

PREVENTION OF CRIME IN DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. URNER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 6007) for the better prevention of crime in the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

ELIZA M. BASS.

Mr. COLERICK, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 6008) to restore the name of Eliza M. Bass to the pension-roll; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. YOUNG asked and obtained unanimous consent for the withdrawal from the files of the House of papers in the case of Benjamin Hawkes.

REGULATION OF STEAM-VESSELS.

Mr. COX, of New York. I ask unanimous consent to have taken up and passed at this time a bill in regard to the inspection of foreign vessels. A similar bill passed the House at the last session, but failed in the Senate.

Mr. PAGE. Has the bill been reported by any committee?

Mr. COX, of New York. It was reported favorably last year, and passed. It simply requires that British vessels running out from New York and other places to the West Indies shall undergo the same inspection to which our own vessels are subjected.

Mr. DINGLEY. The bill is right, and I hope it will be passed.

Mr. HOLMAN. Regular order.

Mr. COX, of New York. The bill does not contain any appropriation. I hope the gentleman will not call the regular order.

Mr. RANDALL. Let us hear the bill read.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. No. 4684) to amend section 4400, of title 52, of the Revised Statutes of the United States, concerning the regulation of steam-vessels.

Be it enacted, &c., That section 4400 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be amended and enlarged by adding thereto at the end of said section, as it now appears, the words:

"And all foreign private steam-vessels carrying passengers from any port of the United States to any other place or country shall be subject to the provisions of sections 4470, 4471, 4472, 4473, 4479, 4482, 4486, 4488, and 4489, of this title, and shall be liable to visitation and inspection by the proper officer, in any of the ports of the United States, respecting any of the provisions of the sections aforesaid."

There being no objection, the Committee on Commerce was discharged from the further consideration of the bill; which was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. COX, of New York, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLLD BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. ALDRICH, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the Committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (S. No. 632) granting a pension to John Taylor;

A bill (S. No. 240) granting an increase of pension to Henry Strawbridge;

A bill (S. No. 1677) to amend an act donating public lands to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts; and

A bill (H. R. No. 3869) for the allowance of certain claims reported by the accounting officers of the United States Treasury Department.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. WHITE. I rise to a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. There is a motion to adjourn pending.

Mr. WHITE. I hope the gentleman from Indiana will not insist upon that motion. I will not occupy the attention of the House more than a few moments.

Mr. HOLMAN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, I desire, before the House adjourns, to call attention to the fact that on the 30th of January last I introduced in this House the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Attorney-General be, and hereby is, directed to furnish this House with copies of all papers on file in his office touching the administration of the United States district attorney, marshal, commissioners, and clerks for the State of Kentucky, together with a statement of the accounts of said officers from January 1, 1870, to January 30, 1882.

Rule XXIV provides that during the call on Monday of States and Territories "resolutions of inquiry directed to the heads of the Executive Departments shall be in order for reference to appropriate committees, which resolutions shall be reported to the House within one week thereafter."

Now, Mr. Speaker, the other day, in discussing the bill providing for the appointment of a commission to revise the tariff and internal-revenue laws, I had occasion to state some very severe facts about a certain lobbyist who is in the employ of the whisky rings that are attempting to dictate legislation for this country. He has seen fit to write a very severe article against me. I will not quote that article now; it is not necessary. I desire, however, to state to the House and to the country that I cannot afford to bandy words with the lobbyists who hang around this House; but when I ask a Republican House to make an investigation, and they throttle me by letting the resolution lie in committee, the delay is no fault of mine. I only ask of the House and the country that they shall wait until an investigation is had, when every charge I have made, and more, will be entirely proved.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. HOLMAN, that the House adjourn, it was agreed to; and accordingly (at five o'clock and twenty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. WASHBURN: The petition of citizens of the third Congressional district of Minnesota, protesting against the admission of Chinese laborers—to the Committee on Education and Labor.

By Mr. WILLIS: The petition of Otter & Co. and others, protesting against the repeal of the tax on matches—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. YOUNG: The petition of tobacco manufacturers, for reduction of the tax on cigarettes—to the same committee.

Also, the petition of Cincinnati Cigar Manufacturers' Association, for a reduction of tax on cigars, &c.—to the same committee.

Also, the petition of Abram L. Frazer & Co., Andrews, Bates & Co., and other wholesale grocers of Cincinnati, Ohio; of M. B. Callahan and others, citizens of Charlton, New York; of Miles Hughes and others, of Duchess County, New York; of Philip Diehl and others, of South East, New York; of George Brown, a confectioner of Baltimore, Maryland; of H. C. Morris and other merchants of Norwalk, Ohio; of George Young and others, citizens of Utica, New York; and of G. W. Sanders and other merchants of Reading, Pennsylvania, for the passage of the bill pending to tax the manufacture of the adulterant known as glucose five cents per pound—severally to the same committee.

Also, the petition of the Board of Trade and Transportation of Cincinnati, for the passage of bills relating to bridges over the Ohio River—to the Committee on Commerce.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, April 25, 1882.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

UMATILLA RESERVATION.

Mr. DAWES. I ask unanimous consent to have simply a verbal amendment made in the bill (S. No. 1434) providing for the allotment of lands in severalty to the Indians residing upon the Umatilla reservation, in the State of Oregon, and granting patents therefor, and for other purposes, which was passed by the Senate yesterday. In striking out a proviso the words "and provided further" were left standing in the bill, when it should be simply "provided."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. By unanimous consent the vote by which the bill was passed may be reconsidered.

Mr. DAWES. I ask unanimous consent that it be done for that purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The vote by which the bill was passed will be reconsidered if there be no objection. The Chair hears none. The vote ordering the bill to a third reading is also reconsidered, there being no objection.

Mr. DAWES. In section 5, line 16, occur the words "and provided further." The first proviso in the section was striken out; it should be "provided," so as to make the bill read properly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and that amendment will be made.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. ALDRICH presented a memorial of property owners in square No. 725, Washington, District of Columbia, in favor of an abatement of illegal assessments for opening an alley; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. PENDLETON presented the petition of John Chilcote and 26 others, citizens of Newark and Somerset, Ohio, praying for the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 5656) to amend the laws relating to the entry of distilled spirits in distillery and special bonded warehouses and the withdrawal of the same therefrom; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MILLER, of New York, presented three petitions of the Stationers' Board of Trade of the City of New York, signed by members of the board and by various merchants, praying for the reduction of the rate of letter postage to two cents; which were referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented resolutions adopted at a meeting of the Chamber of Commerce of New York, in favor of tariff reform; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HOAR presented the petition of Joseph Post and other citizens of Westbury, Long Island, New York, praying that the scope and functions of the National Board of Health may be more clearly defined; which was referred to the Select Committee to investigate and report the best means of preventing the introduction and spread of Epidemic Diseases.

Mr. FERRY presented a petition of members of the Legislature of Michigan and others, praying for the passage of Senate bill No. 1012, on behalf of Union prisoners of war; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of L. C. Seymour, of Glenn, Michigan, and others, and the petition of G. W. Sheffield, of Johnstown, Michigan, and others, praying for such legislation as will prevent unjust discriminations by railroad corporations and other common carriers; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. JOHNSTON presented resolutions adopted at a special meeting of the council of the town of Danville, Virginia, in favor of an appropriation of $10,000 to construct a road to the national cemetery near that place; which were referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 2202) donating condemned cannon and cannon-balls to the Soldiers' Monument Association of Birmingham, Connecticut;

A bill (H. R. No. 2871) to provide for the extension of the Capitol, North O Street and South Washington Railway;

A bill (H. R. No. 3575) to increase the police force of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. No. 3856) to provide for the muster and pay of certain officers of the volunteer forces;

A bill (H. R. No. 4133) to authorize the sale of certain property at Bermuda Hundred, in the county of Chesterfield, in the State of Virginia;

A bill (H. R. No. 4684) to amend section 4400 of title 52 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, concerning the regulation of steam-vessels;

A bill (H. R. No. 4842) to authorize the Southern Maryland Railroad Company to extend a railroad into and within the District of Columbia;

A bill (H. R. No. 5772) to provide for the redemption of outstanding certificates of assessment issued by the late corporation of Washington in cases where the Congress of the United States has since then relieved the property assessed from the lien of said assessment, and for other purposes; and

A bill (H. R. No. 5996) for the relief of J. H. Merrill.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. No. 632) granting a pension to John Taylor;

A bill (S. No. 240) granting an increase of pension to Henry Straw bridge;

A bill (S. No. 1677) to amend an act donating public lands to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts; and

A bill (H. R. No. 3869) for the allowance of certain claims reported by the accounting officers of the United States Treasury Department.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. JACKSON, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1241) granting an increase of pension to Augustus Lempp, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was ordered to be printed; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. GROOME, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1340) granting an increase of pension to Andreas Guille, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. JOHNSTON, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 137) for the relief of William Schuchardt, United States commercial agent at Piedras Negras, Mexico, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WINDOM, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1732) to refund excessive duties levied by overvaluation of Austrian paper florin, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Finance; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Enoch Jacobs, praying for compensation for care of the United States legation at Montevideo, reported adversely thereon, and the committee were discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. No. 44) authorizing the payment of a portion of the Virginius indemnity fund to the mother of General W. A. C. Ryan, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. PLATT, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1409) for the relief of Mrs. Jennie S. Mitchell, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BLAIR, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3390) granting a pension to Sally C. Mulligan, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 149) granting a pension to Charlotte McKay, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 402) granting a pension to James Coffey, of Oregon, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. CAMDEN, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1239) granting a pension to Francis Reichert, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1665) granting a pension to William Ryan, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was ordered to be printed; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. ALDRICH. I am instructed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1259) to refund to the North Carolina Railroad Company certain moneys illegally assessed against and unlawfully collected from it by the United States, to submit an adverse report thereon. I call the attention of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM] to the report.

Mr. RANSOM. Let the bill go on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar, with the adverse report of the committee, which will be printed.

Mr. HARRISON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 298) for the relief of the heirs of William Reynolds, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was ordered to be printed; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 54) for the relief of Charles A. Luke, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. COCKRELL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1102) for the relief of Rufus Ross, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was ordered to be printed; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of members of Stover Post No. 1, Grand Army of the Republic, of New Hampshire, praying that they may be granted condemned cannon for erecting a soldiers' monument, submitted a report thereon, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 1781) to transfer six condemned cast-iron cannon to Stover Post No. 1, of the Grand Army of the Republic, at Portsmouth, New Hampshire, for use on monument to deceased soldiers and sailors.

The bill was read twice by its title, and the report was ordered to be printed.

NORWEGIAN BARK ATLANTIC.

Mr. MORGAN. I am directed by the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 576) to provide for settling by arbitration the question of the liability of the United States for damages to the Norwegian bark Atlantic by collision with the United States steamer Vandalia, and for payment of the same, to report it with an amendment in the nature of a substitute. I am instructed by the Committee on Foreign Relations to ask the Senate to consider the bill at this time. It is a very pressing affair.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations with an amendment, to strike out the bill and the preamble and in lieu thereof to insert:

Whereas, on or about the 31st day of October, 1876, a collision occurred on the high seas between the United States sloop of war Vandalia and the Norwegian bark Atlantic, by which the Atlantic was damaged; and

Whereas the owners of said bark Atlantic, through their government, claim the facts to have been such as would entitle them to recover damages in the admiralty had the said sloop been the property of private parties, which claim is not admitted by the United States; and

Whereas it is desirable that the subjects of a friendly government be granted opportunity to avail themselves of the liability of the Government of the United States in the premises, if any such there be: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the claim of the legal owners of the bark Atlantic, her cargo, freight, and personal effects, alleged to have been damaged by collision with the United States sloop of war Vandalia as aforesaid, be, by the Secretary of State, referred (when so requested by the minister of the Government of Sweden and Norway at this capital) to the Court of Claims, to hear and determine the same to judgment, with right of appeal as in other cases: Provided, That no suit shall be brought under the provisions of this act after six months from the date of the passage thereof.

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to state that the King of Norway and Sweden, as early as April, 1877, invited the attention of the Government of the United States to this subject. No remedy is furnished by the international law for cases of collision between private ships and ships of war. This ship could not be libeled in any court of admiralty for the alleged collision and damage, and some provision was requisite to be made to meet the demands of the owners of the cargo and ship Atlantic. The administration of Mr. Hayes took the subject into consideration and recommended a bill which was reported and, as I remember, passed at the last Congress. That bill provided for an arbitration. The Committee on Foreign Relations, when the bill was referred to it at this Congress, took the advice of the State Department and the present Secretary of State, Mr. Frelinghuysen, and put the bill in the form in which it is now reported as being less expensive and more expeditious.

There cannot be a doubt that it is our duty to provide some remedy in reference to this alleged collision; and the Court of Claims has been selected by the State Department as the most appropriate court in which this subject can be considered. I hope therefore the Senate will pass the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill authorizing the Court of Claims to determine the question of liability of the United States for damages to the Norwegian bark Atlantic by collision with the United States steamer Vandalia."

SOLDIERS' REUNION AT BELLE PLAINE, IOWA.

Mr. HAWLEY. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs to report favorably the joint resolution (H. R. No. 185) granting the use of tents at the soldiers' reunion to be held at Belle Plaine, Iowa, in the month of September or October, 1882.

Mr. ALLISON. As that is a local matter, I ask that it be passed. I hope there will be no objection to it.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. McMILLAN asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1782) for the relief of Francis B. Van Hoesen; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. HALE asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1783) making wire-rope subject to the provisions of section 2513 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1784) granting a pension to Carrie M. Matthews; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. GORMAN asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1785) for the relief of David Mordecai and J. Randolph Mordecai, composing the commercial firm of Mordecai & Co., of Baltimore, Maryland; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. GEORGE. My colleague in the House of Representatives [Mr. MANNING] has introduced a joint resolution in that body which meets my approbation. I therefore ask leave to introduce a similar joint resolution in the Senate, so that it may be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary for consideration.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 59) proposing an amendment to the second section of the third article of the Constitution of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HALE asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1786) authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Saint Croix River at a point near the city of Calais, in the State of Maine; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1787) to authorize the construction of a bridge over the Saint Croix River between the city of Calais, Maine, and Saint Stephens, New Brunswick; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia, asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1788) to amend the law relating to the bonds of executors in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills of the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia:

A bill (H. R. No. 2871) to provide for the extension of the Capitol, North O Street and South Washington Railway;

A bill (H. R. No. 3575) to increase the police force of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. No. 4842) to authorize the Southern Maryland Railway Company to extend a railroad into and within the District of Columbia;

A bill (H. R. No. 5772) to provide for the redemption of outstanding certificates of assessment issued by the late corporation of Washington in cases where the Congress of the United States has since then relieved the property assessed from the lien of said assessment, and for other purposes; and

A bill (H. R. No. 5936) for the relief of J. H. Merrill.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

A bill (H. R. No. 2202) donating condemned cannon and cannonballs to the Soldiers' Monument Association of Birmingham, Connecticut; and

A bill (H. R. No. 3856) to provide for the muster and pay of certain officers of the volunteer forces.

The bill (H. R. No. 4133) to authorize the sale of certain property at Bermuda Hundred, in the county of Chesterfield, in the State of Virginia, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The bill (H. R. No. 4684) to amend section 4400, of title 52, of the Revised Statutes of the United States, concerning the regulation of steam-vessels, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

SUITS IN FEDERAL COURTS.

Mr. VOORHEES. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Judiciary Committee be instructed to inquire if any legislation is necessary, and if so what, to secure a fair and impartial determination of cases triable in the Federal courts of the various States, and more especially the States of the South, wherein the United States may be a party or in any way interested; and that they also inquire into the existing rules of law for the protection of the citizens of said States in all their just constitutional rights and whether any change in the same is expedient and proper; and that they report by bill or otherwise at as early a day as practicable.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is a very interesting resolution; I rather think it had better be printed and go over. I will state, however, to the Senator from Indiana that the Judiciary Committee has on former occasions inquired into many of those topics and has reported more than one bill upon the subject, for the protection of the constitutional and legal rights of citizens in all States; but we have not always been so happy as to obtain the votes of the majority of this body to the passage of such bills. I rather think that there might be some advantageous legislation still brought forward that would still further tend to protect every citizen of the United States, in whatever State he might be, in the enjoyment of those rights which the Constitution secures to him—liberty of person, liberty of opinion, liberty of political action in particular; but inasmuch as the resolution does not possibly embrace all that it might be desirable that the committee should explore, I think it had better be printed and go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will go over for the day, and be printed.

THE BOSTON NAVY-YARD.

Mr. HOAR. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate the title by which the United States holds the navy-yard at Boston, Massachusetts, and whether, in the opinion of the Attorney-General, the land and fixtures of the same, or any part thereof, would be forfeited to the former owners or their heirs by a sale of the same by the United States, or its use for any other purpose than that to which it is now appropriated.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I call the attention of my friend from Massachusetts to the circumstance that his resolution appears to call for an opinion of the Attorney-General? I am afraid that we shall be informed, as we have been on one or two former occasions, and I rather suspect correctly, that it is not within the constitutional duties of the Attorney-General to give his opinion to the Senate upon any topic whatever. I call the attention of my friend to the fact.

Mr. HOAR. I reflected upon that suggestion before framing the resolution, and it seemed to me that this was the proper way to meet it by addressing the request to the President. There is a suggestion of great public importance that it is expedient to make sale of the navy-yard at Boston, which is a piece of property which I understand cost the Government some fifty millions, considering all the expense upon it, and which now, without being of course of any such value as that, is still worth a great many millions of dollars. The best dry-dock in the country is there; also a rope-walk of great length and value, and a good many other ship-building fixtures.

What I want to know is whether that property can be sold or whether the United States holds it by having originally condemned it for the purpose and received only the receipts for damages of the former owners, in which case it is quite probable that appropriating it for any other purpose would cause it to revert to their heirs? In order to get at that information we must have knowledge as to the title, which is in the Navy Department.

I suppose that it is within the discretion of the President, of course, to require the opinion of the Attorney-General upon any public question. I suppose also that it is within the discretion of the President to obtain that opinion and to communicate it to the Senate if he sees fit. Under the peculiar circumstances of this case I thought it would be exactly proper to ask him to do that.

The resolution therefore requests the President, which is all we properly can, to communicate to us, first, the facts as to the title, and second, the opinion of the chief law officer of the Government upon those facts. It is a matter which the President himself will have to act upon if Congress should pass a law to that effect. I suppose that it is not indecorous under the circumstances to make a request to the President to obtain for us the opinion of the law officer of the Government on the subject of this important public property.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Undoubtedly this method is one which is technically legal. We have a right to request the President probably to give us any information in his power; but whether we have a right to request him to obtain the opinion of his law officer or the opinion of any other head of a Department and give it to us—I do not mean in the mere constitutional sense of our right to pass a resolution about anything, but in the correct sense of the separation of the departments of the Government—is another and more serious question.

Of course, if this method should be followed by a response, whenever we wanted the opinion of the Attorney-General or of the Secretary of the Treasury or any other head of a Department about any public affair, it could be obtained in this way, because the President in responding to such a resolution if he once began would feel it almost a necessary duty of courtesy to continue to take opinions that he has a right to from his heads of Departments and send them to us at our request. That would turn the Government, different from its former practices, into what I think is the government of a good many of the States, where the Legislature have a right to call upon the executive for his opinions and for the opinions of the judges and so on. I only make the suggestion to my friend from Massachusetts.

Mr. HOAR. I see the force of that suggestion, but it does seem to me still that under these particular circumstances the suggestion of the Senator is a suggestion which addresses itself to the sound discretion of the two Houses of Congress, not to make such requests except in very peculiar and proper cases. The Secretary of the Navy has the right to ask this opinion of the Attorney-General. By act of Congress the President himself has that right.

Everybody must know that if this project should commend itself to the two Houses of Congress the President would desire to be informed by the Attorney-General in regard to his action as to the condition of the legal title to this property of so many millions of dollars. It seems to me that it would be yielding to a mere formality and scruple if we should wait to have that opinion communicated to the President after we had acted instead of having the benefit of it before we acted.

Mr. HALE. I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts if anything has arisen in his knowledge casting any doubt upon the complete title of the Government to this navy-yard and its appurtenances? I certainly hope that before this session passes some act will go through the two Houses and become a law providing for the consolidation of our navy-yards and the selling of some of those that we cannot only get along without but which, for the convenience and business of the places where they are located, ought to be sold. I only wish, if any questions have arisen about other navy-yards, that the Senator from Massachusetts had embraced them in his resolution, so that if any inquiry is to be made about the complete right of the Government to sell on any act that may be passed by Congress it may be answered when this inquiry is reached.

I do not myself see any great objection to this form of the resolution. We have the opinions of course, as everybody knows, of the Attorney-General upon different subjects called for in one way and another in volumes which every lawyer is somewhat familiar with, which are known from time to time in one way or another; and the opinions are taken as to a degree settling all controverted questions. I hope the resolution will pass. I only wish it had been made broader.

Mr. HOAR. In answer to the Senator from Maine I desire to say that without referring to any matter which it is unparliamentary to refer to, I suppose it is not unparliamentary to say that one branch of the city government of the city of Boston have passed some resolutions, which resolutions affirm that there is a measure pending to dispose of that navy-yard in another branch of Congress.

It is a matter upon which I have absolutely no opinion, so far. There are very wise and intelligent business men in Massachusetts who think it would be for the interest of the Government and the interest of the city of Boston to dispose of and apply that land in the heart of the former city of Charlestown, and now in the heart of the city of Boston, to commercial or business purposes.

Mr. HALE. I suppose that to be the general sentiment there in reference to the matter.

Mr. HOAR. I do not want to go into that. I want the Senator to understand in frankness that I have no opinion to express upon the question at this time. I have not touched bottom in my own examination upon it. But there are three facts that it is very important to know.

First, what is the value of that real estate and fixtures?

Second, whether that property will be forfeited by the United States to the heirs of the former owner if the United States undertake to sell it or devote it to other purposes? I am informed by a very intelligent and respectable gentleman representing Boston in the Massachusetts senate, who has communicated with me upon the subject, that he has examined the title and he finds that the greater part of the land was taken by a process of condemnation of the heirs of one Breed, who I suppose is the person who owned the Breed's Hill where the battle called the Battle of Bunker Hill was fought, and that the only title of the United States is that act of condemnation and the receipt for the damages. If that be true, it presents a very serious question which we want to know something about; I do certainly as one member of the Senate and as a member representing a community specially interested in this subject.

The third question, which is more important than either of the others, is what is the value, in the case of a naval war, of this navy-yard with its arsenal, with the presence of its armored vessels, with its capacity for the repair of vessels in the defense of the great commercial city of Boston, and incidentally also in the defense of the coast where Boston is, and of the still greater commercial city of New York There are some high naval authorities who say that the presence of the navy-yard at Boston, forming a fortress or fortification in the rear, as it were, of any naval force which could be brought to lay it under contribution, would be of the utmost importance to the defense of New York in a naval war. On this question I am as ignorant as the most ignorant person in the community, and in suggesting the question I do not desire to express an opinion upon it until it has been further investigated; but it does seem to me that upon the question of getting at this thing the proper course is the one which I have suggested.

I hope the honorable Senator from Vermont will not see it his duty to interpose an objection of mere ceremonial or form. We want the information from the two Departments of the Government, and the information which is to enter very largely into the final determination of this question, because the President, of course, will ask the opinion of the Attorney-General some time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think I can suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts a modification of his resolution that would meet the difficulty that exists about the matter and accomplish all that he desires, if he will kindly hear it. I suggest to make the resolution read in this way:

That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate any information in the possession of the Executive or the heads of any of the Departments touching the title by which the United States holds the navy-yard at Boston, Massachusetts, and the capacity of the United States to convey a valid title thereto.

That would call upon the President for all the information that he has in his own possession or can obtain from the heads of the Departments. It does not call for an opinion in terms of the Attorney-General, but it calls for all the information that he can communicate to us bearing upon the question; and I have no doubt it will give precisely the same result that my friend would ask for. I should be a little sorry, without further consideration, to commence the practice of calling upon the President in terms for the opinion of the head of any Department upon a question, and as this accomplishes the same result, I ask my friend to accept it.

Mr. HOAR. I have no objection to that modification.

Mr. HALE. I do not want in any way to obstruct the passage of this resolution. Has the Senator from Massachusetts any objection to make the resolution broad enough to include other navy-yards, because if any movement is made in the direction of a consolidation undoubtedly the same questions will arise as to other yards? I would not select different yards——

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Maine will allow me to interpose by suggesting to him that there is no proposition about other navy-yards up now anywhere. There may some arise; but his suggestion would require the getting of information from the Pacific coast and from Key West, while what I desire may be obtained very promptly. I think, therefore, it would be better to let this resolution go through as it is proposed, and then if the Senator will supplement it by another as to all other navy-yards I will cheerfully support it.

Mr. HALE. Then why not say, "or any navy-yard of the United States upon the Atlantic coast?"

Mr. HOAR. Let that form a separate matter. I would rather have this resolution passed now in the shape proposed.

Mr. HALE. I do not want to interfere with the passage of the resolution, but I think it ought to be broad enough to embrace them all.

Mr. BECK. Let the resolution be read as modified.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution as modified will be read.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate any information in the possession of the Executive or the heads of any of the Departments touching the title by which the United States holds the navy-yard at Boston, Massachusetts, and the capacity of the United States to convey a valid title thereto.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as modified.

The resolution as modified was agreed to.

JAPANESE INDEMNITY FUND.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The routine morning business is concluded, and the Senate will proceed to the consideration of bills on the Calendar under the Anthony rule.

Mr. MORGAN. The bill (H. R. No. 1052) in relation to the Japanese indemnity fund was passed over without prejudice when it was reached on the Calendar. I ask the Senate to return to that bill and consider it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator wish to have the bill considered under the Anthony rule?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes; I prefer that it should be considered now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is then before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and will be read.

The bill was read.

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to have the entire report of the committee printed in the RECORD; but I would not probably be warranted in occupying the time of the Senate by having the report read at the Clerk's desk. The committee have been very careful to select the grounds on which the action of the Senate is sought to be predicated for the passage of the bill, so as not to do any injustice to our own Government or to other governments who were in association with us at the time this indemnity fund was paid by Japan, and so as not to cast any reflection whatever upon the diplomatic policy of the Government of the United States or its ministers in its dealings with Japan on this subject. I will therefore ask that the Senate permit the report to be printed in the RECORD without being read in full.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be printed in full in the RECORD.

The report, submitted by Mr. MORGAN February 7, 1882, is as follows:

The Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred Senate bill No. 85, relating to the Japanese indemnity fund, have had the same under consideration, and respectfully report as follows:

The whole amount of the fund received in the Department of State, under the convention of October 24, 1864, with Japan, was $785,000.87 in coin. This was paid in several installments.

This fund was invested in bonds of the United States, of which there are now in the Department of State, to the credit of the "Japanese indemnity," the sum of $1,766,750 in bonds and $130.90 in money.

On the 1st of June, 1882, the collections of interest on the bonds will increase the amount to the credit of the "Japanese indemnity" to $1,793,117.64, if the interest collections for February, April, and May are not reinvested in bonds.

The letter of the Secretary of State annexed to this report, dated 11th January, 1882, gives a full history of the manner in which this fund has been managed in the Department of State, and shows that it has been so managed in accordance with the settled practice of the Government in respect of such funds, which has been to keep them invested so long as Congress chooses to leave them in charge of that Department.

Among the earliest statements of the history of the events out of which this indemnity fund arose, made by a committee of Congress, was that reported to the House of Representatives by Mr. Banks, from the House Committee on Foreign Affairs, May 20, 1872, as follows:

"Commercial intercourse between Japan and Christian nations was commenced by Commodore Perry's expedition from the United States in 1852. A treaty of peace and amity between the United States and Japan was signed the 31st of March, 1854. This was the first treaty made between Japan and foreign powers. It opened the ports of Simoda, in the principality of Idzu, and Hakodadi, in the principality of Matsai, to American vessels, and secured to Americans the freedom of the country within the limits of seven Japanese miles from an island in the harbor of Simoda. It also authorized the appointment of consuls for the United States at Simoda. After an absolute prohibition of communication with foreign nations for two hundred years, diplomatic intercourse was established by the United States. The Portuguese and Dutch had enjoyed the privilege of sending one or two vessels a year to Japan from an early period, but with very limited trade and no intercourse with the people. The success of the United States led England and Russia to send expeditions to Japan, and in the year following the negotiation of the American treaty the same advantages were granted to England, Russia, and Holland. A convention negotiated by Commodore Perry, June 17, 1857, opened the port of Nagasaki, in the principality of Hizen, and secured the right of citizens of the United States to reside permanently at Simoda and Hakodadi. In July, 1858, Mr. Townsend Harris negotiated a commercial treaty for the United States upon the basis of that negotiated between the United States and China in 1854. This treaty permitted the residence of diplomatic agents at Yedo, and the appointment of a minister of Japan, to reside at Washington, and consuls at all ports of the United States. The ports of Kanagawa, Nagasaki, Nee e-gata, and Hiogo were opened in succession at different periods of time to American vessels. Americans were allowed to reside at Yedo and at Osaca for purposes of trade. Religious freedom was secured to Americans, and places of public worship were to be protected by the Japanese Government.

"Intercourse was thus established with the principal Christian nations after an isolation of more than two hundred years. Great opposition was made to the new policy of Japan by some of the native princes, who were sustained by their retainers among the lower orders of the people. The period immediately following the negotiation of the commercial treaty by Mr. Harris was one of violent disorders; the Tycoon was assassinated, one of the principal officers of the foreign legations was murdered, and several legation buildings were burned. The native princes held in their pay masses of the people, who endeavored to intimidate native merchants and destroy the trade with foreigners. Small traders and workingmen were organized against the supporters of the new policy and those engaged in foreign commerce, and some of the most prominent silk merchants were assassinated during the period.

"The rebels against the liberal policy of the Japanese Government seized the forts, and some of the principal naval posts, and made war upon all foreign vessels. The American frigate Wyoming and the merchant ship Pembroke were fired upon in 1863. In 1864, Choshu, Prince of Nagato, who ruled the provinces of Suwo and Nagato, having absolute possession of the Japanese fortifications which commanded the Straits of Simonoseki, and having with him the person of the Mikado, or spiritual ruler, refused to recognize the validity of the treaties concluded by the Tycoon with foreign powers, and closed by force this chief passage to the principal inland sea of the empire.

"In this controversy the Tycoon desired at first to conciliate the anti-foreign party and was disposed to yield to their demands; but he was relieved from that necessity by the support which the treaty powers gave to his government. At his request the forces of the United States, Great Britain, France, and the Netherlands, in Japanese waters, jointly determined to open the straits by force. The campaign opened on the 4th of September, 1864, and lasted five days. The fleets destroyed the batteries commanding the straits, blew up the magazines, threw shot and shell into the sea, carried away seventy cannon, and obtained an unconditional surrender from Prince Choshu, who agreed to pay the expenses of the expedition.

"The treaties were ratified by the Mikado, as they had been before by the Tycoon, thus uniting the two elements of power existing in the Government of Japan, and the liberal foreign policy of the Tycoon was firmly established. The government of the Tycoon, preferring to assume the expenses of the expedition, which Choshu had agreed to pay, entered into the convention of October 22, 1864, stipulating to pay the four powers three millions of dollars, 'this sum to include all claims, of whatever nature, for past aggressions on the part of Nagato, whether indemnity, ransom for Simonoseki, or expenses entailed by the operations of the allied squadrons.' The whole sum was to be paid quarterly in installments of half a million of dollars each."

The lapse of time and the advantages of more perfect means of information prove the accuracy of this statement, and leave only two unimportant errors to be corrected, namely: first, that the Prince of Nagato "had with him the person of the Mikado," in 1864. That prince, with a powerful army, attempted to seize the person of the Mikado, in 1864, shortly before the affair of Simonoseki, but was defeated in his purpose by the forces of the Tycoon, to whom the Mikado appealed for aid. The other error is that the Prince of Nagato "agreed to pay" the expenses of the combined expedition to Simonoseki. In a note to the four powers he intimated his willingness to provide some indemnity, but they refused to hold any diplomatic correspondence with him, and no terms of agreement were suggested, and no such agreement was formulated by him or any of the four powers. Your committee have carefully looked into the history of the connection of our Government with the affairs of Japan during the period above mentioned, and, with the exceptions stated, find it fairly and truly epitomized in the report of Mr. Banks, as above copied.

The convention of the 24th of October, 1864, is in all respects valid, and should be executed in its true spirit and meaning. It has established by treaty the right of all nations, perhaps, at least of all the powers having treaty relations with Japan in 1864, to the free navigation of the inland sea of Japan. And this is a very important result. This question, therefore, and the means by which its solution has been reached, must be considered as settled. The true spirit and meaning of this convention as to the $3,000,000 of indemnity which it provided should be paid by Japan jointly to Great Britain, France, the Netherlands, and the United States, and our duty and just policy as to the disposition we shall make of the portion which the other three powers have, by agreement with our Government, allotted to it, are the only matters that can now be properly open to our consideration.

Your committee are of opinion that the matter of the disposal of this fund is to be determined by our own present sense of duty, and our sentiments of friendship, as a Government, toward Japan, rather than by reference to any fixed policy to be established as a precedent in like cases, or by entering upon a review of the grounds on which the Government acted in this case, with the purpose of reversing or even criticising its conclusions as embodied in this convention.

The return to Japan of so much of this fund, in the custody of the Department of State, as we received from that government, has been kept an open question from the time of the receipt of the first installment, and has been much discussed by our Government from that time to this.

Before the expedition of the four allied powers was sent against Mori Daizen, Prince of Nagato and Suwo, and in the discussion of the terms of the agreement between the four powers, which resulted in the expedition to Simonoseki, and also in the subsequent negotiations which resulted in the convention of October 24, 1864, Mr. Pruyn, our minister to Japan, expressed much solicitude that our peculiar relations of friendship with Japan should not be marred by the possible suspicion on their part that we would accept money from that government as a "salve to wounded honor," or that our policy toward the Japanese people was dictated by mercenary motives.

He recognized the fact that the United States, in 1852, in advance of other powers, and with the highest gratification, had taken Japan by the hand and led her into the circle of the family of commercial nations as a sovereign treaty power, endowed with all the rights and dignity of a great empire.

The just and sensitive respect with which our minister regarded the people and the Government of Japan, in the serious embarrassments which had, in a great measure, grown out of the confidence they had reposed in our Government when they entered into treaty relations with us through the efforts of Commodore Perry, was earnestly felt by the Government and the people of the United States. Mr. Seward expressly instructed him not to make war on Japan. England also gave like instructions to its minister. Our Government was fully conscious of the fact that its newly-established relations with Japan, into which the other great powers had eagerly pressed with claims for equal advantages, was the cause of a complete political, social, and commercial revolution in that empire, which was in rapid progress in 1863 and 1864. Each of the four great organic powers in the Japanese Government—the Mikado, the Shogunate, the feudatory princes, and the people—were struggling for ascendency. And each of the contending factions knew that the treaty with Perry was the cause of this commotion.

Social strife, commercial rivalry, political jealously, court intrigues, partisan conflicts, and destructive wars between each and all of the recognized powers of the empire were prevailing in every part of Japan.

The treaty powers all perfectly understood that the new policy of commercial intercourse with other nations, which they had induced, if they had not forced, Japan to adopt, was the real cause of her then torn and distracted condition.

Under such circumstances a policy of kindness and forbearance toward Japan was entirely becoming on our part, and it was never lost sight of, either by Mr. Pruyn or his successor, Mr. Portman, as chargé d'affaires, or by Mr. Seward, the Secretary of State.

It was essential, in order to meet the exigencies of a situation which seemed to change with almost every day, that a large discretion should be given to our minister in Japan, and that we should act in concert with the other treaty powers. We were engaged in a great civil war at home, and could not spare the ships with which to impress upon the Japanese people a just idea of our power, and for that reason also we did not look very narrowly into the details of the measures that for the time were considered necessary by our minister to compel the Japanese Government and people to observe its treaty engagements with us. Under these circumstances his conduct was approved by the President. Indeed, the President had little discretion in the matter, for the results were accomplished in Japan before they were communicated to him by our minister, owing to the great distance between the two countries.

Our minister, acting by agreement with the representatives of other treaty powers, adopted and carried into effect, without instructions or previous authority from this Government, the most stringent measures against Mori Daizen, a rebellious prince of Japan. He, in conjunction with ministers of other powers, made war on that prince, and held Japan responsible for its cost. He, and the other ministers, concluded the convention of October 24, 1864, and collected an installment of the indemnity which it provided, and remitted it to the United States before Congress had considered the question of its ratification.

Mr. Pruyn, in this unusual and very energetic course of action, was guided by his conceptions of duty to protect the treaty rights of his own Government; and by the consideration (scarcely less important) of still further liberalizing the intercourse of Japan with foreign countries, by gaining additional open ports for their trade, and by removing restrictions upon the exportation of the products of that country.

His conduct was governed by these considerations, and he and the other ministers of the treaty powers were greatly embarrassed by the difficulty in getting reliable information as to the actual political situation in Japan, and in ascertaining the proper authorities upon whom to make demands for the faithful observance of the treaties.

Mr. Pruyn wisely adopted a tentative course in his treatment of the question of the indemnity to be demanded after the success of the expedition to Simonoseki. His real purpose being to cause the opening of additional ports, as well as to keep open the inland sea, and to compel the Mikado to ratify the treaties made by the Tycoon, he, in concert with the other ministers, resorted to the expedient of imposing on Japan a very heavy charge for the expenses of the expedition to Simonoseki—a charge entirely out of proportion to such expenses, and all other losses and indignities suffered by the four powers or their people; and then offered to accept in lieu thereof one or two additional open ports, and the ratification of the treaties by the Mikado.

The government of the Tycoon, with whom all the treaties had been made, eagerly accepted the terms as proposed in negotiating the convention, and proceeded with unusual punctuality to pay the first three quarterly installments.

This alacrity was inspired by a dread of war with the four powerful allies, Great Britain, the Netherlands, France, and the United States, and by the hope that the lapse of time would give the Tycoon the ability to bring the Mikado around to the support of his treaty policy, which looked to the entire emancipation of Japan from the exclusive policy which for centuries had shut her people out from intercourse with other nations. The Tycoon was successful in both respects; the war was arrested, and the Mikado ratified the treaties.

The alternative of substituting the additional open ports for the payment of the $3,000,000 was, by the language of the convention, placed under the option of the four powers, but it is undeniable that this was not the real understanding. Every declaration and act of each of the treaty powers, including Japan, both before and after the convention was signed, is to the effect that Japan had the right to tender additional opened ports in lieu of the money.

The peculiar language of the convention on this point was the result of the apprehension of the Tycoon that if it was left in his power to discharge the money demand by opening the ports, the war which he was then preparing to wage against Nagato and other rebellious princes, to reduce them to obedience, would be regarded by the Japanese people as a war in aid of the foreign powers, and not for the purpose of restoring order and subordination to law within the empire. All the parties to the convention understood that the real purpose was to impose a heavy money demand on Japan to induce all the contending parties there to consent to open other ports to foreign trade.

Mr. Seward, then Secretary of State, understood the situation perfectly, and to keep the duty of the United States fully in the view of Congress and the people, in his letter of January 6, 1868, to Hon. N. P. Banks, chairman of the House Committee on Foreign Relations, he said: "This Government has received from the Japanese Government, without substantial equivalent, as its share of the indemnity stipulated to be paid by that treaty, the sum of $600,000 in gold." Under this impressive denial of our just and equitable right to this money Congress has never attempted to appropriate it to the use of the Government.

This declaration was made before the indemnity was fully paid, and is in perfect accordance with the then well-understood views of our then minister in Japan, and with many express declarations of his predecessor, who took part in framing the convention of October 24, 1864.

The Tycoon and the Mikado, after he had ratified the convention, decided, it is true, to pay the indemnity in preference to opening other ports at the time the demand was made; but it is to be remembered that this was the very question upon which the daimios were then exciting the people of Japan to hostilities against the government of both rulers; and they did not dare at that time to avow their wish to open other ports. The presence of civil war at the doors of the palace of the Mikado prevented him from risking his life and the existence of his government upon that question.

The civil war progressed with great vigor, and the hostile daimios were subdued and reduced in 1868 to the rank of private citizens; and the government, in the convention of July 24, 1878, has agreed to open the port of Simonoseki, and another port to be hereafter agreed upon.

The committee have presented in this brief outline their view of the circumstances under which this convention was made, so that it may be seen that these facts and the recitals of the instrument accord very clearly with the opinion so often expressed by the Presidents of the United States, the Secretaries of State, the committees of the two Houses, and the vote of each House of Congress, that it is our duty to return this fund to Japan.

Ten reports have been made to the two Houses, in which this subject has been carefully considered, and bills providing for the return of this fund have passed each House, but not at the same session of Congress.

While there has been some diversity of opinion in Congress as to the grounds on which our return of this indemnity fund should be based, the duty has been distinctly recognized in all the reports made to Congress on the subject. There has been no adverse report.

The convention is as follows:

"The representatives of the United States of America, Great Britain, France, and the Netherlands, in view of the hostile acts of Mori Daizen, prince of Nagato and Suwo, which were assuming such formidable proportions as to make it difficult for the Tycoon faithfully to observe the treaties, having been obliged to send their combined forces to the Straits of Simonoseki in order to destroy the batteries erected by that daimio for the destruction of foreign vessels and the stoppage of trade; and the government of the Tycoon, on whom devolved the duty of chastising this rebellious prince, being held responsible for any damage resulting to the interests of treaty powers, as well as the expenses occasioned by the expedition:

"The undersigned, representatives of the treaty powers, and Sakai Hida no Kami, a member of his second council, invested with plenipotentiary powers by the Tycoon of Japan, animated with a desire to put an end to all reclamations concerning the acts of aggression and hostility committed by the said Mori Daizen since the first of these acts in June, 1863, against the flags of divers treaty powers, and, at the same time, to regulate definitely the question of indemnities of war, of whatever kind, in respect to the allied expedition to Simonoseki, have agreed and determined upon the four articles following:

"1. The amount payable to the four powers is fixed at $3,000,000, this sum to include all claims of whatever nature for the past aggressions on the part of Nagato, whether indemnities, ransom for Simonoseki, or expenses entailed by the operations of the allied squadrons.

"2. The whole sum to be payable quarterly in installments of one-sixth, or half a million dollars, to begin from the date when the representative powers shall make known to the Tycoon's government the ratification of this convention and the instructions of their respective governments.

"3. Inasmuch as the receipt of money has never been the object of the said powers, but the establishment of better relations with Japan, and the desire to place these on a more satisfactory and mutually advantageous footing is still the leading object in view; therefore, if His Majesty the Tycoon wishes to offer in lieu of payment of the sum claimed and as a material compensation for loss and injuries sustained the opening of Simonoseki or some other eligible port in the inland sea, it shall be at the option of the said foreign governments to accept the same or insist on the payment of the indemnity in money under the conditions above stipulated.

"4. This convention to be formally ratified by the Tycoon's government within fifteen days from the date thereof.

"In token of which the respective plenipotentiaries have signed and sealed the convention, in quintuplicate, with English, Dutch, and Japanese versions, whereof the English shall be considered the original.

"Done at Yokohama, this 22d day of October, 1864, corresponding to the 22d day of the ninth month of the first year of Gengi."

The following analysis of the recitals in the preamble to the convention is believed to present the case fairly, and may assist in coming to a correct interpretation of the agreement:

1. That Mori Daizen was "a rebellious prince;" his rebellion being against the lawful authority of the Tycoon, with whose government we then held treaty relations fully recognizing its imperial power.

2. That the Prince of Nagato had committed acts of aggression and hostility, the first of which was in June, 1863, "against the flags of divers treaty powers," none of which are named.

3. That the hostile acts of "this prince were assuming such formidable proportions as to make it difficult for the Tycoon to faithfully perform the treaties."

4. That the four powers were "obliged to send their combined forces to the Straits of Simonoseki, in order to destroy the batteries erected by that daimio for the destruction of foreign vessels and the obstruction of trade."

5. That "the duty of chastising this rebellious prince" devolved on the government of the Tycoon.

6. That, in consequence, the government of the Tycoon was "held responsible for any damage resulting to the interests of the treaty powers, as well as the expenses occasioned by the expedition" to Simonoseki.

7. That the minister Hida no Kami, "invested with plenipotentiary powers by the Tycoon of Japan," and the representatives of the treaty powers "were animated by a desire to put an end to all reclamations concerning the acts of aggression and hostility committed by said Mori Daizen since the first of these acts in June, 1863, against the flags of divers treaty powers;" and were also animated with the desire "at the same time to regulate definitely the question of indemnities of war, of whatever kind, in respect to the allied expedition to Simonoseki."

8. On this basis of facts, and for these purposes, the agreement was entered into.

Construing these recitals most strongly against Japan, there is nothing in them to indicate why that Government should pay "ransom for Simonoseki," and it is beyond dispute that the Government of Japan had paid in full for all "past aggressions on the part of the Prince of Nagato," to each of the treaty powers, except France, under separate agreements (in each case) not included in this convention. So that nothing was left to be provided for with the $3,000,000, so far as the United States were concerned, besides the "expenses entailed by the operations of the allied squadrons," and the claims of the officers and crew of the Wyoming, and the claim of the United States for injuries sustained by that ship. Japan had apologized in the most humble way for the affront to the flags of the treaty powers, and had disclaimed all participation in the insult so offered.

The convention, therefore, is silent as to that grievance as a ground for pecuniary compensation, in stating the account of "all claims of whatever nature," which the sum of $3,000,000 was intended to cover. It speaks only of "indemnities," the "ransom of Simonoseki, and the expenses entailed by the operations of the combined expedition."

This sum was greatly disproportioned to the expenses of that expedition, so far as the United States was concerned.

We only expended $11,608, including the charter-party of the Ta-Kiang, and coal, and the ammunition expended. We lost no men and sustained no actual damage. The officers and men we sent on the expedition were taken from the Jamestown, and drew the same pay they would on board that ship.

This is the whole case as it appears in the convention.

We selected this ground for our demand of idemnity, and put our case upon it in the preamble to the convention. We had no other available ground to rest it upon; but if we had, we are concluded by the ground thus voluntarily assumed.

If Japan had been then, as it has since become, a nation enlightened in the knowledge of the laws of nations, it might have appealed with effect to those laws upon the question of its liability for the acts of a rebellious prince against powers whose relations with the empire were peaceful.

It is difficult to perceive in such a case how Japan, under the law of nations, could be held bound for such acts, unless that government gave the Prince of Nagato secret encouragement, or, being able to prevent his depredations, neglected to do so. Both these grounds of complaint are negatived by the recitals of the convention; and the contemporaneous history of those events as plainly relieves the Government of Japan from any just ground of censure for the conduct of the Prince of Nagato.

The convention and the statements made in our diplomatic correspondence show clearly that the expedition to Simonoseki was sent out with the express approval of the government of the Tycoon, and with all its consequences and results it was afterward sanctioned and approved by the Mikado.

The combined powers were the friends and allies of Japan, and not its enemies.

They sent out the expedition to wage a war that Japan, in the convention, admitted it was the duty of that government to wage, and the expenses of which it voluntarily assumed, and paid to the United States thirtyfold the amount of injury and expenses it had sustained.

The treaty powers proposed on several occasions to take the port of Simonoseki and the adjacent coasts of the inland sea and deliver them to the Tycoon as imperial territory. This he declined, preferring not so seriously to disturb the ancient order of the government. Being his allies, and having made these overtures, there seems to be no just ground for the mention in the convention of the "ransom of Simonoseki."

The four powers were as much interested in protecting the freedom of the seas as was Japan.

No treaty had ever declared this inland sea open to the ships of the world Grant that it was so open, it was not a treaty obligation of Japan to keep it open. That was the common right of every power, and, by consequence, the duty of every power. But Japan conceded the point of duty to keep it open, and in obtaining the aid of others to perform this duty, she has also conceded the obligation to pay the entire expenses of the expedition. She has bound herself by these means; but the question remains, can the United States afford now to hold her to this obligation and compel her to pay expenses that were never incurred?

Your committee are convinced that we cannot now afford to take that ground with a government which, though many centuries older than the United States, is still our grateful foster-child in the great family circle of nations.

Japan has at great expense uncomplainingly kept in line with the most advanced ideas of our own Government in the adoption for her people of all the beneficent treaty relations between the governments of the world, and in her internal policy has made a progress that is the marvel of the age.

The Tycoon and the daimios, representing a powerful and harsh feudal system, have alike fallen under the effects of the civilization we have been so greatly interested in planting in Japan; and now the empire is about to secure to its people the guarantees of a liberal constitution. This has cost Japan long and wasting civil wars, and has already run up her public debt to a very large sum. The money with which she has paid the three millions indemnity cost her 9 per cent. per annum in London and is not yet all paid.

This convention contains a statement of the objects for which it was made, namely: "The establishment of better relations with Japan, and to place these on a more satisfactory and mutually advantageous footing." It declares such to be "still the leading object in view." It then points out the means by which this object may be obtained, namely: "As a material compensation for the loss and injuries sustained, the opening of Simonoseki or some other port in the inland sea."

As a preface to this declaration, there is an earnest protestation in the third article of the convention, "that the receipt of money has never been the object of said powers."

If the object so earnestly desired by the four powers has been granted without injurious delay, and without any new and unreasonable condition, it should, equitably, be accepted as a satisfaction "in lieu of the payment of the sum claimed," inasmuch as "the receipt of money has never been the object of said powers, but the establishment of better relations with Japan on a more satisfactory and mutually advantageous footing."

These declarations had been frequently made to the government of the Tycoon, and to the Mikado, by each of the four powers, and were understood by the Japanese Government as being continuing offers on the part of the four powers to take the open ports, or some equivalent advantage, in lieu of indemnity. In the negotiations for this convention, the signing of the treaties by the Mikado and the reduction of duties on Japanese imports and exports were more than suggested as topics of discussion. But the convention did not include these demands. It was then too early to insist on these projects, and they were deferred until the power should be gained, by the imposition of exorbitant pecuniary demands upon Japan, then greatly in need of money, to compel that government to yield to these demands. As soon as the convention was signed, then the new demands were pressed upon Japan, while the hope of a release from the $3,000,000 was kept constantly in her view. Japan could not then open new ports, and she eagerly accepted the conditions of a reduction of the tariff and the ratification of the treaties by the Mikado as a means of inducing some leniency in the extension of the time of the payments of the pecuniary indemnity.

The letter of Mr. Pruyn, of October 28, 1864, to Mr. Seward, states further the animus of the four treaty powers in levying this "pecuniary fine," as he rightly styles the $3,000,000 indemnity.

In that letter he says, speaking of the convention:

"I am unable to regard it with unmixed satisfaction. * * * The declaration embodied in it 'that the receipt of money has never been the object of the treaty powers, but the establishment of better relations with Japan, and the desire to place them on a more satisfactory and mutually advantageous footing, is still the leading object in view,' met my most hearty approval. It is highly honorable to the treaty powers, and will, in my judgment, if acted on, greatly promote their interests. It would be a great misfortune should the opinion prevail that money alone can atone for injuries.

* * * * * * *

"The British minister and myself, prior to meeting the Japanese commissioners, had agreed on $2,000,000 as the sum to be paid, and would have had no difficulty in its division among the powers interested. But some difference was suggested as likely to arise from the considerations whether the moral support afforded was not entitled to weight in such adjustment, and I did not feel that it was incumbent on me to interpose any objection to this view, as the moral support afforded by the United States was considerably in excess of the material support I was enabled to give. I therefore readily agreed to the reference of this delicate question to the home governments, with the understanding that a memorandum which I prepared should be signed and accompany the convention, so as to provide an equitable basis, if any should become desirable or necessary, by reason of payment of the indemnity being demanded by them. I assented more readily to the proposition of the envoy of His Imperial Majesty the Emperor of the French to fix the amount at three millions of dollars, because I thought it more likely to lead to the substitution of a port as the material compensation for the expenses of the expedition.

"Should the Tycoon be averse to the opening of another port, and fail to make such offer in lieu of the payment of indemnities and expenses, the amount agreed will not be regarded as unreasonable. But should he make the offer, it will be at the option of the four great powers to accept it in full or in part payment, and in that event a moderate pecuniary fine may be imposed.

"In either case provision will be made for a reasonable indemnity for damages sustained by the Wyoming and Monitor, and for the insult to our flag offered by the attack on those vessels as well as on the Pembroke, the owners of which have received from the Japanese Government a sum which covers their loss as estimated by themselves."

France and the Netherlands have constantly indicated their preference for the pecuniary indemnity to the acceptance of additional open ports. The United States have urgently insisted on the extension of their trade with Japan, and have assiduously cultivated every opportunity to prove to Japan that they were honest in the desire to see that country build up in real prosperity, in solid growth, and in national wealth and power.

Great Britain demanded the ratification of the treaties by the Mikado, the opening of the ports, and a reduction of the Japanese tariff on imports to the lowest rate.

The United States, with unwise complaisance, joined in the movement for restricting the tariff laws of Japan, by which that government has almost lost the means of self-support. They have recently found it necessary to attempt an act of justice to Japan by ratifying a convention, subject to ratification by other powers, to restore Japan to her rightful and indispensable authority over her own sources of revenue.

Japan could not afford, until a recent date, to encourage a policy of free intercourse with foreign governments. Her people were religiously wedded to the exclusive system, and she could not venture to force a policy that was so radically opposed to the sentiment of her people. Her troubles and embarrassments on this score have become more apparent by the lapse of time, and we are now better prepared to do Japan justice, in weighing the motives of her conduct, than we were twenty years ago.

It is now known to all civilized nations that she has emerged from the thralldom of a traditional policy of exclusiveness, to which her people were bound by their religious faith, and by bitter memories of former persecutions and sufferings at the hands of foreigners, with wise and steady steps, and with far greater success than would have been possible if the movement had been more rapid and compulsory. Japan deserves our sympathy and help in her great and unexampled efforts to bring her thirty millions of people up to the full enjoyment of the benefits of a high civilization.

This was the object that we stated to be chiefly in view in the convention of October, 1864.

THE CASE OF THE WYOMING.

This convention makes no specific mention of the visit of the war steamer Wyoming to the Straits of Simonoseki in 1863, nor does it mention the firing upon the merchant ship Pembroke, as events that gave rise to a claim for compensation by the United States. The owners of the Pembroke had been extravagantly compensated for all their losses before the convention was agreed upon.

Our minister, in his dispatch (No. 48) of July 24, 1863, to Mr. Seward, referring to the visit of the Wyoming to Simonoseki, from whence it had just returned, imputed the conduct of Prince Nagato to "the hostility of the daimios," and accusing the Mikado and Tycoon of complicity with him, said "his acts, if justified by the government, constituted war; if disowned, were acts of piracy."

In his letter to the Japanese ministers of foreign affairs of July 20, 1863, our minister says:

"The attack on the Pembroke was an act of piracy which required immediate punishment; as it was also an insult to and a defiance of His Majesty the Tycoon, in treating as enemies those whom he regards as friends. I regret that your excellencies did not propose to inflict the punishment yourselves, or to unite your flag with ours in doing so. This you doubtless omitted to do, as all your forces were required at Osaka for the defense of His Majesty the Tycoon."

On the 22d of July he wrote the same ministers, saying:

"I was happy to hear the above-named governors disavow, on your behalf, these criminal acts of that prince, and it will contribute to a good understanding and the friendship which has thus far so happily existed between the United States and Japan if your excellencies shall give practical effect and value to that disavowal by causing ample reparation to be made for the insult and injury to both the Pembroke and the Wyoming."

Thus it will be seen that we attacked the Prince Nagato as a pirate, exonerated the Japanese Government from criminal complicity with him, still claimed them as friends, and made excuse for their inability, in consequence of the situation at Osaka, to aid us in the attack on Simonoseki. But our minister seemed to overlook the definition of piracy in applying that charge to Nagato. He did not make an assault on our ships animo furendi, but to vindicate his asserted sovereignty over the inland sea at the Straits of Simonoseki.

The convention of October 24, 1864, also settled that matter. The battle with the Wyoming was after the 1st of June, 1863, from which date the convention includes "all claims, of whatever nature, for the past aggressions on the part of the Prince Nagato."

As all other claims in favor of the United States or our people had been paid by Japan, except the expenses of the expedition and the "insult and injury" to the Wyoming, and as our minister, on July 22, 1864, "demanded ample reparation to be made for the insults and injury to both the Pembroke and the Wyoming" by the Government of Japan, there can remain no doubt that the indemnities "provided by the convention included the injuries to the Wyoming and her crew."

If this construction of the convention is correct it is conclusive as to our duty to apply the money received, as far as necessary, to the indemnification of officers and crews of the Wyoming and Ta Kiang, and to the expenses of the ships, and for repairs, &c.

The treaty is, to us, the supreme law. But this duty becomes entirely clear when it is remembered that we received $140,000, out of the $3,000,000, above our aliquot part of the fund, in consideration that our ships had been fired upon by the Prince of Nagato.

This was a voluntary concession of the other powers, made to us for this reason, and we so accepted the money.

Japan has no claim for this part of the fund against the United States. Indeed, she has never made a claim for the portion of the $3,000,000 paid to us. But it is well understood that she admires and applauds the conduct of the Wyoming, and freely acknowledges the value of her services in bringing the Prince of Nagato to submission to Japanese laws and to the observance of the rights of the maritime nations, and would be glad to see that the United States had recognized the services and valor of her officers and men, as well as those of the Ta Kiang, in the substantial manner proposed by the bill referred to the committee.

The country has become familiar with the splendid action of the Wyoming in the Straits of Simonoseki, which gives to the history of our naval exploits one of its brightest chapters. But it is proper that this committee should again ask the attention of the Senate to the matter.

The following statement of that engagement is taken from the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate, made by Mr. Scott, on the 9th of July, 1870. The committee then recorded these facts with evident and just satisfaction and pride:

"In obedience to the orders of the properly constituted authorities of the United States Government, the Wyoming weighed anchor at Kanagawa on the 13th of July, 1863, and set out on her voyage to the Straits of Simonoseki. She entered the bay of Simonoseki on the morning of the 16th of July. When she approached the entrance of the bay the fort next to her fired a signal gun, which was answered by all the forts and by the ships in the harbor. At this time the Wyoming had no flag up, but upon the signals being fired she hoisted her flag and proceeded into the bay, keeping as close as she could to the northern shore, contrary to the expectations of the Japanese. The first fort immediately opened a heavy fire upon her, and so did all the others, as she moved slowly along shelling the forts with such an effect as to silence such of them as received her fire. The men in the forts which received shells from the Wyoming were observed to rush out and jump from the heights in such a precipitate manner as to lead to the belief that the shells must have told with greater effect and done more damage than the Japanese anticipated.

"The bark and the brig Laurick, the two vessels which fired on the Pembroke, were still there, and another vessel also, the steamer Lancefield. These vessels lay close under the town, the bark being inside, the Laurick next to her, and the Lancefield outside with steam up and a great number of men on board, apparently making preparations to approach and board the Wyoming. Captain McDougal ordered the Wyoming to be taken in between the Lancefield and the Laurick, and prepared to give each of them a broadside in passing. The Laurick fired first, but immediately afterward the Wyoming delivered her broadside on the two Japanese and sent a ball through the stern of the Laurick in such a way as to leave her apparently sinking. The Wyoming moved on slowly, firing into the forts and the town as she went, and making a curve to enable her to return to fire on the ships again; but as she was turning the Lancefield moved on across the track of the Wyoming further into the bay to escape at the western outlet; but the Wyoming, while curving, brought her great pivot gun to bear on the Lancefield in her new position and sent a ball right through her boiler, causing her to blow up and scattering destruction through every part of the vessel. Steam, cinders, &c., were blown out in all directions, and such of the crew as were not immediately overwhelmed jumped overboard. The Wyoming returned under a slack fire from the forts, and, having done all that she deemed necessary for that time, she returned to Kanagawa to report what had taken place. She arrived here about two a. m. on the 20th of July. The engagement lasted an hour and ten minutes. The Wyoming received eleven shots and had four men killed in action and seven wounded, one of whom died on the passage back.

"This is substantially the description of the engagement as it appears in the Japan Commercial News of July 22, 1863."

The official accounts of the engagement are even more flattering to Commander McDougal and his men, since they show that he was in strange waters, in a narrow channel where the current was very strong, with Japanese for pilots, who protested that he could not float his ship on the line he selected, near the shore, to avoid the fire of the batteries, and that his remarkable success was due to the most intrepid courage, and to the highest skill in handling his ship.

In a letter of Hon. George S. Fisher, United States consul at Yokohama at that time, he thus speaks of the value of the ships sunk and disabled and grounded by the Wyoming:

"The vessels destroyed by the Wyoming were the British brig Alert, clipper built, twelve guns, and very superior sailing vessel. She was sold to the Japanese Government for $45,000, Mexican money.

"The British steamer (iron) Lancefield, sold but a few weeks previously ostensibly to the Japanese Government, but really to or for the Prince of Nagato for $160,000, Mexican money, and the American bark Daniel Webster, sold also to the Japanese Government for $22,000, Mexican money.

"These vessels, with the batteries placed upon the Lancefield and Webster, and the other public property of the enemy upon three destroyed, amounted in value to full $300,000, or $550,000 of our money."

It may be that no statute of the United States precisely covers this claim, and permits its recovery as prize-money in favor of the officers and crews of the Wyoming and Ta Kiang. If so, that is a sufficient reason for a special enactment. The justice and equity of the case seem clearly to require that Congress should make a substantial recognition of the exceptional heroism of these brave men.

Many of them, and the widows and children of those killed in battle, or who have since died, are in necessitous condition. Some are very poor. They appeal to Congress for this act of justice which has been delayed now nearly twenty years.

Their claim is based upon the convention by which they were intended to be provided for; upon the fact that $140,000 was set apart for them by the other contracting powers and paid to the United States in virtual trust for them; and upon the precedents in cases analogous to this, where Congress has not hesitated to make provision for the crews of ships that have rendered services to the country of conspicuous merit.

Congress by special acts awarded:

1. To the officers and crew of the United States frigate Constitution, for destruction of the British frigate Guerriere, $50,000, to be distributed as prize-money, (2 Statutes at Large, 818.)

2. To Captain William Bainbridge, his officers and crew, for the destruction of the British frigate Java, $50,000, to be distributed as prize-money, (2 Statutes at Large, 818.)

3. To the officers and crew of the sloop of war Wasp, for the capture of the British sloop of war Frolic, $25,000, (2 Statutes at Large, 818.)

4. To Captain Oliver H. Perry and the officers and crew of his squadron, for the capture of British vessels on Lake Erie, September 10, 1813, $255,000, and $5,000 to Captain Perry in addition to his share of the aforesaid sum, (3 Statutes at Large, 130.)

5. To the officers and crew of the sloop of war Wasp, for the capture and destruction of the British vessels Reindeer and Avon, $50,000, and one year's pay in addition, (3 Statutes at Large, 296.)

6. To Commodore Decatur, his officers and crew, for the capture of Algerian vessels, which were afterward released and restored to the Dey of Algiers, $100,000, (3 Statutes at Large, 315, 316.)

7. To the officers and crew of the United States steamer Kearsarge, for the destruction of the Alabama, $190,000, the full estimated value of the Alabama, (17 Statutes at Large, 9, 53.)

This fund has been in the possession of the Government of the United States since it was received by our ministers. The Government has forborne to appropriate it, because it preferred to await the course of events, which might make it proper to return it to Japan, or else to cover it into the Treasury.

The increasing cordiality of our relations with Japan, and the freedom of commercial intercourse with that country, invite us to a course of corresponding liberality.

The committee report the bill without amendment and recommend that it pass.

APPENDIX.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
January 11, 1882.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 5th instant, asking for certain information in regard to the Japan indemnity, and in reply to forward herewith a report on said indemnity, in answer to your several inquiries.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

FRED'K T. FRELINGHUYSEN.

Hon. J. T. MORGAN, United States Senate.

[Report.]

BUREAU OF ACCOUNTS, January 10, 1882

SUBJECT: JAPANESE INDEMNITY.

Receipts on account—Avails of drafts on Baring Brothers.

Date.	Sterling.	Coin.	Currency.

	88,881 18 10	431,463 44	586,125 87

The above constituted the first, second, and third installments, the first of which by general consent of the representatives in Japan of the four powers was remitted to the British treasury; the portion belonging to the United States was turned over by the treasury to the United States minister in London, and by him deposited with Baring Brothers, and drawn thence by the agent of this Department.

In June and July, 1867, $585,000 were invested in 10-40 United States registered bonds, at a premium of 2⅞ per cent.

An annual interest, 5 per cent., payable semi-annually, on the 1st March and 1st September, was received on these bonds.

The interest, received in gold, was sold at a premium of about 40 per cent. in 1868; of from 38 per cent. to 32 per cent. in 1869. The March (1870) interest was sold at a premium of only 12¾ per cent.

The fourth and fifth installments, amounting to £54,562 10*s.*, and the sixth installment, £26,984 7*s.* 6*d.*, in all £81,546 17*s.* 6*d.*, were received by the Department of State as follows:

On March 4, 1875, $364,000, 10-40 bonds, and the balance, £6,546 7*s.* 6*d.* in $31,860, coin, making the whole amount received $785,000.87.

The investments continued to be made in ten-forties and in new 5 percents of 1881 (both United States registered bonds) until on the 15th of May, 1879, when $1,208,000 10-40 United States bonds were converted by and at the Treasury Department into $1,208,000 of 4 per cent. consols, and $11,831.78 cash.

From that date the investments of interest were mainly made in 4 per cent. consols until the 6th of July, 1881, when $300,000 United States registered bonds of the loan of 1881 were extended for a like amount of 3½ per cent. United States bonds, similarly registered, and $4,204.04 cash.

Investments since that date have been mainly made in 3½ per cent. United States registered bonds.

The amount of bonds now in the custody of the Department and belonging to the Japanese indemnity is as follows:

Four per cent. consols	$1,418,850 00
Fives, extended, 3½ per cent	347,900 00
Amount of bonds	1,766,750 00
In order to show the amount of this indemnity as it will be on the 30th June, 1882, it is necessary to add:
Amount in agent's hands	$130 90
Interest which will be due February 1, 1882, on 3½ per cent. bonds	3,044 12
Interest which will be due May 1, 1882	3,044 12
Interest due April 1, on 4 per cent. consols	20,148 50

The 4 per cent. consols are to-day worth a premium of over 17½ per cent. The fives, extended, bear a premium of over 2 per cent.

Investments have been made from time to time under the direction of the Secretary, who enjoined economy in purchases of bonds. Such has been the custom of the Department with reference to the Geneva award, Chinese and other indemnities of lesser importance.

Schedule of 4 per cent. consols of the United States registered in the name of the Secretary of State of the United States, belonging to the Japanese indemnity.

Mr. MORGAN. A brief summary of the facts upon which this report is based, and upon which twelve reports have been made now in the two Houses of Congress, all favorable to the action that is proposed to be taken in the pending bill, is found in one of the first reports, made on the 20th of May, 1872, by Mr. Banks, who was then chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives.

Mr. INGALLS. Will the Senator have that report read?

Mr. MORGAN. I will read Mr. Banks's report, or, if the Senator prefers, I will send it to the desk to be read there.

Mr. INGALLS. Let it be read by the Chief Clerk.

The Principal Legislative Clerk read as follows:

Commercial intercourse between Japan and Christian nations was commenced by Commodore Perry's expedition from the United States in 1852. A treaty of peace and amity between the United States and Japan was signed the 31st of March, 1854. This was the first treaty made between Japan and foreign powers. It opened the ports of Simoda, in the principality of Idzu, and Hakodadi, in the principality of Matsai, to American vessels, and secured to Americans the freedom of the country within the limits of seven Japanese miles from an island in the harbor of Simoda. It also authorized the appointment of consuls for the United States at Simoda. After an absolute prohibition of communication with foreign nations for two hundred years, diplomatic intercourse was established by the United States. The Portuguese and Dutch had enjoyed the privilege of sending one or two vessels a year to Japan from an early period, but with very limited trade and no intercourse with the people. The success of the United States led England and Russia to send expeditions to Japan, and in the year following the negotiation of the American treaty the same advantages were granted to England, Russia, and Holland. A convention negotiated by Commodore Perry, June 17, 1857, opened the port of Nagasaki, in the principality of Hizen, and secured the right of citizens of the United States to reside permanently at Simoda and Hakodadi. In July, 1858, Mr. Townsend Harris negotiated a commercial treaty for the United States upon the basis of that negotiated between the United States and China in 1854. This treaty permitted the residence of diplomatic agents at Yedo, and the appointment of a minister of Japan, to reside at Washington, and consuls at all ports of the United States. The ports of Kanagawa, Nagasaki, Nee-e-gata, and Hiogo were opened in succession at different periods of time to American vessels. Americans were allowed to reside at Yedo and at Osaca for purposes of trade. Religious freedom was secured to Americans, and places of public worship were to be protected by the Japanese Government.

Intercourse was thus established with the principal Christian nations after an isolation of more than two hundred years. Great opposition was made to the new policy of Japan by some of the native princes, who were sustained by their retainers among the lower orders of the people. The period immediately following the negotiation of the commercial treaty by Mr. Harris was one of violent disorders; the Tycoon was assassinated, one of the principal officers of the foreign legations was murdered, and several legation buildings were burned. The native princes held in their pay masses of the people, who endeavored to intimidate native merchants and destroy the trade with foreigners. Small traders and workingmen were organized against the supporters of the new policy and those engaged in foreign commerce, and some of the most prominent silk merchants were assassinated during the period.

The rebels against the liberal policy of the Japanese Government seized the forts and some of the principal naval posts, and made war upon all foreign vessels. The American frigate Wyoming and the merchant ship Pembroke were fired upon in 1863. In 1864, Choshu, Prince of Nagato, who ruled the provinces of Suwo and Nagato, having absolute possession of the Japanese fortifications which commanded the Straits of Simonoseki, and having with him the person of the Mikado, or spiritual ruler, refused to recognize the validity of the treaties concluded by the Tycoon with foreign powers, and closed by force this chief passage to the principal inland sea of the empire.

In this controversy the Tycoon desired at first to conciliate the anti-foreign party, and was disposed to yield to their demands; but he was relieved from that necessity by the support which the treaty powers gave to his government. At his request the forces of the United States, Great Britain, France, and the Netherlands, in Japanese waters, jointly determined to open the straits by force. The campaign opened on the 4th of September, 1864, and lasted five days. The fleets destroyed the batteries commanding the straits, blew up the magazines, threw shot and shell into the sea, carried away seventy cannon, and obtained an unconditional surrender from Prince Choshu, who agreed to pay the expenses of the expedition.

The treaties were ratified by the Mikado, as they had been before by the Tycoon, thus uniting the two elements of power existing in the Government of Japan, and the liberal foreign policy of the Tycoon was firmly established. The government of the Tycoon, preferring to assume the expenses of the expedition, which Choshu had agreed to pay, entered into the convention of October 22, 1864, stipulating to pay the four powers $3,000,000, "this sum to include all claims, of whatever nature, for past aggressions on the part of Nagato, whether indemnity, ransom for Simonoseki, or expenses entailed by the operations of the allied squadrons." The whole sum was to be paid quarterly in installments of half a million of dollars each.

Mr. MORGAN. That statement of facts is correct with two exceptions. The first incorrect statement is that the Prince of Nagato had with him the person of the Mikado in 1864. That prince, with a powerful army, attempted to seize the person of the Mikado in 1864, shortly before the affair of Simonoseki, but was defeated in his purpose by the forces of the Tycoon, to whom the Mikado appealed for protection. The other error is that the Prince of Nagato agreed to pay the expenses of the combined expedition to Simonoseki. In a note to the four powers he informed them of his willingness to pay some indemnity, but they refused to hold any diplomatic correspondence with him and no terms of agreement were suggested and no such agreement was formulated by him with any of the four powers. In truth, in the convention which we signed and in all of the negotiations which led to the adoption of that convention, the conduct of the Prince of Nagato was characterized as that of a rebellious prince against the Japanese Government. We assumed that he held such a relation as that to the government; and it was for the protection of the interests of the commerce of the world at large that we engaged really in behalf of the Government of Japan and in conjunction to some extent with it in endeavoring to put down this rebellious prince.

I desire to say that the committee, in considering this question and in coming to the conclusions at which they have arrived, and in which, as I have said, they followed ten reports which had been made before in the two Houses, thought that it was best to plant themselves upon the language of the convention itself, which is found in the report on page 6.

Take this convention, read it by its four corners, interpret it according to the context throughout, and there seems to be no doubt left at all that the money that we received from Japan, whether as indemnity or whether as ransom money, or whatever character we may choose to attribute to it, was received upon a condition expressed in the convention. It not only created the expedition but created on our part an engagement that we would not demand or accept this money in the event that Japan would carry into effect the course which had been inaugurated in the treaty with Commodore Perry ten years before, in 1853, for the opening of Japan to the commerce of the world. I will read the convention, in order that the Senate may have a distinct view of the obligations into which we entered with the Government of Japan when we received our part of the three million dollars of money taken from her.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. On that point will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I desire to know if Japan, through any of her accredited representatives, has insisted upon the fulfillment of the conditions of which the Senator speaks as entitling her to a return of this money?

Mr. MORGAN. I will state what has been the attitude of Japan on this subject. I state it with some hesitancy, because it sets a much higher example to the civilized nations of the world than they themselves have set upon frequent occasions. Japan has not come to the United States, to the Netherlands, to France, or to Great Britain with any demand, or anything. She has left it to the honor of the people of the United States at the time of the receipt of this money to determine what was our duty in the premises, and also in reference to several other things in regard to which we have had relations with Japan since 1863.

After one-half of the four installments had been received, and before the remaining half was received by the Secretary of State, the House of Representatives, by a very decided vote, resolved that they would not receive the remaining part of the indemnity fund. The bill came to the Senate, where it was lost for want of time to consider it here. The Senate took no adverse action upon that bill, which had passed the House. Japan, during the time that she was paying this money, frequently called the attention of our Government and of the other consorted powers to the fact that she was in very great strait; that she was making every possible effort to comply with the conditions in the convention itself, and beseechingly implored us that we would postpone at least the time of the payment of the balance. Mr. Seward, at the time the first of this money was received, declared, in a communication which was sent to the Congress of the United States, that the Government of the United States was in possession of a certain portion of this fund which had been received from Japan without any just equivalent. No more emphatic declaration could have possibly been placed before the world than that. The Congress of the United States immediately commenced action upon the subject, and, as I have stated, the House passed a bill declining to receive the remaining one-half of this indemnity fund, as it is called.

The Government of Japan of course saw what was the action of the Government of the United States both in its legislative and executive branches; and giving us credit for sincerity, giving us credit for a due respect to the obligations which we had placed in the convention itself, Japan has wisely, prudently, thoughtfully, and decently allowed the Government of the United States to proceed with this matter in its own way, without the slightest intervention or the slightest imploration on its part. Nevetheless that government has been all the time anxiously awaiting our action. [The President pro tempore rapped with his gavel.] I will ask the Senate for unanimous consent that I may proceed to explain the bill. I shall not trespass a moment longer than necessary for that purpose.

Mr. INGALLS. This bill is of too great magnitude and involves the consideration of questions of too great importance, both to the Treasury and as a precedent to guide action in similar cases hereafter, to be decided under the operation of the Anthony rule. I shall either object to the consideration of the bill at this time, if the rule is to be insisted upon, or else ask the Senator from Alabama to let it go over until it can be taken up and fully discussed. If the rule can be abrogated by the consent of the Senate, about which I express no opinion, then of course the discussion can proceed; but obviously, in a matter involving the return of more than a million dollars to the Japanese Government, it is grotesque to ask that it shall be considered under the application of the five-minute rule.

Mr. MORGAN. A personal explanation is due to me, after the remark of the Senator from Kansas, for bringing the bill to the attention of the Senate.

Mr. INGALLS. I make no reflection on the Senator from Alabama at all.

Mr. MORGAN. Not the slightest, only as it is "grotesque" to bring such a bill before the Senate, unless I should have done so with the expectation that the Senate by unanimous consent would give to each Senator who desired to debate the bill at least fifteen minutes, which I supposed the Senate would do, inasmuch as we have transacted a large amount of routine business and private business at this session of the Senate, more than was ever known before by half, I believe, to be transacted; and there are so many matters of weighty consideration pressing upon the attention of the Senate in the usual course of business that I thought it was my duty to ask for the consideration of this bill. I thereupon took the advice of the Committee on Foreign Relations, and they concurred with me that perhaps it would be better, inasmuch as the Senate had recently been somewhat indulgent upon this subject, to ask to have this bill considered in the morning hour. I do not think that the debate would last on my part over fifteen minutes.

Mr. BUTLER. I concur with the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. INGALLS.] It seems to me that this is a bill of too much consequence to be considered under the five-minute rule. I therefore suggest to my friend from Alabama that he allow the bill to go over. In the mean time the report will be printed in the RECORD, and the Senate can inform itself more thoroughly on the question involved than it could do even by a debate of the Senate at this time.

Mr. MORGAN. It being understood that the bill goes over without prejudice, I will consent to that course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will go over without prejudice.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not wish to thrust the bill upon the attention of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first bill upon the Calendar in its order will be announced.

E. P. SMITH.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 1041) for the relief of E. P. Smith. It authorizes the proper accounting officers of the Treasury, in the settlement of the accounts of E. P. Smith, late an Indian agent, to adjust and settle the same upon the principles of equity and justice, and to award him credit for disbursements which appear to have been honestly made in good faith, and have inured to the benefit of the Indians of the United States.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TRESPASSES ON PUBLIC LANDS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 1394) relating to the public lands of the United States, and to require payment of costs in certain cases of trespass or conversion of material therefrom.

Mr. INGALLS. I should like to hear some explanation of the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. I see that there is no report accompanying the bill. I ask for some explanation to show the necessity for such a bill, and the effect of it.

Mr. BLAIR. It is a bill introduced by the honorable Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. CAMERON.] It has reference to the adjudication of costs in the cases which are specified in the body of the bill itself. The cost of the survey and the scalement of the timber, or the amount of material in other cases of damages to the public lands, it seems would properly be included in the computation whenever the damages are made up against a wrong-doer; it would be included, in other words, in the amount of the verdict. It is to reach that case that the bill is designed. The provisions of the bill are very brief, and they are quite plainly explanatory of themselves.

Mr. COCKRELL. I will state the point.

The bill reads:

> The actual expense of the survey, scalement, or estimate necessarily incurred to ascertain the damages by reason of such trespass shall be proved and included in the costs of the suit and in the judgment entered therefor.

Now, what survey is that?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The survey of the land for the purpose of ascertaining definitely in what description of land the trespass was committed. These trespasses are usually upon wild and uninclosed lands, as the Senator is aware, and it is in order to prove upon what particular description of land the trespass was committed, the section or quarter-section, and it is necessary that the land should be examined and in some instances surveyed.

Mr. COCKRELL. In other words, it will place it in the hands of the prosecuting officer to determine when a survey shall be made upon a piece of land upon which it is claimed a trespass has been committed by a citizen, and he will send the surveying officers there, and they will make the survey and come back and report their expenses, and that is to be taxed against the trespasser should it be proved to be a trespass, regardless of the amount.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The mere cost of the survey and the scalement of the timber shall be included in the costs of the suit.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and read the third time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. COCKRELL. I will not consume the time of the Senate in discussing the bill. I simply desire to say that I am opposed to the principle of the bill and desire to record my vote against it.

Mr. SLATER. I hope the bill will not pass. I come from a State where there is a large amount of public land, and many people there are the subjects of such prosecutions, and I am compelled to say as a general rule the prosecutions are without foundation and are oppressive. This bill would only tend to make the law more oppressive and pile up the costs against the alleged trespassers.

Mr. BLAIR. It is only just, I think, to observe in reply to the suggestion of the Senator from Oregon that nothing whatever is to be taxed against any but the wrong-doer when he is proved to be such, and if he is in the wrong it would seem that the reasonable cost of securing the evidence of the wrong which he has committed should be taxed against him as in other cases. But as there seems to be a disposition to discuss the bill I should like to have it passed over without prejudice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over without prejudice.

QUALIFICATIONS OF TERRITORIAL DELEGATES.

The bill (H. R. No. 4162) defining the qualifications of Territorial Delegates in the House of Representatives was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

Mr. INGALLS. I should like to hear the report read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no report accompanying the bill.

Mr. SAUNDERS. There was no report made in this case. It is a House bill, and although each House has the right to judge of the qualifications of its own members, it was thought best to have a law that would be a notice to the people of the Territories that in the selection of their Delegates they should not select boys; that they should be at least twenty-five years of age; that they should not select strangers; and persons should be at least seven years citizens of the United States, and that they should be residents in the Territories from which they are elected, and that they should not be guilty of either bigamy or polygamy. The object was, I suppose, to give notice to the people of the Territories of the character of people whom they should select to send to Congress as Delegates. The bill was authorized to be reported without amendment by a majority of the committee who were present at the time it was considered.

Mr. INGALLS. I judge the bill was aimed at an entirely different subject from that indicated by the Senator from Nebraska. It must have been designed for the purpose of reaching the difficulties in Utah. As those have been disposed of practically, I should suppose there could be now no necessity for passing this bill. The provisions relative to the age and habitation of the Delegate are practically the provisions of law now. I think the bill had better go over.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I have no objection to the bill going over as far as I am concerned. I am aware that——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator objects, that is the end of the discussion, and the next bill on the Calendar will be called. Does the Senator from Kansas object to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. INGALLS. If the Senator from Nebraska thinks the bill is of any importance, I will withdraw my objection.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I shall not insist upon its consideration now.

Mr. VEST. I object.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I am willing that the bill shall go over as far as I am concerned.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri objects, and the bill goes over.

CANADIAN GRAIN.

The bill (S. No. 1026) to permit grain brought by Canadian farmers to be ground at mills in the United States adjacent to Canadian territory, under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Treasury Department, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that grain brought into the United States in wagons or other ordinary road vehicles, by farmers residing in the Dominion of Canada, to be ground by mills owned by citizens of the United States, shall not be deemed to be imported or liable to import duties; but such grain shall be brought into the United States under such regulations as the Treasury Department may prescribe to prevent fraud and evasion, and shall be returned as in like manner provided by such regulations.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to say that the practice that this is intended to legalize has prevailed for many years. Grain has been brought over all along on the border-line of Canada, to be ground at mills in the United States, but there is no law for it. The Secretary of the Treasury some time heretofore has issued regulations which prevent this being done, but it was found that there never has been any fraud committed. It is a great convenience to the people on the Canada side, and there have been many mills largely dependent upon the patronage that they receive from the Canada side for business. The Secretary of the Treasury recommends the passage of this bill. I send his letter to the desk to be read by the Secretary.

The Acting Secretary read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, March 10, 1882.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 6th instant, transmitting a bill (S. 1026) to permit grain brought by Canadian farmers to be ground at mills in the United States, &c., and requesting my views as to the propriety of its passage and its effect.

The bill is calculated to revive and legalize a practice which, until lately, existed in several districts along our Canadian frontier, not to treat as importations, within the meaning of the tariff laws, reasonable quantities of grain brought by Canadian farmers to American mills to be ground and returned. In the absence of any legal sanction for such practice, its suppression was necessarily ordered by the Department, although during a long period of toleration by local customs officers no cause of fraudulent introduction of such grain for consumption in the United States appeared to have occurred, while, on the other hand, apparently well-founded representations have been made from time to time by both the local officers and the owners of mills that the cessation of the established usage will result in the ruin of the American milling industry in those localities, and will lead to the building of steam mills in that region of the British possessions, the inhabitants of which have preferred heretofore to patronize our mills, driven by the water-power available only on our side of the frontier.

In view of the facts, the opinion of this Department is favorable to the passage of the bill in question.

Very respectfully,

CHAS. T. FOLGER,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon. JUSTIN S. MORRILL,
Chairman Committee on Finance, United States Senate.

Mr. MORRILL. I suggest an amendment, in the second section, by striking out "immediately," and inserting "from and after its passage;" so as to read:

SEC. 2. That this act shall take effect from and after its passage.

Mr. ANTHONY. Does not every act take effect from and after its passage?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It does.

Mr. COCKRELL. There is no necessity for the amendment.

Mr. MORRILL. The clause is in the bill, and it should either be amended or the whole of the second section should be stricken out.

Mr. INGALLS. It had better all be stricken out.

Mr. MORRILL. Then I move to strike out the second section.

Mr. INGALLS. It is a superfluous appendage.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to strike out the second section of the bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN. I wish to ask the Senator from Vermont if there is any reason why this provision should not be extended to the Mexican border as well as the Canadian?

Mr. MORRILL. I have no information on that subject, and I should prefer that the Senate would get some information before acting upon it. That occupies a very different position to this country, and I do not know anything about the practice of the people of Mexico or of Texas. I think it would hardly be safe to include Mexico, with our present limited information.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ONTONAGON RAILROAD LAND GRANT.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 192) to quiet title to certain lands in the Upper Peninsula of Michigan.

Mr. CONGER. I ask that the bill may be passed over.

Mr. SAWYER. Then I ask that it be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. CONGER. I desire that the bill may be considered in the Senate out of the morning hour. I wish to make some remarks on the bill at greater length than the five-minute rule would permit.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The consideration of the bill is objected to.

Mr. SAWYER. It will be passed over without prejudice?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Of course, if there is no objection, it can be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. SAWYER. I have no objection to taking it up out of the morning hour, but I wish to have it passed over without prejudice.

Mr. CONGER. I cannot deny that I have some prejudice against the bill; and I have stated that I desire longer time for discussion on this bill than the five-minute rule will permit.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over without prejudice. The Senator from Michigan objects to the consideration of the bill. That objection carries it to the foot of the docket unless the Senator from Wisconsin shall move to take it up and consider it now.

Mr. SAWYER. Does that put it out of the reach of a majority of the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Nothing can put it out of the reach of a majority of the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. It puts it out of the reach of the Anthony rule, does it not?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It puts it out of the reach of the Anthony rule.

Mr. CONGER. It holds its place on the Calendar, and will be reached in regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. As the Senator from Michigan objects, the bill cannot be considered under the Anthony rule, but it can be taken up at some other time.

Mr. SAWYER. Very well.

COURT OF APPEALS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 420) to establish a court of appeals.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over, and the next bill on the Calendar will be announced.

WILLIAM A. GAVETT.

The bill (S. No. 679) for the relief of William A. Gavett was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay William A. Gavett $3,000, in full settlement of his claim for information and services to the United States in the case of James C. Harris, of Tennessee.

Mr. INGALLS. Let the report be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Acting Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. FERRY March 14, 1882:

The Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 679) for the relief of William A. Gavett, respectfully submit the following:

It appears from the report of the Treasury Department and accompanying papers transmitted in this case that William A. Gavett was connected with the office of the supervisor of internal revenue in Tennessee in the years 1870 and 1871, and specially employed in the investigation of frauds against the United States.

At that time internal-revenue officers and employés were entitled by law to a reward for the detection and discovery of frauds, proportioned to the amount of fines, penalties, and forfeitures recovered, as a result of their information.

During the month of May, 1870, the said Gavett ascertained that frauds were being perpetrated by James C. Harris, a distiller, in the seventh district of Tennessee. He actively engaged in the investigation of the case, and finally caused the seizure of the distillery and all its appurtenances for violations of law. The case remained pending in the United States courts for upward of two years. Finally, in May, 1873, Harris made an offer to compromise on payment of $10,000 and all costs, which was accepted and the money paid into the Treasury.

Under the law and regulations in force at the time Gavett's services were rendered in this case he would have been entitled to receive $2,650 as his reward upon the sum of $10,000 so recovered. The evidence is conclusive that Gavett was the first informant in the case; that he performed the services with zeal, industry, and fidelity; that the investigation and prosecution of the case were attended with considerable personal risk; and that the seizure and successful prosecution were due to his efforts.

By section 179 of the act of June 30, 1864, as amended by section 9 of the act of July 13, 1866, it was provided that the right to any moiety or share for information should not vest or accrue to the informant until the fine, penalty, or forfeiture in such case was fixed by judgment or compromise, and the amount paid, when, it was further declared, the informer should be entitled to his share of the sum received. The apparent object of this provision was to avoid any liability on the part of the Government to pay in cases where the Government received nothing.

After all the services in this case were rendered by Gavett, but before the final compromise, so much of section 179 of the former act as provided for the allowance of shares and moieties was repealed by the act of June 6, 1872, (17 Statutes, 256,) and in lieu thereof the Commissioner of Internal Revenue was authorized for the future to pay such sums, not exceeding the amount appropriated, as might be necessary for detecting frauds. By section 46 of the same act it was further provided that "this act shall not be construed to affect any act done or right accrued * * * under former acts, but every such right is hereby saved." It might, perhaps, be stated that this reservation was intended to save just such equitable, but legally inchoate, rights as Gavett had acquired by his services in the Harris case. But whether this be true or not, those services, rendered in the confidence and expectation of receiving the reward then and for some time after specially authorized by law, clearly entitle him to equitable consideration.

Your committee, however, are of opinion that it will be a better disposition of the case to refer it for final adjustment to the Treasury Department, where, but for the circumstance of the delay in the payment of the money under the compromise, the claim might have been originally settled. They therefore recommend the passage of the bill as amended and herewith returned.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Finance with amendments.

The first amendment was, in line 4, after the word "directed," to insert "to pay William A. Gavett."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after the word "appropriated," in line 5, to strike out the words:

To pay William A. Gavett the sum of $3,000 in full settlement of his claim for information and services to the United States in the case of James C. Harris, of Tennessee,

And to insert:

Such sum as the said Secretary shall be satisfied is equitably due, if anything, for the information and services of the said Gavett in the case of James C. Harris, of Tennessee: Provided, That the amount paid shall not exceed $2,650.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOSEPH L. STEVENS.

The bill (H. R. No. 1014) for the relief of Joseph L. Stevens was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the proper officers of the Post-Office Department to credit in the account of Joseph L. Stevens, postmaster at Manchester, New Hampshire, $3,285, being the value of certain postage-stamps which were stolen from the safe in the post-office on or about the 16th of June, 1877, without the fault or negligence of the postmaster.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to know why this account has not been transmitted to the Postmaster-General for adjudication under the general law which has been passed?

Mr. ROLLINS. It involves an amount larger than that authorized by the law, being over $3,000, while the law limits the amount to $2,000. The bill has already passed the House, and a similar bill heretofore passed the Senate.

Mr. COCKRELL. If it came within the provisions of the general law we should treat it as all other cases which are referred to the Department for settlement.

Mr. ROLLINS. It involves more than $2,000, and therefore does not come within the general law.

Mr. INGALLS. Let the report be read.

The Principal Legislative Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. MILLER, of New York, March 14, 1882:

The Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the petition of Joseph L. Stevens, have considered the same, and respectfully report:

Petitioner is postmaster of Manchester, New Hampshire. June 16, 1877, he deposited forty-seven hundred and eighty-five dollars' worth of stamps in a safe in his office belonging to the Government. June 26, 1877, it was discovered that three packages of these stamps, worth $3,285, were missing. He asks to be relieved from the loss. The only persons who had the privilege of access to the safe were the postmaster, the assistant postmaster, and a clerk, who is the postmaster's son. The testimony satisfies us beyond a doubt that all three of these officials have always borne the highest character, and that there is no reason that any suspicion should attach to either of them.

The stamps were kept in one of the compartments of the safe. Spofford, the assistant, testifies:

"On the 16th day of June, 1877, there were deposited in the lower left-hand apartment of said safe postage-stamps of the amount and denomination as follows:

2 packages of 50,000 3's each	$3,000
1 package of 40,000 3's	1,200
1 package containing 20,000 2's, 2,000 6's, 650 10's	585

"That on said day I took from said compartments fifty ten-cent stamps for sale, and observed the packages to be all present. I did not have occasion to observe these particular packages again until the 26th of said June, when I discovered that all but one package, containing fifty thousand 3's, were missing. The packages being in the lower part of the safe, their absence would not be so readily discovered as if located higher in the safe, unless attention was particularly called to this apartment; but I am very confident that they could not have been taken any considerable length of time before the discovery of the theft. The three upper packages were taken, leaving the bottom one undisturbed. During business hours it was our custom to leave the safe unlocked, as it is necessary to have access to some portion of its contents at all hours of the day, and it is impracticable to lock and unlock it every time access is had to it."

The Post-Office Department was promptly notified by petitioner of his loss and dispatched a special agent to Manchester, who reported as follows:

"BOSTON, MASSACHUSETTS, February 8, 1878.

"SIR: I have the honor to return case No. 2107 B. and to inform you that I have made personal investigation and search relating to the loss of postage-stamps from the Manchester, New Hampshire, post-office.

"I found that the postmaster, J. L. Stevens, took account of the number of his stamps that were kept in the safe in the office June 16, and at that time the amount was correct. On June 26, when he again made an examination, he found that two original packages and parts of broken packages, amounting in the total to $3,285, namely:

200 sheets two-cent stamps	$400 00
900 sheets three-cent stamps	2,700 00
20 sheets six-cent stamps	120 00
6½ sheets ten-cent stamps	65 00

were missing. He at once commenced a thorough search for the same, but failed to find any trace. The postage-stamps were kept by him in the safe at the office, the safe being kept open during office hours. Besides the stamps there were kept in the safe money-order funds, post-office money, and his private funds. Nothing but the stamps was molested. At no time between the 16th and 26th of June (at which latter time he discovered his loss) was the safe without a large sum of money in the same, and yet no money was taken. The safe was located in the office about twenty feet from the office window, where the clerks at all times are employed, and about fifteen feet from a rear door. During the warm weather this door was left open, and at a part of the day (six to seven p. m.) there was at times but one clerk on duty, and at no other time of the day or when the office was open would there be less than four of the employés present.

"The only theory as to the loss arrived at was that during the time there was only one clerk in the office, his attention being called to the window for stamps or money-orders, and back being turned to the safe, some one came into the office through the rear door, stepped to the safe, and stole the packages. As ten days had passed between the time of Mr. Stevens knowing his amount of stamps in the safe and the discovery of his loss, we found it impossible to arrive at any conclusion who the depredator was. Every effort has been made by Mr. Stevens and myself to find some clew to the loss. He has employed private detectives and devoted his own time in following every trace and studying every theory, but without success.

"Mr. Stevens has held the office of postmaster for the last eight years, and has the best of records, is an industrious and energetic man, always at his post, and this is the only serious trouble that has occurred at his office during his term.

"From the thorough investigation made by me, and after a close study of all the facts relating to this loss, I am satisfied that he gave the same care to the Department's property intrusted to him that he did to his own, as at no time but what there were his personal funds and funds to the money-order department in the safe.

"In summing up, I can only add that after a most thorough search and investigation no trace of the stamps or depredators could be found.

"Very respectfully,

"CHARLES FIELD,
"Special Agent Post-Office Department.

"DAVID B. PARKER,
"Chief Special Agent Post-Office Department,
"Washington, D. C."

We have also examined a plan of the office. We are of the opinion that the petitioner used ordinary care and the same that he took of his own property; he had on hand only the usual amount of stamps; we find that said theft was committed without fault on the part of the claimant in the opinion of your committee; he took prompt and active measures upon the discovery of the loss to find out and apprehend the thief and recover the stolen property, and employed the best detectives at home and in Boston, at large expense, but without avail, and that he ought to be relieved from the loss.

The claim of said Joseph L. Stevens was presented in both Houses of the Forty-fifth Congress, and referred to both the House and Senate Committees on Claims, respectively, by whom the matter was fully heard and investigated, and their conclusions and findings embodied in Senate Report No. 789 (by Senator HOAR) and House Report No. 33, third session, Forty-fifth Congress, (by Representative Ellsworth;) also, in the Forty-sixth Congress, second session, by the House Committee on Claims, Report No. 874, (by Representative Barber.)

All of said committees unanimously recommended the passage of a bill allowing the claim. The Senate bill was duly passed by that body, but failed of passage in the House, being received so late in the session that it was not reached for action.

We report the accompanying bill, and recommend its passage.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE MISSISSIPPI OVERFLOW.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 161) making an appropriation to enable the Light-House Board to meet the extraordinary expenses consequent upon the flood in the Mississippi River was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It appropriates $10,000 to enable the Light-House Board to pay the extraordinary expenses consequent upon the flood in the Mississippi River, the sum to be immediately available.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, orderd to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GEORGE W. SAULPAW.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 1033) for the relief of George W. Saulpaw; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs that there shall be paid to George W. Saulpaw $7,000, in full compensation for his steamer Alfred Robb, taken by the United States for the use of the Government during the late rebellion.

Mr. INGALLS. I should like to hear the report read.

Mr. MILLER, of California. It would be better to have a statement of the case made.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The report is a long one.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin can probably state the case substantially.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Would that be satisfactory to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. INGALLS. I would rather have the report read.

The Principal Legislative Clerk proceeded to read the report submitted by Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, March 15, 1882.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of two o'clock having arrived——

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I suggest that the whole report be printed in the RECORD, so that the Senate may have an opportunity of examining it before the bill comes up again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered.

Mr. ANTHONY. If the report is a long one it is rather an expensive way to submit it to the examination of Senators.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The reading was nearly completed, and that portion which was read will as a matter of course appear in the RECORD.

Mr. ANTHONY. I make no objection to the request of the Senator from Wisconsin.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1093) entitled "A bill for the relief of George W. Saulpaw," have considered the same and respectfully report:

The petitioner has always been a loyal citizen. Before the war he was a member of a firm who were engaged in building railroad bridges. They built bridges over the Cumberland River at Nashville and Clarksburgh, and also some other small bridges. They built a bridge over the Tennessee at Danville, which was completed in November, 1861. Said firm purchased a steamboat called the Alfred Robb, in March, 1860, for the transportation of stone, timber, &c., needed in their bridge-building, for which they paid $8,500. November 21, 1861, said firm dissolved, and petitioner became sole owner of said boat, for which he allowed $5,500. The rebels had then blockaded the Tennessee River near Fort Henry, below said bridge, and the petitioner was unable to get the boat out of the river. He thereupon began running her as a packet from Danville to Eastport, Mississippi, a distance of about one hundred and seventy-five miles, and continued this employment until about February 13, 1862, when the rebels seized her near Eastport by force, and used her as a transport until April 10, 1862. The boat was then lying in Little Bear Creek, near Tuscumbia, Alabama. The rebel General Walker sent orders to have said boat burned and destroyed, as he was about to evacuate the country. The pilot and clerk, who were loyal men, and who had remained on board while she was in the rebel service, succeeded in evading the order and in running the boat down the stream, where she was concealed at a place called Coyer's Island, until April 22, 1862, when she was taken by the Union gunboat Tyler. She was then taken to Cairo, Illinois, and converted into a gunboat, used as such during the war, and was retained by the United States till the summer of 1865, when she was sold at Mound City at the great auction of the Mississippi gunboat squadron, and brought $9,200. The pilot entered into the Government service, and so remained through the war. The clerk and pilot were in the petitioner's employ, he designing to retain them, and paying them, deeming that his boat would be safer and his chance of securing it better by so doing. They intended to save and secure the boat for the owner, and had actually and completely delivered her from rebel control when she was taken by the United States gunboat. The circumstances of the delivery of the boat are proved by the testimony of the pilot, whose character and trustworthiness are established by the evidence of several United States officers with whom he served. The date and circumstances of the capture fully appear in the report of Lieutenant Gwin, commanding the gunboat Tyler, dated April 23, 1862, and forwarded to the Navy Department by Flag-Officer Foote, by report dated April 26, 1862.

The boat was of eighty tons, in good running order, as appears by the report of the officer who captured her. She is fully described in the other evidence, and we think was worth nearly her original cost when appropriated by the United States. Upon these facts we hold that all the owner's original right and title to the boat had revested in him, wholly purged from any effects of the impressment by the rebels. The owner's agents in his behalf and by his authority had completed the escape of the boat from rebel hands. This is not the case of a recapture by our Government of property of its loyal citizens which the enemy had taken and put to a military use. It is the case of the full and complete retaking of the property by the owner himself. It is as if the crew of a merchantman captured by the enemy at sea had risen in the night and retaken the vessel. In such cases we conceive the title of the owner would completely revest.

The foregoing narrative, so far as relates to the time, place, and circumstances of the taking by the United States of the Alfred Robb, is as well established by public official records as any fact can be. Yet, on the 15th of July, 1862, an information was filed in the district court of the United States for the southern district of Illinois, on the relation of George D. Wise, as informer, against the steamer Alfred Robb, her engines, furniture, tackle, &c., setting forth "that on the 15th day of July, A. D. 1862, there was seized on the Mississippi River, below Cairo, and brought into this district, the steamer Alfred Robb, her engines, furniture, tackle, &c. Said seizure was made by George D. Wise. Said seizure was made for the reason that said property was being used, by and with the knowledge and consent of the owner, in aiding the present rebellion, contrary to the act of August 6, 1861, and being so used, it has become forfeited." Every one of these allegations was false. The steamer was not seized July 15, 1862, but passed into the possession of the United States in April. She was not seized on the Mississippi River, and was not seized for the reason that she was being used by the knowledge or consent of the owner in aiding the rebellion. Wise never seized her at all. On this libel notice was ordered by publication fourteen days in a newspaper printed in Springfield, and by posting of a copy of the monition near the place of trial.

Wise was a captain and assistant quartermaster with the United States gunboat flotilla, to which the Alfred Robb then belonged.

A writ of attachment and monition issued, directing the marshal to attach the property, &c., and to detain the same until the further order of the court. The marshal made return as follows:

"I hereby certify that on the 7th day of August, A. D. 1862, I have by virtue of this writ attached the within-named steamer Alfred Robb, and made due proclamation.

"By ISAAC KEYS, Deputy."

To which is annexed the following receipt:

"OFFICE OF GUNBOAT FLOTILLA,
"Cairo, Illinois, August 7, 1862.

"Received from D. L. Phillips, United States marshal, southern district of Illinois, one steamboat called Alfred Robb, which has this day been attached by the said David L. Phillips as aforesaid; the said boat being now in the service of the United States as a gunboat on the Western waters, which I agree to deliver as hereafter may be decreed by the judge of the district court aforesaid, if in my power, and consistent with my duty to the United States.

"GEO. D. WISE,
"Captain and Assistant Quartermaster."

Upon these proceedings a decree of sale was made, and the boat bid off by George D. Wise aforesaid, in behalf of the United States, for the sum of $4,000, of which the court decrees $12.50 to the clerk, $96.82 to the marshal, $100 to the district attorney, and ordered the balance, $3,790.38, to be divided between the United States and George D. Wise, "the informer herein."

The owner of the boat had no notice or knowledge of the proceedings.

There was no actual proof of the allegations of the information, the record alleging a proclamation for all persons interested to appear, a default, and an order "that the allegations of the libel be taken as true against said property."

A request was made at the close of the war to the Quartermaster-General for return of the Alfred Robb, and for such information as the records of the Department might show as to the history of these transactions. The following answer was returned:

"QUARTERMASTER-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
"Washington, D. C., September 18, 1865.

"SIR: In reply to your letter of the 20th and 31st of July last, with reference to the claim of G. W. Saulpaw, esq., for the return to him of the steamer Alfred Robb, captured by the western gunboat flotilla in February, 1862, in the Tennessee River, you are respectfully informed that this boat was sold by the United States marshall under a decree of confiscation, having been captured while being used for insurrectionary purposes, and was purchased by the Navy Department, and placed under the charge of Captain George D. Wise, the then quartermaster in charge of the property and accounts of the flotilla, and by him transferred to the Navy Department, October 1, 1862. You are informed that it is beyond the power of this department to assist you in the settlement of this account.

"You are respectfully referred to D. L. Phillips, esq., United States marshal Springfield, Illinois, for any further information concerning this vessel.

"Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

"By order Quartermaster-General.

"GEO. D. WISE,
"Colonel in Charge Third D. W.

"R. J. ATKINSON, Esq., Washington, D. C."

The following letter, of which the original is before the committee, is found in the files of that office, which is evidently a first draft of an answer to the foregoing request, from which we think the nature of the transaction can be fairly inferred:

"QUARTERMASTER-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
"Washington, D. C., July 24, 1865.

"SIR: Your letter of July 20, transmitting evidence, &c., pertaining to claim of G. W. Saulpaw, esq., of Tennessee, for compensation for the steamboat Alfred Robb has been referred to me by the Quartermaster-General.

"You are respectfully informed that the case of the steamboat Alfred Robb was duly adjudicated before the United States court for the southern district of Illinois, at Springfield, some time in the year 1863. Due notice was given at that time to claimants to show why she should not be condemned, having been used for insurrectionary purposes, but if any evidence was presented it was not considered satisfactory to the court, as she was condemned and sold by the United States marshal, and, after deducting expenses, one-half ($1,895.19) went to the informer, and the other half to the United States Treasury.

"Please read the above and see if it is correct.

"How did the Robb come into our possession after the capture? Who paid for her at the sale of confiscation? I do not remember how I came in possession of the $1,859.19 given me by the marshal. Whom did he get it from? As although I bid the boat in, yet I do not remember to have paid any money for her, and yet received a portion of the sale. If she was sold by the United States marshal and I bid for her I should have paid the amount and taken a voucher from the marshal. Can you explain all this, for it has entirely passed out of my mind and I have no time to hunt up papers, and Mr. Blount is away.

"Yours,

"GEO. D. WISE.

"R. J. ATKINSON, Esq., Washington, D. C."

It is evident that the decree of the district court was entirely without foundation in fact, and the findings upon which it proceeded were erroneous. Under these circumstances, if the decree were technically valid until reversed by proper proceeding and constituted a binding judgment in rem, we do not think the Government ought to avail itself of such a technical defense to avoid repayment to the true owner of the proceeds of his property now in the Treasury.

But the decree is upon its face wholly erroneous and void.

It is settled that under the act of August 6, 1861, as well as under the later similar acts, there must have been an actual seizure of the property by the marshal to make a decree of confiscation valid. "The marshal must take the property under his actual custody and control." Pelham vs. Way, 15 Wallace, 202; Brown vs. Kennedy, ib., 591; Miller vs. United States, 11 ib., 268; Pelham vs. Rose, 9 ib., 103. The property must remain in the custody of the marshal, so that he can deliver it to the highest bidder, if it be purchased under the decree of sale. But the return itself sufficiently shows that no such seizure was or could have been made. The gunboat was in the actual service of the United States, in command of an officer who retained possession. The receipt of Captain Wise, made part of the return, declares that "the boat is now in the service of the United States as a gunboat on the Western waters, which I agree to deliver as hereafter may be decreed by the judge of the district court aforesaid, if in my power and consistent with my duty to the United States." It clearly was not in his power or consistent with his duty to make such delivery. This consent or receipt no more transferred the possession of the gunboat from the United States to the marshal than would a like document executed by the cook or cabin-boy.

We think, therefore, the owner's title to his boat has never been lawfully divested.

The boat cost the firm, of which petitioner was a member, $8,500 in March, 1860. In November, 1861, she was valued at $5,500 in the division of the property of the company. She sold for $9,200 in 1865, at a large and extensively advertised auction sale of such property. But it does not appear that the alterations made in her by the United States may not have enhanced her value. The sale to Wise for $4,000 was nothing more than mere form, even if a form were really gone through. The claimant is not entitled to interest nor to compensation for the use of his boat, under the rules uniformly applied to like cases. Under all the circumstances we recommend the payment to the claimant of the sum of $7,000, and report a bill to that effect.

MISSISSIPPI AND MISSOURI RIVERS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is the bill (S. No. 1572) for the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi and Missouri Rivers.

Mr. GARLAND. Owing to very peculiar circumstances surrounding a bill which is upon the Calendar, I ask that the regular order be laid aside informally with a view of taking up the bill and having it passed. I am sure when the Senate understands the facts it will not take ten minutes to pass the bill.

Mr. KELLOGG. If it will accommodate my friend from Arkansas, I have no objection as far as I am concerned.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business will be laid aside informally if there be no objection.

ADDITIONAL JUDGE IN NEVADA.

Mr. GARLAND. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 1287) to authorize the appointment of an additional judge for the ninth judicial district of the United States for the State of Nevada.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It authorizes the President of the United States to nominate and appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, one other judge in addition to the one now authorized by law for the ninth judicial district of the United States for the State of Nevada, who shall hold his office during life and good behavior. But after the termination of the term of office of Hon. E. W. Hillyer, the present judge of the district, there shall be but one judge for that district.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with amendments.

The first amendment was, in line 5, before the word "judge," to strike out the word "other."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 6, before the words "judicial district," to strike out the word "ninth."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 8, after the word "office," to strike out "during life and good behavior" and to insert:

According to the Constitution; and such judge shall have and exercise all the powers and duties now appertaining to the office of judge of the district court of the United States for the said district and receive the same salary.

Mr. GARLAND. The present judge, Judge Hillyer, a very competent and worthy judge, as I understand, is incapacitated to perform the duties of his office on account of mental infirmities which have existed now for some time, and are likely to exist for some time longer, if not permanently. I have in my hand very painful recitals from members of his family and from his physician to that effect. The docket is heavy in the district, and business is pressing. The demand in that section of the country for the passage of an act of this sort is imperative.

Mr. BECK. Let me inquire whether Judge Hillyer, so long as he lives, is to draw the salary of a judge in that district?

Mr. GARLAND. In respect to that nothing is said. The matter was discussed, but the committee preferred to say nothing conclusively on the subject. It would embarrass the passage of the bill to say anything in reference to it, and I am not prepared to give a categorical answer to the question of the Senator from Kentucky. It is deemed important out there to have a judge, and a law exists for the assignment of a judge there, but no judge who could be assigned now has the time to go there.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to authorize the appointment of an additional judge for the judicial district of the United States for the State of Nevada."

MISSISSIPPI AND MISSOURI RIVERS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The regular order is now before the Senate.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 1572) for the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi and Missouri Rivers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. GARLAND.]

Mr. GARLAND. Supposing that those Senators have spoken who intend to speak upon the merits of the proposition as brought out by the amendment that I have offered, I wish to make a statement in regard to it, occupying a very few moments, and then I shall withdraw the amendment. I offered the amendment as I had introduced some months ago a bill upon this general subject of the levees of the Mississippi River, which I introduced in the utmost good faith, believing as I did then, and do now, that Congress had the power to do, not indirectly or by implication but directly, that particular work, and that it had not only the authority to do it but that it was its duty to do it.

I have heard every word that has been uttered in this debate, and I have listened very attentively. My mind as to this power, this right, and this duty has not changed one iota. I think it is as clearly demonstrable that Congress has the power under the Constitution to do this as it has to vote seeds to the people of the country, as it has been voting without any limit, or as we have to build libraries in the District of Columbia, or to build monuments to departed soldiers. But I find it is thought that this is probably too large a dose to take at the present time. Perhaps, too, I am not the very best judge in this matter, directly interested as my constituents are. I have always been in the habit of listening to the counsel and advice of friends and gentlemen who, as well as myself, have investigated a subject. I believe every Senator feels that it is a duty, if Congress can perform it, to do something in this matter at this time. The sentiment, I believe, is about unanimous for the passage of the bill coming from the committee. As that is looking in the right and proper direction, and is, as I conceive, a beginning of this work that must ultimately be completed by the Government—if it be consummated—I do not wish to press my proposition upon gentlemen who have honest convictions differing from my own and against this proposition, nor do I wish any one to strain his conscience in this respect.

For this reason, after this debate and after the question has been now thoroughly presented to the country, in all its length and breadth, with the reasons for and against both the constitutionality of the measure and the necessity of it, I am persuaded that it is best for all concerned that I should withdraw the amendment which in the utmost good faith I offered.

That this work will be done directly in a few years I have no doubt. I am the more convinced of it because the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. PENDLETON,] who claims to be the strictest of the strict—the very crème de la crème—for a strict construction, advocates the appropriation without restriction. I say a new day is dawning upon this country in respect to these matters, and that mature reflection is coming upon the country. Meanwhile I hope as little suffering as possible may come to these afflicted people; and we will content ourselves with this appropriation of $6,000,000, which will be spent by the commission having it in charge. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I should like to offer an amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. JONAS] is next in order and will be read.

The ACTING SECRETARY. In line 14, it is proposed to strike out the proviso down to and including the word "rivers," in line 19, in the following words:

Provided, That no part of the said sum herein appropriated shall be used in the construction or repair of levees for the purpose of preventing injury to lands by overflow, or for any other purpose whatever except as a means of deepening the channels or improving the navigation of the said rivers;

And to insert:

And may be applied to the immediate repair or construction of such levees as in the judgment of the said Mississippi River commission will assist in deepening the channel and improving the navigation of said rivers: Provided, That no part of the said sum herein appropriated shall be used in the construction or repair of levees for the purpose of preventing injury to lands by overflow, or otherwise than as a means of deepening the channel or improving the navigation of said rivers.

Mr. JONAS. The amendment I have offered is almost identical with the proviso in the bill. I think the discussion has demonstrated, as the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] says, that the Senate is disposed to make the appropriation as recommended by the committee for the general purpose of improving the navigation and deepening the channel of the Mississippi River, and that it proposes to place the amount of the appropriation in the hands of the Mississippi River commission, to be used by them as in their discretion they may deem best for this purpose. Believing as I do that the Mississippi River commission consider that the construction or at least the repair of the levees is absolutely necessary for the prosecution of the work with which they are charged and that it is included in their recommendations and in their estimates, and desiring, if possible, to secure unanimity in the action of the Senate on this question, and considering that my amendment differs but slightly from the proviso of the bill, I ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is withdrawn if there be no objection. Does the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. KELLOGG] withdraw the amendment which he proposed to offer?

Mr. KELLOGG. In offering the amendment I was actuated by the same motives which actuated my colleague. At first I had some misgivings in regard to the effect of the restrictions contained in the bill as it was reported from the committee, but good lawyers on the floor of the Senate have compared my amendment with that which has been agreed upon, as I understand, by the House Committee on Commerce, and find practically little difference. Regarding the system of improvements to which the Mississippi River commission is committed, I think it will result eventually in deepening the channel of the river and so improving the navigation as to prevent overflows hereafter of the disastrous nature which has recently visited the Mississippi Valley, and thus dispensing with any system of levees as such.

Understanding that the commission is committed to a plan which will result in preventing overflows, and believing that Senators generally hold to the same doctrine, I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I do not desire to be committed to the understanding of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. KELLOGG] on this matter at all.

Mr. COCKRELL. There is no understanding of any kind with anybody in any respect.

Mr. HAWLEY. I desire that the bill shall speak for itself. We have no understanding with anybody in or out of the Senate as to what should be done for the improvement of lands at Federal expense. We are willing to give all that is necessary within the limits of the Constitution to improve the river, and if it shall help the lands we shall all be glad of it; but I certainly desire to protest against any intimation or concession or understanding.

Mr. KELLOGG. I was simply giving the reasons which actuated me to withdraw my amendment.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The Senator's explanation would seem to imply that all the rest of the Senate agree with him.

Mr. KELLOGG. The record of the debate on this measure will speak for itself.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to put on record an expression of my very earnest desire not to be concluded against the propriety or the constitutionality of some action by Congress hereafter, if it should turn out to be necessary, to relieve the persons whose lands are overflowed by the Mississippi River. We purchased, and found constitutional power to do it, the Territory of Alaska at an expense of $7,000,000, for which we taxed the people of the United States. We purchased originally the Louisiana Territory itself, believing that whatever might be the strict construction of the Constitution, it was an absolute national necessity to acquire and hold the mouth of the Mississippi River. The purchase-money was paid; in point of fact that Territory was paid for very largely at the expense of some claims against France owned largely by citizens of Massachusetts, who never have got their pay to this day. So that I suppose I may say that Massachusetts and the States in the neighborhood were taxed tenfold the proportion of the rest of the Union to acquire the mouth of the Mississippi River.

If it be true that there are a million or more acres of land occupied by persons, many of them in humble circumstances, lately slaves, capable of being added to the resources of this nation as producing sugar, rice, and cotton, maintaining, feeding men, American citizens, I should pause a great while before committing myself to the doctrine that the reclaiming of that territory, adding it to the national domain, whether within or without the territory of States which have already been admitted to the Union, is beyond the national forces which we have authority to wield.

I think these people and these States ought to show when they come to Congress that they have done something, and are ready to do something for themselves, and not simply lie down on the national Government. I think the effect upon the deepening of the channel of the river and lowering its surface at high water in comparison with its banks, and the completion of the system of improvement of navigation proposed in the bill ought to be tried, but if, when it is tried, it turns out that it fails to afford a remedy for this grievance of the overflow, and that that grievance can be remedied by an expenditure of money which is beyond the reasonable burden that the States where it occurs ought to take upon themselves, I believe that I can do nothing which will more gratify the people of the old Commonwealth which I represent than to concur in a proposition to tax them for the sake of relieving those people.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 2313) authorizing the Sioux City and Pacific Railroad Company to construct and maintain a railroad bridge over the Missouri River; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the following bills:

A bill (H. R. No. 721) to authorize the appointment of V. McNally as an ordnance storekeeper in the Army; and

A bill (H. R. No. 3776) granting a pension to Margaret McCormick.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills, and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. No. 721) to authorize the appointment of an ordnance storekeeper in the Army; and

A bill (H. R. No. 3776) granting a pension to Margaret McCormick.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 2313) authorizing the Sioux City and Pacific Railroad Company to construct and maintain a railroad bridge over the Missouri River was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. GARLAND. I have given notice to the Senate that I would call up the bill to establish a court of appeals, (S. No. 420,) and I now ask the Senate to proceed with the consideration of that bill.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I must object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Cannot the Senator make an arrangement that the bill be taken up and then informally laid aside.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I should have no objection to that if the Senator would agree that we go on with the Chinese bill.

Mr. HOAR. What is the proposition?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To take up the bill to establish a court of appeals, and then let that be laid aside informally until the Chinese bill can be considered.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to move to take up the bill for the distribution of the Geneva award, and I ask leave to be heard for one moment, and then I shall not antagonize the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. GARLAND.]

The Geneva award bill was reported from the Judiciary Committee at a very early day in the session. It is a bill which interests many of the best and most highly respected, most loyal and patriotic merchants and shippers of my State. Whether they are right or wrong in their belief as to their title to a share of this fund, they entertain it honestly, they pursue it honestly, they expect honestly to submit it to the decision of Congress as to a court, and to be governed, as they must be, by whatever may be the final judgment of Congress. That question has come up Congress after Congress. Sometimes the reports have come so late in the session that they could not be considered, sometimes a bill in favor of persons whose opinions I especially represent has passed one branch, and sometimes it has passed the other. There has been, I believe, no instance (or if so, but one) in which any expression of opinion in either branch of Congress has not been in their favor. There may be possibly one exception to this statement.

The matter has gone over in consequence, in the first place, of the absence—the inevitable absence—of the chairman of the Judiciary Committee. He left word that he did not desire the bill to be delayed in consequence of his absence, and left it in charge of another member of the Judiciary Committee. That member, on investigating the question, found reasons satisfactory to his own mind which made him prefer not to call up the bill as it came from the Judiciary Committee at that time. Subsequently he was called away by ill health. Now I understand that the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, while not agreeing with the view I entertain, concurs in opinion with those who desire that the matter should be taken up, considered, and disposed of at an early day. I had therefore proposed that at the time this bill was over I should move to take up the Geneva award bill; but I do not think that under the circumstances I ought to antagonize my motion against that of the honorable Senator from Arkansas or against that of the honorable Senator from California.

I understand that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] has a bill under his charge which is of great public interest and importance, and if he made a motion to take that up I should hardly feel at liberty to undertake to antagonize that, but I desire to have my bill stand as a bill entitled to the early, respectful consideration of the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois, (Mr. COCKRELL in the chair.) I have no objection to the consideration of the bill reported in relation to the Geneva award. It has been reported and ought to be considered. But it seems to me that the bill reported from the Judiciary Committee in relation to establishing a court of appeals is the most important bill that could now be considered in the Senate, and I do hope that it will be taken up and the Chinese bill allowed to be interjected, so that that can be considered first, as this will lead to some debate.

The Judiciary Committee has had this court of appeals bill under consideration for some time. I admit what the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] says about the importance of the Geneva award bill, and also the importance of the bill of the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. INGALLS,] although I am diametrically opposed to the position of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] relative to the Geneva award bill. My views did not receive consideration in the Senate before, and, I am afraid, will not still; but that is no reason why the bill should not be considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. COCKRELL in the chair.) The motion is to take up the bill to establish a court of appeals. [Putting the question.] The bill is before the Senate.

Mr. GARLAND. I have no objection to the bill being laid aside informally for the present.

Mr. INGALLS. I have.

Mr. VEST. I object to that. It is not just.

Mr. INGALLS. That should not be done by any agreement or understanding that is not in accordance with the views of a majority of the Senate. If the bill is taken up, it ought to be considered.

Mr. VEST. I want to say just this: I have given notice, I think three times, that I desire the Senate to consider at some time or other a bill of very great importance in regard to the interoceanic ship-railway. It has been reported and put upon the Calendar, and is pending here. If this bill is taken up I hope it will be considered. Then, if the bankrupt bill comes up next, let that be considered. But at some time or other I insist that the Senate shall consider the bill I mention, and I intend to call it up after every bill until it is considered.

Mr. FARLEY. I did not suppose that the motion made by my colleague would be antagonized. We all know for what a length of time this Chinese matter has been before the Senate. It has been here very nearly a month. If we have action on that bill at all, it is important that we have it as soon as possible. I do not wish to antagonize the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] or the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] or any other Senator, but it is a matter of so much importance to our people at this particular time that I shall insist upon the motion of my colleague to consider the Chinese bill at this time. Other bills have been considered. We gave way the other day. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] and others were anxious to have the Mississippi River bill considered, and we yielded to the consideration of that bill.

Mr. VEST. The honorable Senator from California [Mr. FARLEY] will understand that I am not antagonizing him. His Chinese bill was considered once, and I am perfectly willing to consider it again provided we go on without interjections, taking up the Chinese bill and disposing of it, and then taking up another bill and disposing of it, and some time or other getting all the bills disposed of; but a private arrangement I object to.

Mr. FARLEY. It has been the custom of the Senate.

Mr. VEST. Well, it has been an unfair custom, and I object to it.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I thought the arrangement was made openly and everybody understood it. I feel that having given way to the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. GARLAND,] he ought now to yield to me, and yield to this bill. I therefore make the motion that all pending measures be set aside, and that House bill No. 5804, order of business 579, be now taken up and acted upon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California [Mr. MILLER] moves that the pending order and all other orders be laid aside, with a view to moving to take up and proceed to the consideration of the bill he has named.

Mr. INGALLS. I submit that the pending question cannot be disposed of in that way. Rule 43 prescribes the motions that can be made when a question is pending. I have no objection to the consideration of the Chinese bill; I am in favor of the consideration of the court of appeals bill; but I object to an arrangement being made by which when one bill has been taken up as an act of favor to some Senator, the floor is yielded and another bill supplants it. It is not just to those who have important measures intrusted to their charge. I therefore insist that the question now pending shall be disposed of in some manner recognized by the rules of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator raise a point of order upon the formal motion of the Senator from California, [Mr. MILLER?]

Mr. INGALLS. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A motion is made by the Senator from California to lay aside the pending order. The rule requires that a bill pending shall be postponed to a day certain, if postponed at all. The motion would not strictly be in order unless he should move to postpone to a day certain or to postpone indefinitely.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I move, then, to postpone the pending order until to-morrow, with the view of taking up the Chinese bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California moves to postpone the pending order until to-morrow, with a view to then moving that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill he has referred to, the pending order being the bill to establish a court of appeals.

Mr. INGALLS. Does the Chair hold that if that motion prevails the bill which has been called up by the Senator from Arkansas takes its place to-morrow on the Calendar as the unfinished business at two o'clock?

Mr. VEST. This motion would not carry that proposition, I take it.

Mr. INGALLS. I want to know in what attitude the court of appeals bill will stand if the motion of the Senator from California prevail?

Mr. GARLAND. My judgment is it would be the regular order to-morrow at two o'clock. If it should not be, I should object.

Mr. INGALLS. Would it supersede the unfinished business if the Chinese bill should not be disposed of to-day?

Mr. GARLAND. I think that is the operation of a vote to postpone to a day certain.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will not say what has been the ruling heretofore on this point, but it appears to the Chair that if the court of appeals bill were postponed till to-morrow it would come up at the beginning of the regular order at two o'clock.

Mr. BAYARD. Is there any objection to that?

Mr. GARLAND. A motion is made to the Senate to dispose of it. I understand the Senator from California [Mr. MILLER] moves to postpone this court of appeals bill until to-morrow.

Mr. MILLER, of California. Yes, that is my motion; and to-morrow if the Chinese bill is not finished I will make the same motion again.

The motion to postpone was agreed to.

CHINESE IMMIGRATION.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I move now to take up the bill (H. R. No. 5804) to execute certain treaty stipulations relating to Chinese.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Committee on Foreign Relations report various amendments to the bill.

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to say that this bill in its present form did not receive the sanction of the whole committee. There were at least three members of the committee who were opposed to it in its present form as amended. I wish to make that statement in order to avoid any misunderstanding about it.

The Acting Secretary proceeded to read the amendments reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The first amendment was, in section 1, line 3, before the word "days," to strike out "sixty" and insert "ninety," and in line 9, after the word "said," to strike out "sixty" and insert "ninety;" so as to make the section read:

That from and after the expiration of ninety days next after the passage of this act, and until the expiration of ten years next after the passage of this act, the coming of Chinese laborers to the United States be, and the same is hereby, suspended; and during such suspension it shall not be lawful for any Chinese laborer to come, or, having so come after the expiration of said ninety days, to remain within the United States.

The amendments were agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, line 1, before the word "master," to strike out "any" and insert "the;" in the same line, after the word "vessel," to strike out "of whatever nationality;" in line 2, after the word "knowingly," to strike out "on such vessel;" in line 3, after the word "the," to strike out "jurisdiction of the;" in the same line, after "United States," to insert "on such vessel;" and in line 4, before the word "permit," to insert "land or;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. That the master of any vessel who shall knowingly bring within the United States on such vessel, and land or permit to be landed, any Chinese laborer from any foreign port or place shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not more than five hundred dollars for each and every such Chinese laborer so brought, and may also be imprisoned for a term not exceeding one year.

Mr. FARLEY. I do not see the necessity of that amendment, "who shall knowingly bring within the United States." Why strike out the words "jurisdiction of the?" I object to that amendment, and think it ought not to have been adopted.

Mr. MILLER, of California. The clause was struck out because it was surplusage.

Mr. FARLEY. I think it is not surplusage.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 3, line 5, before the word "days," to strike out "sixty" and insert "ninety;" so as to read:

SEC. 3. That the two foregoing sections shall not apply to Chinese laborers who were in the United States on the 17th day of November, 1880, or who shall have come into the same before the expiration of ninety days next after the passage of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after the word "act," in line 5 of section 3, to strike out—

And who shall produce to such master before going on board such vessel, and shall produce to the collector of the port in the United States at which such vessel shall arrive, the evidence hereinafter in this act required of his being one of the laborers in this section mentioned.

Mr. MILLER, of California. That language is proposed to be stricken out as surplusage, but upon reflection I prefer having it in. I do not know that it makes any particular difference in the effect of the act, because I believe that it is pretty well covered in another part; but as allusion is made in another section to this evidence prescribed in the third section——

Mr. BUTLER. We cannot hear the Senator on this side at all.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I think it would be better to leave the bill as it was, and not strike out those words.

Mr. FARLEY. Except the ninety days.

Mr. MILLER, of California. Except the ninety days. That amendment has been adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the adoption of the amendment proposed by the committee.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. INGALLS. Will the Senator from California [Mr. MILLER] in charge of the bill indicate why the date, "the 17th day of November, 1880," is retained in the early part of that section? "That the two foregoing sections shall not apply to Chinese laborers who were in the United States on the 17th day of November, 1880, or who shall have come into the same before the expiration of ninety days next after the passage of this act."

Mr. MILLER, of California. The reason of that is that the treaty provides that all laborers who were in the United States at that time should have the privilege of coming and going of their own free will and accord. That was the reason the date was fixed on the 17th day of November, 1880, and all those who come in after that date and before the passage of this act, or within ninety days after the passage of this act——

Mr. INGALLS. As I understand this, it is that all Chinese laborers who are in the country up to the expiration of ninety days after the passage of the act are permitted to remain.

Mr. MILLER, of California. Yes.

Mr. INGALLS. Then there is certainly no necessity for the retention of that date, particularly in view of the fact that it has been stricken out where it occurs in every subsequent section of the bill.

Mr. MILLER, of California. It has not been stricken out.

Mr. INGALLS. It has by the action of the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the next amendment.

The next amendment reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations was, in section 3, after the word "voyage," in line 15, to insert "to any foreign port or place;" so as to read:

Nor shall the two foregoing sections apply to the case of any master whose vessel, being bound to a port not within the United States, shall come within the jurisdiction of the United States by reason of being in distress or in stress of weather, or touching at any port of the United States on its voyage to any foreign port or place: Provided, That all Chinese laborers brought on such vessel shall depart with the vessel on leaving port.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 4, line 4, after the word "of," to strike out "sixty" and insert "ninety;" so as to read:

SEC. 4. That for the purpose of properly identifying Chinese laborers who were in the United States on the 17th day of November, 1880, or who shall have come into the same before the expiration of ninety days next after the passage of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the same section, line 11, after the word "Chinese," to insert "laborer;" in line 13, after the word "Chinese," to strike out "laborers" and insert "laborer;" in line 15, after the word "Chinese," to insert "laborers;" in line 19, after the word "Chinese," to insert "laborers;" after the word "Chinese," in line 20, to insert "laborer;" in line 22, after the word "receive," to insert "free of any charge or cost;" so as to read:

And in order to furnish them with the proper evidence of their right to go from and come to the United States of their free will and accord, as provided by the treaty between the United States and China, dated November 17, 1880, the collector of customs of the district from which any such Chinese laborer shall depart from the United States shall, in person or by deputy, go on board each vessel having on board any such Chinese laborer and cleared or about to sail from his district for a foreign port, and on such vessel make a list of all such Chinese laborers, which shall be entered in registry books to be kept for that purpose, in which shall be stated the name, age, occupation, last place of residence, physical marks or peculiarities, and all facts necessary for the identification of each of such Chinese laborers, which books shall be safely kept in the custom-house; and every such Chinese laborer so departing from the United States shall be entitled to, and shall receive free of any charge or cost upon application therefor, from the collector or his deputy at the time such list is taken, a certificate signed by the collector or his deputy and attested by his seal of office in such form as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe.

The amendments were agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the same section, line 27, after the word "contain," to insert "a statement of;" and in line 29, after the word "Chinese," to insert "laborer;" so as to read:

Which certificate shall contain a statement of the name, age, occupation, last place of residence, personal description, and facts of identification of the Chinese laborer to whom the certificate is issued, corresponding with the said list and registry in all particulars.

The amendments were agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the same section, line 31, after the word "Chinese," to insert "laborer;" and in line 34, after the word "Chinese," to strike out "fails" and insert "laborer shall fail;" so as to read:

In case any Chinese laborer after having received such certificate shall leave such vessel before her departure he shall deliver his certificate to the master of the vessel, and if such Chinese laborer shall fail to return to such vessel before her departure from port the certificate shall be delivered by the master to the collector of customs for cancellation.

The amendments were agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the same section, after the word "Chinese," in line 37, to insert "laborer;" in line 41, after the word "Chinese," to insert "laborer;" and in line 42, after the word "Chinese," to insert "laborer;" so as to read:

The certificate herein provided for shall entitle the Chinese laborer to whom the same is issued to return to and re-enter the United States upon producing and delivering the same to the collector of customs of the district at which such Chinese laborer shall seek to re-enter; and upon delivery of such certificate by such Chinese laborer to the collector of customs at the time of re-entry in the United States, said collector shall cause the same to be filed in the custom-house and duly canceled.

The amendments were agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 5, line 1, after the word "laborer," to strike out "living" and insert "mentioned in section 4 of this act being;" in line 2, after "United States," to strike out "under the provisions of the treaty between the United States and China dated November 17, 1880;" and in line 6, after the word "receive," to insert "free of charge or cost;" so as to read:

SEC. 5. That any Chinese laborer mentioned in section 4 of this act being in the United States and desiring to depart from the United States by land shall have the right to demand and receive, free of charge or cost, a certificate of identification similar to that provided for in section 4 of this act to be issued to such Chinese laborers as may desire to leave the United States by water.

The amendments were agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the same section, line 12, after the word "certificate," to insert "free of charge or cost;" so as to read:

And it is hereby made the duty of the collector of customs of the district next adjoining the foreign country to which said Chinese laborer desires to go, to issue such certificate free of charge or cost upon application by such Chinese laborer, and to enter the same upon registry-books to be kept by him for the purpose, as provided for in section 4 of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section 6, line 2, after the word "treaty," to strike out "before;" in the same line, after the word "act," to insert "before;" in line 3, after the word "Chinese," to insert "person other than a laborer;" in line 5, after the words "United States," to strike out "except such as resided in the United States on the 17th day of November, 1880, or who shall have come within the United States within sixty days next after the passage of this act, shall obtain the permission of the," and insert "and who shall be about to come to the United States shall be identified as so entitled by the;" in line 11, after the word "case," to insert "such identity;" in line 12, after the word "issued," to strike out "by," and insert "under the authority of;" in line 14, after the word "or," to insert "(if not in the English language);" in line 15, after the word "English," to strike out "showing" and insert "stating;" in the same line after the word "such," to strike out "permission" and insert "right to come;" in line 20, after the word "entitled," to strike out "by" and insert "conformably to;" and in line 24, after the word "customs," to insert "or his deputy;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 6. That in order to the faithful execution of articles 1 and 2 of the treaty in this act before mentioned, every Chinese person other than a laborer who may be entitled by said treaty and this act to come within the United States, and who shall be about to come to the United States shall be identified as so entitled by the Chinese Government in each case, such identity to be evidenced by a certificate issued under the authority of said government, which certificate shall be in the English language or (if not in the English language) accompanied by a translation into English, stating such right to come, and which certificate shall state the name, title, or official rank, if any, the age, height, and all physical peculiarities, former and present occupation or profession, and place of residence in China of the person to whom the certificate is issued, and that such person is entitled conformably to the treaty in this act mentioned to come within the United States. Such certificate shall be prima facie evidence of the facts set forth therein, and shall be produced to the collector of customs, or his deputy, of the port in the district in the United States at which the person named therein shall arrive.

Mr. FARLEY. With reference to the amendment of section 6, line 9, where it says "and who shall be about to come into the United States," I desire to ask my colleague, who has charge of this bill, why that amendment was put in by the committee? I think it is very indefinite, because it will leave the question an open one. The Chinese who have not yet left China and who talk about coming to the United States might be considered as coming under the provisions of this act.

Mr. MILLER, of California. Then they would have a certificate from the Chinese Government. This is the section which requires the permitted classes, those who are not laborers, to come to the United States on presenting a certificate from the Chinese Government or a certificate issued under the authority of the Chinese Government. I do not know that there was any special reason why those words were inserted, but they certainly can do no harm. A person who is about to leave China and come to the United States can bring a certificate.

Mr. FARLEY. I do not see the necessity of those words at all.

The amendments were agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 7, line 1, after the word "knowingly," to insert "and falsely;" in line 3, before the word "utter," to insert "knowingly;" in line 6, after the word "conviction," to strike out "of any offense mentioned in this section the guilty person" and insert "thereof;" in line 9, after the word "term," insert the word "of;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 7. That any person who shall knowingly and falsely alter or substitute any name for the name written in such certificate, or forge any such certificate, or knowingly utter any forged or fraudulent certificate, or falsely personate any person named in any such certificate, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor; and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in a sum not exceeding $1,000, and imprisoned in a penitentiary for a term of not more than five years.

The amendments were agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 8, line 2, after the word "foreign," to insert "port or;" so as to read:

SEC. 8. That the master of a vessel arriving in the United States from any foreign port or place shall, at the same time he delivers a manifest of the cargo, and if there be no cargo, then at the time of making a report of the entry of the vessel pursuant to law, in addition to the other matter required to be reported, and before landing, or permitting to land, any Chinese passengers, deliver and report to the collector of customs of the district in which such vessel shall have arrived a separate list of all Chinese passengers taken on board his vessel at any foreign port or place, and all such passengers on board the vessel at that time.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the same section, line 14, after the word "government," to insert "or their servants;" in line 15, after the word "by," to strike out "the" and insert "their;" and in line 16, after the word "certificates," to strike out "of other Chinese passengers;" so as to read:

Such list shall show the names of such passengers (and if accredited officers of the Chinese Government traveling on the business of that government, or their servants, with a note of such facts) and the names and other particulars, as shown by their respective certificates; and such list shall be sworn to by the master in the manner required by law in relation to the manifest of the cargo.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the same section, line 18, after the word "any," to insert "willful;" and in line 19, before the word "master," to strike out "the" and insert "any such;" so as to read:

Any willful refusal or neglect of any such master to comply with the provisions of this section shall incur the same penalties and forfeiture as are provided for a refusal or neglect to report and deliver a manifest of the cargo.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 11, line 2, after the word "into," to strike out "or shall aid or abet the bringing or coming into;" in line 4, after the word "shall," to strike out "land or aid" and insert "knowingly aid or abet the same or aid;" in line 6, after the word "Chinese," to strike out "not authorized by law" and insert "person not lawfully entitled;" in line 8, after the word "shall," to strike out "for each person so brought or aided to come into the United States, or so landed," and insert "on conviction thereof;" in line 10, before the word "sum," to strike out "the" and insert "a;"

and after the word "sum" to strike out "of one hundred" and insert "not exceeding one thousand;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 11. That any person who shall knowingly bring into or cause to be brought into the United States by land, or who shall knowingly aid or abet the same or aid or abet the landing in the United States from any vessel of any Chinese person not lawfully entitled to enter the United States, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, on conviction thereof, be fined in a sum not exceeding $1,000 and imprisoned for a term not exceeding one year.

The amendments were agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 12, line 1, after the word "Chinese," to insert "person;" in line 3, after the word "certificate," to strike out "herein" and insert "in this act;" in line 4, after "Chinese," to insert "persons;" in line 5, after the word "Chinese," to strike out "unlawfully entering" and insert "person found unlawfully;" in line 6, after "United States," to strike out "or who shall have unlawfully entered the United States, in any way, either by land or by water;" in line 8, after the word "shall," to insert "be caused to;" in the same line, after the word "the," to strike out "place" and insert "country;" in line 9, after the word "whence," to strike out "they" and insert "he;" in the same line, after the word "by," to strike out "the collector of customs of any collection district in which such Chinese may be found" and insert "direction of the President of the United States and;" in line 12, after "United States," to strike out "under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe" and insert "after being brought before some justice, judge, or commissioner of a court of the United States and found to be one not lawfully entitled to be or remain in the United States;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 12. That no Chinese person shall be permitted to enter the United States by land without producing to the proper officer of customs the certificate in this act required of Chinese persons seeking to land from a vessel. And any Chinese person found unlawfully within the United States shall be caused to be removed therefrom to the country from whence he came, by direction of the President of the United States, and at the cost of the United States, after being brought before some justice, judge, or commissioner of a court of the United States and found to be one not lawfully entitled to be or remain in the United States.

The amendments were then agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 13, line 3, after the word "credentials," to strike out "in the usual form," and in line 7, after the word "Chinese," to insert "persons;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 13. That this act shall not apply to diplomatic and other officers of the Chinese Government traveling upon the business of that government, whose credentials shall be taken as equivalent to the certificate in this act mentioned, and shall exempt them and their body and household servants from the provisions of this act as to other Chinese persons.

Mr. CALL. Do I understand that this section as to aiding or abetting the landing of Chinese in this country is adopted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments to section 11 have been adopted.

Mr. CALL. I wish to say for one that while I am perfectly willing to aid in any legislation of any kind to keep the Chinese out of this country, I think that those terms are not only unmeaning, but are perfectly outrageous. What is "aiding or abetting the landing of Chinese?" Those were terms which were attached to misprision of treason. They attached to a line of language which surrounded conspiracy. They were always odious to English law and to freedom. "Aiding or abetting the landing" of men! What does that mean? It means a great deal. It covers a wide range of possible things. An informer or spy, a court or jury, might find any number of circumstances which, in their opinion, would amount to aiding or abetting. I, for one, dislike everything that looks like an indictment for acts which are not specified, which cannot be understood, and which rest in the bosom of a witness or a court. I do not understand what "aiding or abetting the landing" of a Chinaman would be.

Mr. HAWLEY. Why, Mr. President, that is what is the matter with the whole bill. It reads as if it came from the dark ages. It reads like the old fugitive-slave law. If I, in journeying around the world, find a first-rate Chinaman and bring him to this country as a body servant I am to be punished. And, here, the President of the United States is to turn the poor devil out. It is made the duty of the President to catch this yellow boy and deport him. That is the character of the whole bill. What is the use of arguing the question at all? If we have made up our minds to put this, in the middle of the nineteenth century, on the statute-books of our country, let us do it in silence and in mourning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary had proceeded so far as the amendments to the thirteenth section. The question is on the amendments to that section.

The amendments were agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out section 14, in the following words:

SEC. 14. That hereafter no State court or court of the United States shall admit Chinese to citizenship; and all laws in conflict with this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. FARLEY. I hope that amendment will not be adopted. For many reasons I do not wish to take up the time of the Senate just now in the discussion of this amendment. At the time that it was put into the first bill I know that some distinguished Senators took the ground that there was no necessity for this provision because the statute already provided for it. But, notwithstanding that statute, the courts have been naturalizing Chinamen; and I shall insist on the rejection of the amendment at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the committee to strike out section 14.

Mr. FARLEY. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the principal Legislative Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GARLAND, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.]

Mr. HARRIS, (when his name was called.) I am paired upon general questions with the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] who is absent to-day. From my memory of his position when this question was under consideration heretofore I should vote "nay," but I decline to vote because I am paired with him.

Mr. SEWELL, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. VANCE.]

Mr. RANSOM, (when the name of Mr. VANCE was called.) My colleague [Mr. VANCE] is paired with the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. SEWELL.] If my colleague were here he would vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am paired with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. BROWN.]

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I have a general pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON.] I saw him in his seat this morning, and shall therefore let my vote stand.

The result was announced—yeas 26, nays 32; as follows:

YEAS—26.

Aldrich,	Frye,	Lapham,	Rollins,
Allison,	Hale,	McDill,	Saunders,
Anthony,	Harrison,	McMillan,	Sawyer,
Blair,	Hawley,	Miller of N. Y.,	Van Wyck,
Conger,	Hoar,	Morrill,	Windom.
Davis of Illinois,	Ingalls,	Platt,
Dawes,	Kellogg,	Plumb,

NAYS—32.

Bayard,	Fair,	Jackson,	Morgan,
Beck,	Farley,	Johnston,	Pendleton,
Butler,	George,	Jonas,	Pugh,
Call,	Gorman,	Jones of Florida,	Slater,
Cameron of Wis.,	Groome,	Jones of Nevada,	Vest,
Chilcott,	Grover,	McPherson,	Voorhees,
Coke,	Hampton,	Maxey,	Walker,
Davis of W. Va.,	Hill of Colorado,	Miller of Cal.,	Williams.

ABSENT—18.

Brown.	Ferry,	Logan,	Sewell,
Camden,	Garland,	Mahone,	Sherman,
Cameron of Pa.,	Harris,	Mitchell,	Vance.
Cockrell,	Hill of Georgia,	Ransom,
Edmunds,	Lamar,	Saulsbury,

So the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. PLATT in the chair.) The Secretary will read the next amendment.

The next amendment reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations was, to strike out section 15, in the following words:

SEC. 15. That the words "Chinese laborers," wherever used in this act, shall be construed to mean both skilled and unskilled laborers and Chinese employed in mining.

Mr. GROVER. I hope this amendment will not be agreed to. The Chinese embassy declare that they do not desire that artisans shall be excluded. This is proposed to exclude the artisans. If they are not excluded by the terms of this bill it will be found that nearly every Chinaman desiring to come to the United States will claim to be an artisan; and they will all be admitted; and thus the purposes of the late treaty will be avoided and the purposes of this bill will be avoided, unless this amendment is disagreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the committee.

Mr. HAWLEY and others called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered, and the Acting Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HARRIS, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] and shall not vote. If he were here, I should vote "nay" and he would vote "yea."

Mr. RANSOM, (when his name was called.) I am paired on this occasion with the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN.] If he were present, I should vote "nay." My colleague [Mr. VANCE] is paired with the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. SEWELL.] My colleague, if here, would vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am paired with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. BROWN.]

The result was announced—yeas 29, nays 28; as follows:

YEAS—29.

Aldrich,	Dawes,	Kellogg,	Rollins,
Allison,	Frye,	Lapham,	Saunders,
Anthony,	Hale,	McDill,	Sawyer,
Blair,	Harrison,	McMillan,	Van Wyck,
Cameron of Pa.,	Hawley,	Miller of N. Y.,	Windom.
Chilcott,	Hill of Colorado,	Morrill,
Conger,	Hoar,	Platt,
Davis of Illinois,	Ingalls,	Plumb,

NAYS—28.

Bayard,	Fair,	Johnston,	Pendleton,
Beck,	Farley,	Jonas,	Pugh,
Butler,	George,	Jones of Nevada,	Slater,
Call,	Gorman,	McPherson,	Vest,
Cameron of Wis.,	Grover,	Maxey,	Voorhees,
Coke,	Hampton,	Miller of Cal.,	Walker,
Davis of W. Va.,	Jackson,	Morgan,	Williams.

ABSENT—19.

Brown,	Garland,	Lamar,	Saulsbury,
Camden,	Groome,	Logan,	Sewell,
Cockrell,	Harris,	Mahone,	Sherman,
Edmunds,	Hill of Georgia,	Mitchell,	Vance.
Ferry,	Jones of Florida,	Ransom,

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FARLEY. I give notice that when the bill comes into the Senate I shall renew my motion.

Mr. MORGAN. I give notice that I will reserve a vote on the question concerning skilled and unskilled laborers when the bill comes up in the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is still in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I do not think that anything will be gained by entering upon an extended discussion of a measure which has very recently received so thorough and careful an examination at the hands of the Senate. I suppose the bill, either with or without the amendment which has been adopted, is destined to pass. I wish before it passes to put on record my certain conviction that the opinion which has come from a large body of the most intelligent people of the country, from the organs of the great denominations of Christians, from the representatives of the communities which have owed their prosperity, their power, their happiness to the respect in which the labor on which they are based has been held—I say I think this opinion is sure, sooner or later, is sure very speedily, to prevail in reversing the policy on which we now seem about to enter. I believe that the Pacific coast itself will come back very soon to the doctrine of the eloquent resolution framed by my honorable friend from California a few years ago as a representative of the Republican convention of his State, of which he was a leading member. It is impossible, it is incredible that a blow at the dignity of human nature, a blow at the dignity of labor, a blow at men, not because of their individual qualities or characters, but because of the color of their skin, should not fail to be a subject of deep regret and repentance to the American people in the nineteenth century.

I do not, however, rise to reargue this question or to reaffirm my own individual opinion. The conviction with which I have started has been deepened and re-enforced by the expressions of sentiment which have come from the sober, religious sense of this country. It has been strengthened also by the exhibition of the true character of the leaders of the sentiment which has demanded and secured the passage of this bill, which we have seen in the press of the section of country from which it comes.

I wish, however, to refer in a single word to one charge which has been frequently made, and that is that those members of the Republican party who have resisted the passage of this measure have violated the pledges with which they asked the support of the American people at the recent Presidential election. I was in a condition, I think, to know something of the opinion and purposes of the men who composed the great Republican national convention of 1880. I was also in a condition to know something of the opinion of the great statesman and soldier and martyr and lover of liberty, who was the standard-bearer of my political associates in that memorable campaign. It is a dishonor to both to charge that they asked the support of the American people by pledging themselves to the principles upon which this legislation is based.

General Garfield, I believe, would have gone to the stake, he would have put his right hand into the flames like Cranmer, before he would have accepted the Presidency or have subscribed his name to a declaration involving such a blow to the dignity of labor and the dignity of American humanity as is involved in this bill.

This is what the Republican national convention declared. I stand, and am ready to stand in the future, by every word and letter and syllable of the declaration:

> Since the authority to regulate immigration and intercourse between the United States and foreign nations rests with the Congress of the United States and the treaty-making power, the Republican party, regarding the unrestricted immigration of the Chinese as a matter of grave concernment, under the exercise of both these powers, would limit and restrict that immigration by the enactment of such just, humane, and reasonable laws and treaties as will produce that result.

That is, the regulation of immigration and intercourse. Then General Garfield in his letter of acceptance stated the doctrine to which he understands he is committed by accepting the nomination of that party upon that platform. He said:

> The material interests of this country, the traditions of its settlement and the sentiment of our people have led the Government to offer the widest hospitality to emigrants who seek our shores for new and happier homes, willing to share the burdens as well as the benefits of our society, and intending that their posterity shall become an undistinguishable part of our population.

Is that like an enactment that no Chinese shall ever be naturalized in the American Republic?

> The recent movement of the Chinese to our Pacific coast partakes but little of the qualities of such an immigration, either in its purposes or its result. It is too much like an importation to be welcomed without restrictions, too much like an invasion to be looked upon without solicitude. We cannot consent to allow any form of servile labor to be introduced among us under the guise of immigration. Recognizing the gravity of this subject, the present Administration, supported by Congress, has sent to China a commission of distinguished citizens for the purpose of securing such a modification of the existing treaty as will prevent the evils likely to arise from the present situation. It is confidently believed that these diplomatic negotiations will be successful without the loss of commercial intercourse between the two powers, which promises a great increase of reciprocal trade and the enlargement of our markets. Should these efforts fail, it will be the duty of Congress to mitigate the evils already felt and prevent their increase by such restrictions as, without violence or injustice, will place upon a sure foundation the peace of our communities and the freedom and dignity of labor.

Mr. President, I reaffirm for myself, and for the people whom I immediately represent, every syllable of that eloquent declaration. I am willing to join my friends from the Pacific coast in regulating immigration so as to extirpate, root and branch, every form of cooly labor. I am willing to plant at the outer gateways of this Asiatic nation vigilant and competent consular agents, without whose certificate no man shall come to our shores whose labor is not his own property; who does not come with his family, if he has a family; who does not come under the fair promise that he is likely to take upon himself in good faith the responsibilities, the duties, and the opportunities of American citizenship.

Not an evil has been suggested in the petition and complaints that have come from the Pacific coast against which I will not join with its representatives in striking a hard and fatal blow. But I will not strike at an honest, industrious, temperate Christian laborer because I am afraid that his labor is more skillful than mine or than the labor of the men of my race. I will not deny to the Chinaman any more than I will to the negro or the Irishman or the Caucasian the right to bring his labor, bring his own property to our shores, and the right to fix such a price upon it as according to his own judgment and his own interest may seem to him best.

I denounce this legislation not only as a violation of the ancient policy of the American Republic, not only as a violation of the rights of human nature itself, but especially as a departure from the doctrine to which the great party to which I belong is committed in its latest declaration of principles, and to which our great martyred chief, whom we were so proud to acknowledge as our standard-bearer, affixed his declaration in almost the latest public act of his distinguished life.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. HARRIS in the chair.) The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole. Shall the question be put on concurring in the amendments in gross?

Mr. CONGER. If in order, before that question is put, I request that the bill may be reprinted with the amendments before we are asked to vote upon it.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I do not see the necessity of printing the bill again.

Mr. CONGER. No man can tell what is in the bill. There are many amendments, some of which were adopted and some rejected. No man on this floor can tell even by hearing it read again the full scope and tenor of the bill with the amendments. Important as the question is, it seems to me the friends of the measure should be willing to have it printed and that action upon the amendments shall be taken after the Senate has had an opportunity of seeing what they are.

Mr. MILLER, of California. If the Senator states that he cannot understand what the amendments are which have been adopted and those which have been rejected, and that there are many other Senators in the same condition, of course it would be the proper thing to print the bill as amended.

Mr. HARRISON. I hope that will be done.

Mr. CONGER. I move that the bill be reprinted with the amendments, and that further action upon it be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. BUTLER. Is that motion in order, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair holds that it is in order to move that the further consideration of the bill be postponed until to-morrow, and in the mean time that the bill be printed.

Mr. PLATT. Let me suggest to the Senator from Michigan whether it would not be better to have the amendments acted upon in the Senate, so that we may know what has been the final action of the Senate with reference to amending the bill before the motion to print is made.

Mr. CONGER. If that is preferable I have no objection; but before voting upon the bill I wish to see it printed as it is proposed to be passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan withdraw his motion to postpone the further consideration of the bill, and that it be printed?

Mr. CONGER. I will adopt the suggestion of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] and withhold the motion until after action is had upon the amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Then the question is upon concurring in the amendments, and the Chair desires to know whether the vote shall be taken upon concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole in gross or singly.

Mr. MORGAN. I gave notice that I should ask to have one amendment reserved.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama has reserved the last amendments reported by the committee. Will the Senate concur in the other amendments made as in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. MORRILL. I wish to have the last amendment but one reserved.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont proposes to reserve the next to the last amendment. The Chair would suggest to the Senator from Vermont that that was not an amendment made as in Committee of the Whole. If he refers to the fourteenth section, that amendment was rejected as in Committee of the Whole, and the question does not come up in the Senate.

Mr. ROLLINS. The Senator can move it as an amendment in the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It may be offered in the Senate as an amendment.

Mr. ROLLINS. In that way the Senator from Vermont will reach the same object.

Mr. MORRILL. Then I propose to offer as an amendment in the Senate to strike out section 14 of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The first question is, Will the Senate concur in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole with the exception of the last amendment, which has been reserved for a separate vote?

Mr. MORRILL. If the Senate would concur in the amendment restoring the fourteenth section, would it then be in order to move to strike out the same section?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate is now acting upon the amendments that were made as in Committee of the Whole, without reference to the amendments rejected as in Committee of the Whole. The Chair would hold, if the present occupant should be in the chair, that a motion to strike out the fourteenth section might be presented by the Senator from Vermont in the Senate as an amendment.

Mr. MORRILL. I propose to do that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senate concur in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole, with the exception of the last one?

The amendments were concurred in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senate concur in the last amendment, which has been reserved, striking out the fifteenth section of the bill? It will be read.

The Acting Secretary read as folllows:

SEC. 15. That the words "Chinese laborers," wherever used in this act, shall be construed to mean both skilled and unskilled laborers and Chinese employed in mining.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, the question now before the Senate is on concurring in the amendment by which the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, agreed to strike out the 15th section of the bill, which is in the following words:

That the words "Chinese laborers," wherever used in this act, shall be construed to mean both skilled and unskilled laborers and Chinese employed in mining.

We have had some legislation on the subject of the importation of Chinese into the United States, commencing in 1862, running on through 1869 and 1874 and 1875; I believe 1875 was the last act. It was not in virtue of a treaty that we made with China, but in virtue of a reserved power to protect our own people against the immigration of classes whose institutions and customs differ from our own, we passed an act which is now incorporated in section 2158 of the Revised Statutes, which reads as follows:

No citizen of the United States, or foreigner coming into or residing within the same, shall, for himself or for any other person, either as master, factor, owner, or otherwise, build, equip, load, or otherwise prepare, any vessel, registered, enrolled, or licensed in the United States, for the purpose of procuring from any port or place the subjects of China, Japan, or of any other oriental country, known as "coolies," to be transported to any foreign port or place, to be disposed of, or sold, or transferred, for any time, as servants or apprentices, or to be held to service or labor.

In looking through the remaining statutes which we have enacted on this subject, the word "cooly" is always employed without any definition of the meaning of that word. The word was imported into this country with Chinese laborers. It came with an Asiatic signification; it was adopted into our criminal code of laws with that Asiatic signification. What a cooly is in China or in Japan or in India—for I believe the word had its origin in India—is something that is left to be ascertained by the judicial authorities of this country when they come to execute these criminal laws.

We never had a doubt, it made no difference what had been our relations with China, or Japan, or any other Asiatic or oriental country, of our free right and discretion to prohibit the importation into this country of persons who are called coolies. Where did we derive the authority to enact that statute? From what treaty with Japan, with China, with Great Britain, which controls India, or with any of the other powers in the oriental country have we acquired the right to prohibit the immigration into this country of persons who in that country are called coolies?

These statutes were enacted in the beginning at a time when the immigration of Chinese labor into this country had not become an economic or social question. We commenced then upon the sedate consideration of our rights as a nation or a people to prescribe for ourselves and in regard to all the people of the earth the characteristics and qualities of those who might be admitted to or become adopted into our country. It has never been doubted that we had the right to prevent the importation of pauper labor from the most civilized of European countries. It has never been doubted that we had the right to prevent the importation of those who were diseased, or criminals, or persons who might be in any respect injurious to the body-politic. Whether the matter is to be considered in relation to the rights of labor, the rights of Christianity, the right of protection against disease, the right of protecting the families of the country against the intrusion of abnormal and dangerous elements, it makes no difference in what direction we have seen proper to turn our thoughts and exercise our discretion, the right has not been denied us to legislate for the protection of our country.

The word "cooly" in the statute needs a definition. It must now have a definition, or else we must submit to have the whole spirit of the legislation in which that word was adopted evaded and set aside. When we undertook to prevent the importation from Japan and China and other oriental countries of coolies we regarded them as persons who were brought to this country under a contract made abroad, which held them to service for a term of years, and in consideration of the stipulations of agreement these parties had no power in their own country and under their own laws, neither under our laws, to emancipate themselves from the servile condition into which those contracts placed them.

We said in our statutes that there were those who were imported under agreements for a term of service which should extend for one or more years; that they were being imported by companies, by factors, by agents. Shall I call them slave-traders? If I should I would not apply a misnomer to the men who are engaged in the cooly trade. What we aimed to do in these statutes was to prevent laborers from being brought into this country who, after they arrived here, were held by contract for a term of service to their foreign employers and masters.

California was settled up; Oregon was settled up; the Rocky Mountains commenced yielding their vast treasures of silver and gold, and great inducements to the flow of population from this part of the United States and from the entire world drew all classes of people to that region. This inducement spread its influence across the Pacific Ocean. It reached the ears not of the poor, ignorant, and debased Chinese and Japanese coolies, but of the factors, the agents, the men who made commerce of human labor, and coolies were flooded in upon that country in great numbers. It became necessary for us to legislate against this, and soon it became necessary that some resort should be made by them to an evasion in order to escape the penal inflictions of our statutes. And what was that resort? It was simply that the contract should be kept silent and quiet; that the men who were imported from China should come here apparently free and of their own accord, but in fact and in truth that they came as much bound by the servitude in which they had engaged in China as the coolies ever were.

There never was a time when a cooly was absolutely sold into slavery; there was never a time when one man sold a cooly to another; but there was a time in which coolies were obtained from the vast swarms of population in the oriental countries, and they were there engaged in the stipulations of contracts which were enforced against them in this country. We legislated against that with freedom and with boldness and without question. No man rose in the Senate or elsewhere in the United States to deny or to question the power of Congress to prevent the immigration of these oriental people under such circumstances.

What is the condition now of the Chinese laborer on the Pacific slope? He comes to this country the bondman of some importer of human labor. The honorable Senators from California and from Oregon and from Nevada will sustain me in what I say, and my information was not derived from them, but from the people of California, when I state that vast masses of Chinese laborers who have been imported in the last twenty years to the Pacific slope have come under the obligations of a contract for a long term of service which they are incapable of renouncing. Sir, if you desired, in California, to hire fifty laborers to work upon a railway, no man would think of going to the laborers themselves and proposing his terms of contract and agreement to the man who is to do the labor any more than in the slave times of the southern country would a man have gone to the slave in the field to engage his services instead of to his master. If you want to employ a house-servant, a cook, a laborer of any kind who has been imported from China to the Pacific slope, you must go to the man who has the mastery and the control of him, or else you will never engage his services. When you want to work him it must be under an agreement with that master and controller. When you want to pay for his services you must go to that master or controller in order to make the settlement a valid one, for the Chinaman who does the work will not receive the money from you and give you a quittance.

I am not stating things that rest in the imagination. I challenge the Senate to-day to disprove what I say. Here are Senators who understand the whole subject; and I have been strangely and grossly misled by people in California if what I have stated is not literally the truth. If it be the truth, then the importation of Chinese under the treaties, whether the Burlingame treaty or that which preceded it, of that class and of that caste who are called laborers in their own country, is a mere evasion of the acts which we have put upon our statute-book commencing in February, 1862, and has been intended only to evade those laws. What we have been struggling with for the last four years in the Congress of the United States is really to prevent an evasion of the statute against the introduction of cooly labor.

How do you determine in China, in Japan, in India, or in any oriental country who is a cooly? He is not there a slave; he is a subject with certain rights accorded to him in his own land. He is not a bondman. He is not bound to follow the beck and call of any man who seeks to control him. His condition may be even higher than that of the "peon" in Mexico who can be sold for debt and transferred from one owner to another along with the account which holds him in bondage. But what is he? He is a man no more free, no more independent, no more in the possession and exercise of the rights that belong, as we say, by the decree of Heaven to every man who lives, than the Mexican "peon," and very few more than the slaves we used to own in the North and afterward in the South.

A cooly in the oriental country is a man who is held to labor by his necessities and by his caste. Let us not forget that important fact. Where the swarming myriads of that country have to concern themselves with the most industrious care for the mere maintenance of the life that God breathed in their bodies and where every avenue to success and every aspiration of the human heart is closed against his rising to a higher degree by caste and by social restraints, that man is of all others the most a slave, because he has upon him all the hardships of slavery without care, the affection and guardianship of a master. Coolies are of that character. Coolies are taken from that class. The men who are called laborers in California and who are also called laborers in China and Japan and in India are laborers of the lowest class; men who have no more power to emancipate themselves from the pressure of caste than I would have to emancipate myself from my duties to civilization. We legislated in 1862 to keep these people out, and now it seems that we must legislate no more. We legislated while our treaties were in full force and guaranteed to them far greater rights than they possess now, but still it seems you must legislate no more. The power of the people of the United States to control this institution has ceased; it has vanished and no longer has the great Supreme Legislature of the United States the power now as it had in 1862 to prevent these men from coming in by the evasion of our statutes which we then solemnly enacted, without question on the part of China or any other power in the world. When did we lose that power? At whose bidding has it vanished? Who has snatched the scepter from our hands and who wields it now to our discomfiture and disgrace?

Sir, let me call your attention to a lesson which has been imprinted upon my mind and heart during all my life, for in the providence of God my fortunes were cast in a country that was filled with African slaves. Not that I or my ancestors brought them there; not that we fitted out little ships to sail to the coast of Africa to bring them to these shores; not that we had transferred them to some other people to be held in bondage and slavery; but, like other men of my age and day, I was born to find them in my native land. The men who surrounded me in my infancy were in servitude under the laws and the Constitution of the United States. They were in a servitude to which the greatest government, they say, in the world had given its most solemn sanction. They were there either to live under the law of slavery, under which they were born and reared and under which their ancestors were born and reared, and under which their brethren now in Africa live, or else to live under a different system of law, a law applicable to free men. These men were held in bondage under our Constitution and under our laws; because we felt that we had the conceded and guaranteed right to hold them in bondage by the consent of those who had brought them to this country and sold them to us and to our ancestors, for which we paid them a full consideration. We thought that they were held in rightful and lawful captivity and bondage under the Constitution and laws of a great country; but it turned out that in the opinion of the American people a different description and character of law was to be applicable to the Africans who were brought here, the law of perfect freedom, the law of perfect liberty, the law of perfect equality of franchise and power. The great power of the Government of the United States decreed that that should be the law from that time afterward for the control of this oriental class which had been imported into our country.

There we were, left in the midst of them without the power to control them as they had been used to being controlled; they were made free from a law under which they had been raised, and restored to equal power and dignity with those who had been their owners. We were left to control and guide and govern, to educate and protect and care for this class of people, and we have been held to an awful responsibility in this regard. Not one relenting heart it seems to me has ever yet beat with compassion toward that people who have had this difficult duty to perform, to work the changes necessary to transfer this inferior and oriental race into the high dignity and character and power of American citizenship.

What you may expect from the importation of the inferior classes of Chinese into this country will be precisely the same in results, perhaps not modified in the least, which we have realized in the awful years of the past, since 1865, in the Southern States. If the voice of Thomas Jefferson, a Southern Democrat and a Virginian, could have been heard in the earlier days of this country and in its earlier councils against the further importation and for the expulsion of those who were here, or else for their freedom, the South would have been saved from that one calamity which is greater than all others it ever experienced. That calamity is not the freedom of the negro, not the loss of $2,500,000,000 which they were worth to us at the time of their emancipation, but it is that our fathers, from the North and the East, had brought into our communities an abnormal and irreconcilable element of population. There is where we suffered.

You may think that you can easily manage this question, but when you have drawn from the 450,000,000 of Chinese the lower and worst class of their people, and after you have, in the name of liberty, and manhood, and God, and religion, flooded this country with that horde of pagan adventurers, you may flatter yourselves that you can manage it. Let me inform you, as I speak to-day with anguish and with pain, that it does not rest in the power of man to remove an evil of this character after it has been ingrafted upon a free republic. The power does not exist in this country, and never will, even if the sentiment which I have heard uttered by some gentlemen on the other side were to become the sentiment of the country, to expel the negroes from this land. Although every man in each branch of Congress and the President might concur that it was an absolute moral and social necessity to expel the negro from this land, the power does not exist to do it; and after you have got the Chinese here, and they become incorporated in one way and another with your social, industrial, and political institutions, the power will be found wanting to expel them. You will then have to submit to an evil that you cannot overcome, neither can you avoid it. Your hands will have been tied by a fatal indiscretion, and woe betide the people when that day comes.

For more than four years Congress has been engaged with this question. The magnitude of the evil was such as that it enlisted the most earnest consideration of all classes of thinking men in this country. A measure has been twice voted through Congress, first in the form of a restriction, and afterward in the form, as it is termed, of prohibition by statutes. The feeling that these oriental beggars and lazzaroni should be excluded did not spring from a mere sentiment on the part of the people of the United States. There was no prejudice of color in that question or in that demand. The honorable Senator from Massachusetts reads history in a false light when he supposes that any man who has voted or will vote upon this question has been controlled in his action by a mere prejudice as to color or of race. Who has ever thought of excluding the Mexicans from the United States, and what is their color and what is their race? Who ever dreamed even of prohibiting a Mexican peon from migrating into the United States? No man ever thought of it. There is a deeper question than all that concerned in the exclusion of the Chinese.

There is no mere sentimentality on our side of this question. We are driven by facts, which we cannot resist or avoid, to the conclusion that it has become a solemn necessity on our part to protect the Caucasian race on this continent against the intrusion of the oriental people. We make no war against a man because he is black, or white, or red, or yellow; because he speaks one dialect or another. Ours is the expression of a firm and solid conviction that the Government of the United States under its peculiar organism is designed for a higher class of intellegince and virtue than that which belongs to the people who are migrating to this country from Asia in such swarms. We believe in the sanctity of the patrimony handed down to us by our fathers. We believe in its value morally, socially, and materially. We believe that it is our right and privilege, in competition with the great race to which we belong, to move this continent and this hemisphere to the front of the advanced march of civilization in such manner as to add to the glorious renown which this people have already won in the history of mankind, and we do not wish nor do we propose to be obstructed in this career by the introduction of a class of men who have no claim upon us except upon some vagary of diseased and mawkish sensibility.

The doctrinaires in human philosophy, those wiseacres who think they know better than all the people besides what is best for them, will not be able to convince us that it is our duty to open our peculiar institutions with the wide latitude that they claim, whereby we shall be overwhelmed and destroyed by an influx of population to which our institutions are just as illy adapted as would be a republican government in the heart of Africa to-day.

What has prevented us from checking this tide of pagan immigration? What has checked this solemn expression of the American people? What has obstructed their will? The President says treaty obligations and the honor of the country. Ah, sir, treaty obligations existed and the honor of the country was as high in 1862 as it is now, and yet we legislated not merely to exclude the coolies but to punish any man who would dare to bring a cooly into this country. Those who prate of the honor of the Government of the United States seem to be totally oblivious to the honor of the people of the United States, to the honor of our race, to the honor of our institutions and glorious achievements. They want to maintain a pharisaical appearance of liberality in the presence of the nations of the earth while they obstruct the solemn judgment of the people of this land.

We passed an act in February, 1879, not to prohibit but to regulate and restrict Chinese immigration. That act was passed by both Houses, by a very decided majority, in which I am glad to say both Democrats and Republicans participated. That was one of the questions where we met without any political hostility toward each other. That act was vetoed by the President of the United States, who represented the Republican party. He vetoed the solemn judgment of both Houses of Congress, deliberately and decidedly expressed, because he thought that a restriction of Chinese importation which confined that importation to not more than fifteen persons upon each ship which might arrive was a violation of treaty obligation and a violation of the rights of humanity.

We did not have the power in the two Houses to break down the veto. We were promised a commission to China which would effectuate the purposes of the veto and at the same time give effect to the purposes of the people as expressed through their representatives in the two Houses. That commission went abroad. The Republican party met in convention and appealed to the country that notwithstanding their President had vetoed a bill restricting Chinese immigration, still they had sent a commission abroad and they had not any doubt at all that the commission would return with all that we desired, a treaty modified, a treaty so enlarged and so shaped as that the Congress of the United States might still have the same power over Chinese immigration that it exercised in 1862, when it passed the law to prevent cooly immigration.

The commission went abroad and arranged a treaty, and they reported it back to the treaty-making power of the country. It was ratified by the Executive and by the Senate and became the supreme law of the land. Thereupon the two Houses of Congress, moved thereunto by a Republican, not by a Democrat, passed another act, sent it to the President of the United States, and that has been returned vetoed.

Thus for four long years we have been struggling with this question in Congress; thus for four years the people have time and again, in both Democratic and Republican platforms and through the action of men of different parties in both Houses, expressed the solemn will and pleasure of the people of the United States in respect to their protection against Chinese immigration. A friend to my right suggests that I should use the word "invasion." It will be an invasion, if it is not now.

Now, let us look at the power which has prevented this. Is there any doubt about the majority of the people of the United States of both parties concurring in the fact that there must be a prohibition, or a restriction amounting almost to a prohibition, if not entirely, of Chinese immigration? Who will dare to rise up and confront the majesty of the voice of the people of the United States thus expressed and to deny its authority in this matter? Only a few. Only those who have thought that it was their God-given prerogative to control this country in all its laws, in all its industries, in all its religions, in all its moral philosophy, and even in its tastes. They have risen up as one man to interpose the ukase of their power to obstruct and destroy thus this solemnly expressed will of the people. They have a great coadjutor in this work, and that is accumulated capital.

They have got the nabobs and the grandees of the country on their side, not only on the eastern but on the western slope. Go to California to-day, and the men who want Chinese labor are the men who own large plantations and large factories. What do they want? The same thing that gentlemen educated in the South wanted, servile labor that they could control at their will and pleasure. A man with legal power, with the power of capital, with any other power by which he can control the destinies of mankind, has always demanded and always will demand from the inferior classes of our country servile labor. He wants a man at his beck and call who dares not resist his will; he wants a man who has not got the money to live without his assistance; he wants a man whose dependence upon him is so absolute that his will is superior to that even of the Czar of the Russias in his control. That is the demand of the supreme classes against the substratum of society everywhere throughout this world; and we but followed in the South the same idea that you follow now when you demand, in virtue of your intellectual supremacy, your capital, and your combined power, that you shall be served with servile labor instead of free labor.

That is what you demand. That is the demand in California and it is the demand in Massachusetts to-day. When the honorable Senator from that State, [Mr. DAWES,] who is chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, recently, as I have learned from the newspapers, stated upon a rostrum in this city that he wanted the Indian boys to go to Massachusetts to learn agriculture, and the Indian girls to go there to become trained as domestic servants, he unwittingly uttered the same thought that prevails to-day in opposition to this bill. He wanted this servile class, this lower class of society, to come up into civilization, not by being elevated at one lift but through the slow process of the kitchen and the farm, and whatever else it is that might assist him in his "civilization," as they call it, he, in the mean time, and his friends reaping a harvest from this subdued, servile, and unprotected labor.

Now, let us look at what this veto power is; for in the history of this Chinese legislation we have one of the most important revelations that has ever yet struck upon the attention of the American people in respect of a power which heretofore has not been much drawn in question. What is the treaty-making power of this country? The Executive and the Senate. Who shape the treaties? Who sends the embassadors abroad? The President of the United States, exercising in that behalf so much of the prerogatives of the Crown of Great Britain as entitle the monarch of that country to appoint his embassadors and to make treaties without respect to either branch of the legislative power. We, through our President, send our embassadors abroad, and they shape the treaties, and through the treaties the destiny of this country, not merely in respect to its foreign relations, but, as we see, in respect also of its social relations, its industrial relations and power.

The treaty is made, and this body of seventy-six Senators ratifies it. We have been from three to five and six years away from our constituents. We represent States here more in the character of embassadors than people in the character of their representatives direct. We ratify the treaty and it becomes the supreme law of the land. The President and the Senate do that. The great popular branch of the country have not a word to say about it; the people cannot resist it; they cannot modify it, and of themselves and through their immediate representatives they cannot set it aside. We have with the Chinese Government, through the Burlingame treaty as well as the one that preceded it, arranged for the introduction of the Chinese into this country, not upon terms of reciprocal equality with our people, as I will proceed to show presently by some references to the treaty, but upon terms which are "unilateral," to use the expression of the veto message, and all on the side of the Chinese. The President and the Senate have arranged this programme, and as it stands it has been rebuked twice by the representatives of the people in the most solemn manner. It has been twice rebuked by those who are affected by it, and twice has it been protected by the veto power.

Mark you, here is the power to shape the treaties in the hands of the President of the United States, and in his hands also is the power to protect them by the veto power against Congressional action. Look at that combination and allow it to have its run and its range of power unchecked and unquestioned, and then answer to yourselves and to posterity what may become of this country. A State of this Union, yes, the magnificent empire State of the Southwest, Texas, might by a treaty with Mexico, shaped by the President of the United States and confirmed by a Senate in accord with him by a bare majority of one, be receded to the Government of Mexico, and the people of the United States would have but two remedies. One would be outbreak and war against all organized society and power. The other would be by legislation, and then if the veto power should be brought in to protect what has been done under the treaty power, do we not see how a country might be destroyed by a President and a Senate who were not responsive to public sentiment upon a question of this kind?

Do we not see that the President of the United States by his veto power has twice protected the treaties which he has made with the Chinese Government against the will of the people of the United States? Can any man state a proposition simpler or more true than that? What then becomes of the voice of the people in this great democratic and republican Government of ours? Sir, it is silenced beneath the iron hand of power and dead in a grave dug by its own hands. Presidents come here boasting of their authority when the people are resisting an invasion of the rights of society against which every instinct of their nature rebels. That is the attitude in which we are left.

I am not disposed to inveigh against the exercise of lawful authority by the President of the United States or by any other official of this Government within the purview of his jurisdiction, but it seems to me that on an occasion like this, when the people have twice expressed their abhorrence of Chinese immigration, their dissatisfaction with this inoculation of the virus of paganism into the very heart-blood of their social organization, it is a harsh, unwise, unjustifiable exercise of this veto power by the President of the United States to obstruct it.

He has in this regard too much power to set himself sternly and inflexibly against the will of the people thus solemnly expressed, too much power to be indulged in a course of this kind; and the Senate in its representation of the people through the States, it seems to me, owes it to itself at least to yield to that which the people have voted and have twice demanded, and to say to the Chinese lazzaroni, as they said when they enacted the anti-cooly laws, "You cannot come here any more, treaty or no treaty."

Has the power been denied, or will any Senator here rise in his place and deny it, that the Congress of the United States by the enactment of a statute has the right to repeal any treaty that has been adopted and ratified by the treaty-making power? Will any Senator undertake to say that the treaty-making power of this country is not after all subordinate to the legislative power? If he does, he will deny the whole judicial history of our country, and he will set aside and hold for naught the opinions of the Supreme Court of the United States. It is the right and province of the legislative power of this country to repeal treaties where they are found to contravene the best interests or the general welfare of the people.

I suppose that it will not be necessary for me to do more than to remind the Senate of the state of the relations between China and the people of the United States in one respect. In the first treaty that we had with China, in 1844, five Chinese ports were opened to the access of the people of the United States. In a later treaty, in 1858, two more ports were opened to the access of the people of the United States, making seven in all. What privileges do our people enjoy there? They must not go into the country to trade at any point distant from the open ports; they cannot hold land in fee; they can merely lease or rent land for the time being. They trade with the people of that country under surveillance and restrictive regulations. If an American citizen should be found anywhere else than in the permitted parts of the region of China, he would be liable to the utmost severity of the Chinese laws.

They profess to tolerate liberty of religious opinion, but that is also confined to the seven ports and to the immediately adjacent countries. They deny that any treaty they have made with us operates to naturalize the American in China or the Chinaman in the United States. They put that in by way of abundant caution, as a denial that they have given consent to their people becoming citizens of the United States, or to our people becoming citizens of China. They go on to prescribe in the treaties the form of approach which shall be used by a free American citizen. For instance, if one of the honorable Senators from Massachusetts, who in China would be a private citizen, might desire to address a Chinese official, it makes no difference whether he is a mandarin of one tail, or of two, or three, they prescribe the method of approach. In cases of exalted official power the approach is by mutual address. Where an American citizen comes down to the grade of a consul or magistrate, or something like that, the approach is to be made by memorial. When he comes down to the character of a private citizen his approach is to be made simply by petition, and he may be just as well kicked as accommodated in consequence of his petition.

They maintain caste against our people in their own country, and they require a man from this country, whether a laborer or not, when he goes to China and undertakes to make an approach to any official there to subordinate himself to the rules of social intercourse and of diplomatic and governmental intercourse in that country.

What freedom have we to go to China to reap the harvest of her trade? We hear it bruited about in the Senate and through the newspapers of the country and in the chambers of commerce and even in the pulpits that it will not do to cut ourselves off from the Chinese trade, because it is so rich, so profitable. We make haste to make unto ourselves friends of the mammon of unrighteousness. The money that is in the case seems to be the whole question. As to what may be the result nobody cares, it appears. The protection of society is a small matter, the competition of a Chinese ladrone or lazzaroni with an American man, an American who is inspired with a sense of the dignity of the character of American citizenship, is a question of no concern to these doctrinaires and philosophers.

I have run very briefly over the comparison between the rights of American citizens in China with the rights of Chinese in the United States. What are their rights in the United States? I desire to call attention to them. They are here, as the provisions of their treaty say, in a different attitude from the people of any other country in the world, for while the right of expatriation is acknowledged in one of the treaties with China, yet the power of expatriation is, as I understand it, expressly denied in terms in the same treaty. They come here as persons enjoying the hospitality of the United States. What can we do with them when they come here? We have said in this bill that they shall not be naturalized by a State or by the United States. We leave them, therefore, in a condition very peculiar, the like of which is not to be found among any other people in the world who visit our country.

There is but one class of people in this country to whom I might liken the Chinese under these circumstances, and that is the Indians who are under our control. The Indians are red men, they are inferior men socially and politically, and in the character of our legislation are so recognized. The Indians are subject to our control; they are neither citizens of the States in which they may reside nor of the United States, and so far as these matters go they are upon a strict parallel with the Chinaman after he arrives in this land. I do not doubt the power of the Congress of the United States to take the Indians from any reservation that they have got, or, to put it in a strong light, I do not doubt the power of Congress, with the consent of the Indians of any tribe, to transfer them to the public lands of Alabama and locate them in the midst of the people of my State upon the public land.

Does any Senator deny that proposition? It seems to me that in law and in logic it is an undeniable proposition. If you may do that with the Indians, why can you not do it with the Chinese who are here subject to your laws? Why has not Congress the power to distribute them at its will and pleasure in any part of the United States where it has got a foothold in the shape of a public domain; or it might even go far beyond that, for the current of authority strongly indicates the power of Congress to regulate people in such conditions and to compel them to migrate from section to section wherever it choses that they shall go.

Here, then, we have a class of population introduced by hundreds of thousands. There are 105,000 laboring Chinamen, they tell us, on the Pacific slope, and I suppose the entire Chinese census in the United States would amount perhaps to two hundred thousand people, all subject to Congress. I have no right and no power to deny that. We exercise over them the control to keep them from our shores, and after they get here we exercise the control to regulate their movements as we see proper.

I wish to call attention to an assertion of power in the veto message of President Arthur which gives me just alarm. It may be supposed by some Senators in the Republican ranks of this body that my opposition to the immigration of Chinamen into this country is based upon the fact that the Republicans of the Atlantic slope are in favor of their immigration and the Democrats on the Pacific slope and elsewhere are opposed to it, and that I am governing my conduct simply by a question of party fealty and allegiance. I beg to assure the Senate that that consideration does not enter into my convictions upon this question. In an earlier part of my remarks I took occasion to show to the Senate in what way and to what extent we have suffered by the introduction of a strange people among us. I have undertaken to show you that after the negro was brought to this country and was manumitted and made our equal in political affairs how terribly difficult it was for us to protect our civilization.

Here is a President of the United States who makes loud professions, as I understand it, of his friendship for the negro race. In speeches, in his letter of acceptance, and in various utterances he has done like a great many of his confrères in the Republican party, thundered tremendously in the index, but when he came to the body of his book there was a vacuum where great promises had been made; there was a total failure of compliance where there had been the most solemn pledge that action would be taken. Says the President in his recent veto message:

> The States of the Pacific slope are full of evidences of their industry.
> Chinese industry.
> Enterprises profitable alike to the capitalist and to the laborer of Caucasian origin would have lain dormant but for them. A time has now come when it is supposed that they are not needed, and when it is thought by Congress and by those most acquainted with the subject that it is best to try to get along without them.

Mark the words, "that it is best to try to get along without them."

> There may, however, be other sections of the country where this species of labor may be advantageously employed without interfering with the laborers of our own race. In making the proposed experiment, it may be the part of wisdom as well as of good faith to fix the length of the experimental period with reference to this fact.

With reference to what fact? That there are parts of the United States where the Chinese can be employed successfully and usefully without being brought into competition with our own race. The President is a pure Caucasian, more English than anything else, with the bluest of the blue blood in his veins. So that when he speaks of our race does he not speak of that Caucasian race which springs up in to beauty and glory wherever the sun shines upon it? Here is a Republican, a negrophilist, a man who has pledged himself heart and soul, so far as pledges can go, to the equality of the negro race with the white race in every respect, who says that there may be places in this country where the Chinese can be properly employed and where the Chinaman will not come into competition with our race. If not with our race, then with what race is he to come into competition? With the negro race. Where are the negroes? They are in the Southern States, in our midst, in that country which they love so dearly that it seems impossible to divorce them from it. Poverty and sickness and distress and alleged persecution, it seems, cannot drive the negro from the old plantation home. There is the negro to be found in vast masses, occupying a rich, a beautiful, and a splendid country, and understanding perfectly the power of his labor to control it. Here is a Republican at the head of the Republican party who cajoles with him all the time, trying to make him believe he is the best friend he has got in the world, who says if the Chinese cannot be profitably employed on the Pacific coast there is a place where they can be employed, and where they will not come in competition with our race, but with the negro race. That is lofty humanity. That is the grand conception of a man born in Vermont. It is the outgrowth of New England philanthropy, that when it is found that the white man on the Pacific slope cannot use the Chinaman any longer as servile and menial to do his work at his bidding he must be shipped down to the South, to come in competition with people who are not of our race—with the negro race.

Sir, I commend that piece of arrant Executive hypocrisy to the profound consideration of the men and the philosophers of this and of coming generations. It will never be surpassed in the annals of history. No example will ever be set again by a President of the United States which so betrays the deep-settled conviction of his own heart that there is after all a race of people in this country who have been elevated to equality with the white race who are not worthy of it, either in respect to social or political power. Picture to yourself the condition of the South with six millions of Chinese there to inhabit that country along with the six million negroes, and the struggles of these untutored and untrained men in their controversies for the possession of the soil and the control of the country, and see how barbarism will be turned loose in that land, already sufficiently persecuted, to the utter destruction of the last vestige of civilization we have there.

I can conceive of nothing more hideous than the strife which must arise between these people. That was not a mere hint or a mere intimation of a Presidential message. He lays facts before us, arguments and suggestions, which we are expected to regard with reverence and respect because they are supposed to come from a source of profound wisdom and of great power. So it is that we are told plainly if the Chinese cannot live on the Pacific slope, if the people in that country will not permit them to stay there, there is a place to which Congress can transfer them with his sanction, where they can go and occupy the territory without coming into competition with our race. When the matter has taken this shape, and the President has given to his message this distinctive purpose, this emphatic avowal of what he wants to do, you can understand why it is that a Southern man who has been raised in the midst of the Africans, and who now experiences the difficulty of getting along with that class of people, must revolt and turn away with despair at the fate to which the President of the United States would consign us. This, sir, is not the quarrel of the Pacific slope alone; the entire Southern people are involved in it.

Mr. FARLEY. And the Northern States.

Mr. MORGAN. The Northern States are involved in it, too, to a certain extent. But the outlet for Chinese labor and Chinese population has been opened in this Presidential message, the door has been thrown open, and we are invited now to confirm and ratify the act of the President by limiting the time of exclusion, as he has indicated it, to ten years.

I wish to see a limitation of at least fifteen years put into the bill, and I will state my reasons for it. I have the honor to be a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations. When this bill first came before it the junior Senator from California, [Mr. MILLER,] being a member of the committee, submitted twenty years as the proper period of exclusion. That struck upon my mind at first with some degree of harshness. The Senator was invited to state his reasons, and did so, as he frankly stated them on the floor of the Senate when the bill was first considered by this body. What were they? A restriction of twenty years is no exclusion. The honest, hard-handed immigrant who is starting his family in life, the young man with his wife upon his arm who chooses to go to the West and settle himself upon a farm and toil for a livelihood with some expectation of greater growth in later years, will not go to the West because the Chinaman is there. Too well do I know that fact. You cannot persuade the men who come from abroad to go to the South, that beautiful, rich, and salubrious land, because the negro is there. Although I have oftentimes reflected with some severity in my mind upon the purposes of certain leading Republicans in this country who were enticing an exodus of negroes from the South, yet when I came to consider it maturely I have thought that these were blessings in disguise, the like of which had never fallen upon the people before, for every negro that you can relieve us of in the South by fairly enticing him to come into your own midst and to stay with you furnishes a place for an honest white man and a white family—the class alone who give prosperity and strength and power to the country and its institutions.

You will send the Chinese to the South, you will flood our plantations with them, you will engage them by the hundreds of thousands in diking the Mississippi River, you will let them loose upon our society there, and you will expect us to take care of them and of the negroes also. Gentlemen, it is an impossibility. I know there are large planters in the South, men who have heretofore held on to the plantation system almost with the grasp of death, reluctant to give up that which gave them once so much power and ease and comfort, who now desire that Chinese coolies shall be brought there and be subjected to them under contracts ranging from five to fifteen and twenty years, so that they may re-establish the plantation system. But that is against the genius of our country to-day, and it is the greatest damper that could be thrown upon the prosperity of our people. Nothing could be deprecated so much as that by a man who has got any concern for his own blood, for his own race and his own kindred in that land. I therefore participate in every respect and to every extent with the gentlemen who represent the Pacific slope in my abhorrence of the introduction of these people.

The Chinese of the classes excluded by this bill are not a worthy people to be introduced here. I will read a brief extract from an eminent man from Missouri—a man whose vocation was that of preaching the gospel of Christ, and was one of the most brilliant and splendid of the men of that great State. I refer to Bishop Marvin, of honorable and glorious memory. He went "to the East by the way of the West," and he gave to his church and his people a faithful and fair narrative of all that he saw in that journey around the world. I must read you a few extracts from his pen. He went from Japan to China, and he draws a comparison between the Japanese cooly and the Chinese cooly. He says:

> The contrasts appear also in the first sight you get of the people. There is the most striking absence of the cleanliness of the Japanese. There even the coolies have the appearance of being washed; here they look filthy. There the little boats that ply about the harbor for chance jobs, though innocent of paint, are scoured every day, and have the inviting aspect of cleanliness; here they are dirty-looking, though some are painted. Here the clothing of many of the laborers is a mere mass of rags, while there the poorest, even if only half-clad, show an aspect of neatness in the scant garments they have.

He speaks then of the habits of the Chinese in those large cities which they have built, some of which, I believe, have the largest populations to be found in the world. He says:

> But, oh, the filth of a Chinese city! The smells! the smells! the smells! ugh! I have no such mastery of language as will enable me to do justice to this subject, but if I had I would not attempt it, for a civilized man would have to hold his nose to read it.

Speaking of their customs in their domestic affairs, he says:

> All the water the natives use in Shanghai—and I suppose in all other cities or the level parts of the country—is taken out of the canals. Come with me a moment to the bank of the canal. Do you see the mouth of that sewer pouring its filthy contents into it? Just below see that woman washing the foulest vessel. Below her there is a man washing his face and hands, the first time, maybe, for a week. Below him, again, a man is dropping two buckets into the water, the buckets suspended, one from each end of a bamboo pole. His buckets filled he balances the pole on his shoulder and trots off along the narrow streets. Where is he going? To some Chinese gentleman's house, bearing the supply of water for cooking, making tea, drinking, and all other purposes for which water is used. For these domestic uses all foreigners save the water from their roofs, preserving it in huge earthen jars; but the natives, high and low, depend on the canal for all purposes. So delicately cultivated is the celestial palate.

I never read a chapter out of the New Testament that I had more faith in than I have in that statement coming from Bishop Marvin, and every man who ever knew him is bound to say that it is a true picture. In God's name, are we to introduce the laboring classes of these people into this country in such swarms and abundance as will satisfy the demand of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts in his desire to Christianize and civilize them? The Senator might take all the Christianity of Massachusetts and carry it to China and spread it upon a single city and they would not know that anything had happened there. The preachers want them to come here to be Christianized. Ah! they forget Ignatius Loyola, they forget the great propagandist; they spurn men who take the cross in their hands and go with it abroad to preach Christ, according to the commandment, to all the nations of the earth. They want to sit here in their comfortable chapels, supported by their congregations, while they preach the Gospel to the Chinese imported for the purpose of labor.

There is more than that in this question. I will read now from an article from Mr. George H. Seward, lately our consul-general to China, published in the American Cyclopædia, making a standard article which is supposed to be literally and strictly true. Mr. Seward says:

> The domestic and social life of the Chinese has, perhaps, more features in common with western nations than that of other oriental peoples. Although polygamy exists among the wealthier classes, and their women generally live in seclusion, family life is much esteemed and cultivated among them.

It will be gratifying to both Senators from Massachusetts to find that polygamy exists in China chiefly among the wealthier classes. It is the same case in Utah; that is to say, only the wealthy man can support more than one wife.

Mr. Seward says:

> The first wife has the full control of the household, while the concubines are little more than servants and housemaids. The Chinese illustrate the relation by comparing the wife to the moon and the concubine to the stars, both of which in their appropriate spheres revolve around the sun.

Let us stop one moment and review a month of our own history in the Senate. Let us see if we can bring our philosophic contemplation to bear upon our own conduct in this august body just for a month past. Here we have been asserting ourselves before the world as a Christian power par excellence, and because we found a few vagabond polygamists in Utah we have punished them by unconstitutional laws, and the House of Representatives has turned one of them out for an offense committed before the act was passed which denounced the crime. But in the very act we passed we authorized a man to have one wife and one concubine, and still to be as good a voter as any man in the country. He could not have more than one concubine nor more than one wife and be a voter. That is the morality of Republican politics in the Senate and in the House. There it stands a bold and ineffaceable picture. Coming generations of Americans will read with shame and disgust that the President of the United States gave his approval to the bill and then turned around and refused to protect our people against the influx of a race who believe that polygamy is a part of the institutions of the great "Sun" from which they sprung, who have no doubt about their right to be polygamists. We invite polygamists to come to this country in any quantity that may suit the fastidious tastes of the Senators from Massachusetts in respect to human liberty, and yet we deny them when native-born the right to vote. That is a chapter in the history of this country which is worthy to be read by men who reflect upon the philosophy of government. It is a reproach and nothing but a reproach upon the sincerity of our actions.

Can we think of any race of men whom we would not sooner invite to this country than the Chinese? I would go and open up the heart of Africa and bring those negroes from the slavery in which they are held to-day by their fathers and their kinsmen, and put them under the guidance and guardianship of the negroes of the South with the expectation of civilizing them and making them good inhabitants of this country and good citizens, rather than to turn loose the hordes of the lower classes of Chinese on this land. Are we to allow a sickly sentimentalism to induce us to violate all that belongs to our race and our Government and our country in order to let these men in here who are to become as servile laborers and slaves, for they are little else, to wealthy men?

I have discussed this question much longer than I expected to do; indeed I did not think I would occupy more than a very few minutes, but it seems to me that it is the duty of the American people again to express themselves upon this subject, and not to bow in humility to the one man who holds the treaty-making power, or the largest part of it, and also the veto power, and say to him "Thy will be done."

I would be glad to see the day in this country when the will of the American people, solemnly expressed, shall at last be sufficient to carry their measures into execution against the veto power of the President. I will remark again, and in conclusion, that there never was a more dangerous combination of power than that of the treaty-making power and the veto power, through which two Presidents in succession have thwarted and checked and destroyed the will of the American people.

Mr. SLATER. Mr. President——

Mr. VEST. Will the Senator from Oregon yield to me for a motion to adjourn?

Mr. SLATER. Yes, sir.

Mr. VEST. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. CONGER. Before that motion is put, I ask that the bill be printed with the amendments proposed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Missouri withdraw his motion to adjourn, in order that the Senator from Michigan may move that the bill as amended be printed for the use of the Senate to-morrow?

Mr. FARLEY. I hope not. It has already been printed.

Mr. CONGER. If the gentleman will withdraw his motion, I move that the bill be printed for the use of the Senate to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan moves that the bill be printed for the use of the Senate to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER. Do I understand that the Senator from Oregon [Mr. SLATER] has the floor for to-morrow on this question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon has the floor.

Mr. FARLEY. On this bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On this bill.

DISCUSSION ON JAPANESE INDEMNITY FUND BILL.

Mr. MORGAN. I offer the following resolution, in order to get the opportunity to-morrow to discuss in the morning hour a certain bill:

Resolved, That during the 26th day of April, 1882, while the Senate is proceeding with business under the Anthony rule, the provision limiting debate to five minutes, and that a Senator shall not speak more than once, shall be suspended.

I ask that the resolution lie over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be printed, and lie upon the table.

Mr. VEST. I renew my motion that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at five o'clock and twenty-one minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, April 25, 1882.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. F. D. POWER.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

BRIDGE OVER MISSOURI RIVER.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Iowa. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of House bill No. 2313, and that it be now taken up and put on its passage.

The bill, as amended by the Committee on Commerce, was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. No. 2313) authorizing the Sioux City and Pacific Railroad Company to construct and maintain a railroad bridge over the Missouri River.

Be it enacted, &c., That the Sioux City and Pacific Railroad Company, a corporation existing under the laws of the State of Iowa, or its assigns, are hereby authorized, for the purpose of making a more perfect connection for its line over the Missouri River, to construct and maintain a railroad bridge across said river at the most suitable and convenient point within ten miles of the present crossing between the county of Washington, in the State of Nebraska, and the county of Harrison, in the State of Iowa.

SEC. 2. That said bridge shall be constructed and built without material interference with the security and convenience of navigation of said river beyond what is necessary to carry into effect the rights and privileges hereby granted; and in order to secure a compliance with these conditions the corporation, previous to commencing the construction of the bridge or of the accessory works designed to secure the best practical channel-way for navigation and confine the flow of the water to a permanent channel at said point, shall submit to the Secretary of War a plan of the bridge and of such accessory works, together with a detailed map of the river at the proposed site of the bridge and for a distance of a mile above and below the site, together with all other information touching said bridge and river and accessory works as may be deemed requisite by the Secretary of War to determine whether the said bridge, when built, will conform to the prescribed conditions of this act; that said bridge shall be constructed and built without material interference with the security and convenience of navigation of said river beyond what is necessary to carry into effect the rights and privileges hereby granted.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed, upon receiving such plan and map and other information, and upon being satisfied that a bridge built on such plan and with such accessory works and at such locality will conform to the prescribed conditions of this act, to notify the company that he approves the same; and upon receiving such notification the said company may proceed to an erection of said bridge, conforming strictly to the approved plan and location; but until the Secretary of War approves the plan and location of said bridge and accessory works, and notify the company of the same, the bridge shall not be built; and should any change be made in the plan of the bridge or said accessory works, during the progress of the work thereon, such change shall be subject likewise to the approval of the Secretary of War.

SEC. 4. That the said bridge and accessory works, when built and constructed under this act and according to the terms and limitations thereof, shall be lawful structures; and said bridge shall be recognized and known as a post-route, upon which also no higher charge shall be made for the transmission over the same of the mails, the troops, and the munitions of war of the United States, or for passengers or freight passing over said bridge, than the rate per mile paid for the transportation over the railroads or public highways leading to said bridge; and said bridge shall enjoy the rights and privileges of other post-routes in the United States.

SEC. 5. That said corporation may execute a mortgage upon the bridge, its approaches and appurtenances, including said accessory works, and issue bonds secured by the same, bearing such rate of interest, and payable, principal and interest, as such corporation shall determine; and such mortgage shall constitute the first lien upon the said bridge and other property in said mortgage mentioned and described.

SEC. 6. That the United States shall have the right of way for postal telegraph across said bridge.

SEC. 7. That the Sioux City and Pacific Railroad Company may assign all the rights, privileges, and franchises conferred by and contained in this act, if said company shall deem said assignment expedient and for its best interests: Provided, however, That said bridge, if built by the assigns of said company, shall be constructed and maintained in all respects on the terms and subject to the conditions, limitations, and restrictions herein contained.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HOLMAN. There is now a general law in regard to the construction of bridges over the Ohio River; and I apprehend that a similar measure of general legislation could be applied to the Mississippi and Missouri Rivers. While I do not object to this bill, I beg to give notice, Mr. Speaker, that hereafter in reference to the bridging of any one of those Western rivers I shall insist it shall be done under a general law, the provisions of which have been carefully drawn and well-considered, and not by the special enactments which are uniformly passed by unanimous consent and without any opportunity to understand thoroughly their provisions.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Iowa. I trust the gentleman will not insist upon his objection to this bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not object to this bill, but give notice I will hereafter object to any other bill.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Iowa. I ask to move an amendment to the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out, in lines 7 and 8, in section 4, the words "or for passengers or freight over said bridge," and add to the end of said section the following: "And Congress reserves the right at any time to regulate by appropriate legislation the charges for freight and passengers over said bridge."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Iowa. I move the following amendment to the last section.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to section 7 the following: "Reserving to Congress the right to amend, alter, or repeal this act."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Iowa, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to what I believe to be a question of privilege. Yesterday, in the discussion of the bill which proposed among other things to repeal the law securing to soldiers and sailors of the Union Army the right to be appointed on the police force of this District, the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. MCLANE,] whom I see is in his seat, made use of the following language:

I say I can very well understand the motive which induced the honorable gentleman from Indiana to follow the example of my friend from New Jersey was not more respectable than the original motive.

It is very true that the moment before I used these words, "allow me to make an explanation," but not at that time, and until I read this report I did not understand the purport of the language of the gentleman from Maryland, else I should have at that moment insisted upon the right to be heard. However eminent the gentleman from Maryland may be, I do not recognize his right to fix the standard of respectability in matters of opinion in voting for measures on this floor. I deny the right of that gentleman or any other gentleman to determine for the members of this House what is or what is not respectable in voting for a measure.

Mr. MCLANE. Will the honorable gentleman from Indiana permit me before he proceeds further?

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. MCLANE. I should like to have his permission entirely to withdraw, not qualify, but absolutely to withdraw that expression.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is entirely satisfactory to me.

Mr. MCLANE. At the same time I ask the gentleman from New Jersey to permit me to withdraw it as to him.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have nothing further to say.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think matters of that kind, not noticed at the time, are questions of privilege.

Mr. HOLMAN. I stated that my reason for rising was that the remark was not noticed at the time, that in the midst of the confusion it was not distinctly heard.

Mr. CAMP. I ask that the gentleman from Indiana be allowed to proceed if he desires to do so.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am entirely satisfied with the withdrawal of the offensive remark by the gentleman from Maryland. The explanation I should have made was this: the numerous measures upon the statute-book in behalf of the Union soldiers were put there by Democratic as well as Republican votes, and by no vote of mine will any one of them be repealed.

Mr. McLANE. What I desire to say to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] I beg permission also to say to the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ROBESON,] that as to the phrase that the motive of the honorable gentleman was not more respectable than the motive of the honorable gentleman from New Jersey I am very sorry I used a word which was susceptible of a disagreeable if not offensive interpretation. I said yesterday to the honorable gentleman from New Jersey that it was not intended in an offensive sense, and I prefer to withdraw it altogether.

Mr. HAZELTON. That is entirely satisfactory. [Great laughter.]

Mr. ROBESON. Mr. Speaker, I desire publicly to acknowledge the courtesy of the gentleman from Maryland and to thank him for his manly exercise of it. If I said anything disagreeable yesterday, or which the gentleman thinks he has a right in any way to complain of, I beg in the best spirit to take it all back. [Laughter.]

Mr. HUMPHREY. I move that all that was said yesterday be taken back. [Laughter.]

CROW INDIAN RESERVATION.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I move, by unanimous consent, that the bill (S. No. 1045) to accept and ratify an agreement with the Crow Indians for the sale of a portion of their reservation in the Territory of Montana required for the use of the Northern Pacific Railroad, and to make the necessary appropriations for carrying out the same, be taken from the Speaker's table and put on its passage at this time.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

Mr. MAGINNIS. As it is a long bill, perhaps a word of explanation will save objection.

Mr. RANDALL. A bill to be passed should be read.

Mr. KASSON. As it is a long bill I must object.

Mr. RANDALL. I have a short bill.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I object. I object to all of them. The Territories of the United States are under the jurisdiction of this Congress. A day is set apart for the District of Columbia. We ought to have some rights.

PUBLIC BUILDING, MARQUETTE, MICHIGAN.

Mr. HUBBELL. Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as I shall be compelled to ask leave of absence of the House to-day, to be absent perhaps for some time in consequence of the sickness of my brother, having just received a telegram informing me of the same, and as I would be entitled on Monday next to the floor for a motion to suspend the rules and pass this bill, I now ask the House to permit the bill which I send to the desk to be passed, as I shall probably be kept away two or three weeks. This bill is recommended by the committee and is a good bill and ought to be passed.

The SPEAKER. The title of the bill will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. No. 4174) for the erection of a public building at Marquette, Michigan.

Mr. HUBBELL. I ask that the bill be put upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, subject to objection.

The bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HOLMAN. I shall be compelled to call for the regular order.

Mr. HUBBELL. I am obliged to go away, and as I would be entitled to recognition on Monday next to suspend the rules I hope the gentleman from Indiana will not insist upon his demand.

Mr. HOLMAN. I demand the regular order on a general principle. I should be very glad to accommodate the gentleman, but bills of this character ought only to be taken up in their order.

Mr. HUBBELL. I appeal to the gentleman to withdraw his objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman from Indiana as insisting upon his objection.

Mr. HUBBELL. Then I give notice that there can be no other unanimous consent in this House.

PARIS MONETARY CONFERENCE.

Mr. BUCKNER. I ask consent at this time to present a privileged report from the Committee on Banking and Currency. I am directed by the committee to report back the following resolution, and recommend its adoption.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to this House, if not in his opinion incompatible with the public interest, all correspondence that may have taken place between this Government and that of any of the European or other governments since the adjournment of the Paris monetary conference of 1881, touching the reassembling of said conference at Paris during the current year; and also that he inform this House whether any delegates to said adjourned conference have been or will be appointed by this Government; and, if not, the reasons of such non-action on the part of the Government of the United States.

Mr. BUCKNER. I ask the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. BUCKNER moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HUBBELL. I understand the gentleman from Indiana says that although he cannot withdraw his objection to the passage of the bill which I have asked unanimous consent to put upon its passage, that he will not object to my asking unanimous consent to suspend the rules and pass the bill to-day, as I would have the right to do on Monday.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have no objection to that.

Mr. RANDALL. I shall have to object to that.

Mr. HASKELL. Then I demand the regular order.

REMOVAL OF AN OFFICIAL REPORTER.

Mr. CARLISLE. I desire to offer a resolution which relates to the construction of a rule of the House, and which will give rise to no debate whatever.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas Mr. Andrew Devine, a member of the official reporting corps, has received the following notification:

SPEAKER'S ROOM, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, April 13, 1882.

SIR: Your services as acting stenographic reporter for committees of the House of Representatives are dispensed with from and after this date. You are not regarded as holding any continuing valid appointment as such reporter for this Congress, but, assuming that you do, you are removed for good and sufficient cause.

Very truly, yours,

J. WARREN KEIFER,
Speaker House of Representatives.

ANDREW DEVINE, Esq.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

And whereas it is claimed on behalf of Mr. Devine that, while he, like all the other official reporters, is of course removable by the House at its pleasure, with or without cause, the action of the Speaker in the premises does not constitute removal for cause within the true meaning and intention of the rule: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to make full inquiry into the case of Mr. Devine and the validity of the action of the Speaker therein, and to report without delay and at any time their conclusions, with such recommendations as they may deem proper.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. ROBESON. I shall not object to that resolution. I am not sorry it is offered; because I think it is about time that the employés of this House give up trying their cases by newspaper paragraphs and abuse of members, and appeal to the Judiciary Committee of this House if they have an alleged grievance.

Mr. CARLISLE. I fully agree with the gentleman from New Jersey that the matter should be considered by the law committee of this House; and therefore I move the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. ROBESON. I hope it will pass.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the resolution should pass.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. CARLISLE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PAYMENTS MADE TO MISSOURI MILITIA.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a report from the Third Auditor relative to the payments made by the State of Missouri since April 17, 1866, to the militia forces of said State for services performed in the suppression of the rebellion, and stating that $234,594.10 is justly due in consequence thereof; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

REFERENCE OF SENATE PENSION BILLS.

Mr. BROWNE, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That all Senate pension bills now on the Speaker's table be taken therefrom and referred to their appropriate committees.

Under the above order the following Senate bills were taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions:

A bill (S. No. 163) granting a pension to Hiram Johnson;
A bill (S. No. 165) granting a pension to Mrs. Rose M. Wood;
A bill (S. No. 462) granting a pension to Emma A. Ramsey;
A bill (S. No. 633) granting a pension to Hugo Eichholtz;
A bill (S. No. 725) granting a pension to S. Annie Esterbrook;
A bill (S. No. 802) granting a pension to Mrs. Cornelia F. White;
A bill (S. No. 832) granting a pension to Simeon Crain;
A bill (S. No. 1040) granting a pension to Theodore Rauthe;
A bill (S. No. 1195) granting a pension to William Hazelit;
A bill (S. No. 1218) to restore to the pension-roll the name of Frederick A. Garlick;
A bill (S. No. 1301) granting an increase of pension to George Gans;
A bill (S. No. 1313) granting a pension to Samuel Horner; and

A bill (S. No. 1576) granting a pension to Ellen Lardner.

The following Senate bills were taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (S. No. 219) for the relief of Rebecca Wright;
A bill (S. No. 230) granting a pension to Angus McAuley;
A bill (S. No. 629) granting a pension to Lemuel Adams;
A bill (S. No. 643) for the relief of Ellen Moore, widow of Allen Moore, deceased;
A bill (S. No. 1401) granting a pension to Elizabeth Gray; and
A bill (S. No. 1532) granting a pension to George C. Quick.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CALKINS. I rise to a question of the highest privilege. I call up the contested-election case of John R. Lynch vs. James R. Chalmers, from the sixth Congressional district of Mississippi. I yield for a moment to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. ATHERTON,] who desires to make a statement.

Mr. RANDALL. It is understood that by permitting the gentleman to yield to his colleague we do not waive the right to raise the question of consideration.

Mr. CALKINS. I desire my colleague on the committee to be first heard.

Mr. ATHERTON. I understand it is desired to raise the question of consideration against this contested-election case; and I am making no objection to that. I want to suggest, however, to the House, that having been detained for a considerable time by reason of sickness, I arrived here yesterday and was quite unable to make my appearance in the House. I have not had an opportunity to consult with gentlemen representing the minority of the House as to who will discuss the case or as to the manner in which the discussion is to proceed on our side. If it should suit the views of the majority of the committee it would suit me very much to have a slight delay anyhow, whether the question of consideration is raised or not. I hope the House will concede to the minority, so that we may properly present our case, a short delay of not more than a few days in which to make arrangements as to who shall discuss the case and the order of discussion, so that we may be properly prepared for it.

Mr. CALKINS. I understand there are one or two matters which it is important should be considered to-day; and if the case is called up and my colleague, the gentleman from Ohio, does not feel able to go on to-day, after an hour's speech on this side, I will let the matter go over till to-morrow and allow other business to come in after that.

Mr. ATHERTON. Say Thursday, anyhow.

Mr. KASSON. I desire to be heard before any arrangement of that kind is made.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I ask if the unfinished pending business, the consideration of the tariff-commission bill, does not have priority of this contested-election case?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. KASSON. I desire to say to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ATHERTON] that in accordance with notice both publicly and privately given, and an arrangement made long ago, this was the week in which the debate on the tariff-commission bill was to be brought to a conclusion. Gentlemen on both sides of the House have prepared themselves accordingly, and to all questions on this subject last week I answered that early this week, probably on Tuesday, Monday being devoted to other business, I should ask the House to begin the end of this discussion. I believe it will facilitate all public business to adhere to that arrangement, so that we may get the tariff bill out of the way. It is for that reason I have said and desire to say to the gentleman from Indiana that I was under obligations to antagonize other business, and I have assured various gentlemen on both sides that this morning we were to commence the last three days' discussion and finish it. I desire that to be understood in connection with any proposed arrangement as to other business.

Mr. CALKINS. I wish to say I am in discharge of what I believe to be a public duty in pursuance of notice given, a continuing notice given by me on several occasions. I feel it necessary for me this morning to adhere to the notice given; but while I do that, in fairness to my colleague on the committee who is charged with the minority report, I do not want to force him along faster than he feels he can go fitly in his present physical condition. I therefore desire the case to be called up for one hour, and then if the gentleman is not able to go on I will agree that the case shall go over until to-morrow.

Mr. RANDALL. In reference to the understanding reached, and to which the gentleman from Iowa has called attention, as to the discussion on the tariff-commission bill, I want to say that the House or those who desire to speak have already lost four days that should have been under the agreement given to that discussion; and in anticipation of having four days in place of those that have been lost by interrupting business, we may not be able to reach a final vote on the tariff-commission bill on Thursday next, as some time ago was the design on all sides.

Mr. KASSON. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will allow me to state again that the understanding was we should have what we should get of the four days that were to be asked for this discussion this week. We did have Thursday. I tried to get evening sessions, but failed.

Mr. RANDALL. The spirit of the understanding in the committee, and I think on the floor of the House, was that the discussion of the tariff-commission bill was to be allowed to have full sway during last week, except on Monday, which was the day for suspensions of the rules. Surely the minority of the committee so understood it, and with that view it was agreed that the general debate on the tariff bill should be closed on Thursday next.

Now, having lost that which by the spirit at least, if not by the letter, of the understanding we were entitled to have, I fear it will be impossible to reach a vote on that bill on the 27th of this month; certainly not if this report from the Committee on Elections is to be precipitated here at this time.

Mr. CALKINS. There is no precipitation of this question on the House at all.

Mr. RANDALL. One moment; until I get through.

Mr. CALKINS. I thought the gentleman was through.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] will adhere to his purpose of raising the question of consideration, so as to raise an issue between the tariff-commission bill and the contested-election case.

Mr. KASSON. I do not desire to raise an issue between the tariff bill and anything else, but to come up to the understanding as far as possible. I therefore shall ask the House to adhere to that understanding.

Mr. CALKINS. I now call up the contested-election case of Lynch against Chalmers.

Mr. BOWMAN. I only want to give notice that at the expiration of the hour which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] states he will now take on the election case, I shall ask on a question of consideration that the House come to a vote on the claims bill. There is nothing to be done on that bill now but to take it up and vote on it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOWMAN] that the claims bill would not be first in order at the expiration of an hour from this time and before the morning hour.

Mr. BOWMAN. I supposed that raising the question of consideration was always in order.

Mr. KELLEY. I desire to enforce what the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] in charge of the tariff-commission bill has said, and especially what was said by my colleague from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL.] There was an understanding arrived at in the Committee on Ways and Means that there should be the fullest discussion possible upon the tariff-commission bill, and many gentlemen have prepared with care and deliberation remarks upon that subject. Four members of the Committee on Ways and Means, who have prepared themselves to express their views, have not yet been heard. We were to obtain all the time that could be had last week, and the understanding did imply that we would get time last week; but we had a part of a day only, and that by grace. We were to hold evening sessions if possible, and the gentleman in charge of the bill made repeated efforts to obtain them, but objection was made by gentlemen on the other side of the House.

I ask now that as soon as we can we enter again upon the discussion of that bill, with the understanding that we will proceed with that discussion by day and by evening sessions until the general debate shall have closed. I think that in view of the gravity of the measure we ought to resume the discussion as soon as possible.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] calls up the contested-election case of Lynch vs. Chalmers.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. Or rather a point of order. On Saturday last I introduced a resolution which some of us considered one of privilege, and I was asked to postpone its consideration until Monday, which I did. On yesterday it came up, and I was asked by the Committee on Foreign Affairs to postpone it again until this morning; and I had the pledge of the committee, represented by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. ORTH,] that it should then be considered. I have the RECORD here showing that in his own language he agreed that it should be considered "the first thing to-morrow morning;" that is, this morning.

Now, my point is that I am entitled to the floor on that resolution in regard to the rights of American citizens who have been so long neglected. I wish to be heard a few minutes upon that subject. I consider that it is before the House and should take precedence of all other subjects.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the resolution of the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROBINSON] was offered and a point of order was made against it, and it was agreed between the gentleman from New York and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ORTH] that the resolution should go over with the point of order pending.

The Chair also will state that the privileged matter now called up by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] is one of higher privilege than the resolution of the gentleman from New York, even assuming that the resolution itself involves a question of privilege. Hence the Chair will entertain the proposition of the gentleman from Indiana as one of higher privilege, without deciding the question whether the other is one of privilege or not.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. A word on that point of order. I presume the point of order was pending, and this resolution was put over with that point pending.

The SPEAKER. The point of order will be considered when the resolution shall be reached.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I want the resolution considered now, and if the Chair decides against me, I most respectfully, and with the highest respect for the Chair, must appeal from his decision. I maintain that the resolution is now before the House, and I demand that it be considered, or I must retire from the matter if I cannot be heard upon it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] calls up as a question of high privilege the contested election case of Lynch vs. Chalmers. The gentleman from New York [Mr. ROBINSON] claims that a resolution introduced by himself on a former day, which by consent was passed over, is also a question of privilege.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. And of higher privilege than the other.

The SPEAKER. And of higher privilege, according to his claim.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. That is my point.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, without deciding whether or not the resolution of the gentleman from New York is one of privilege, holds that the right of a member to his seat is of higher privilege than the resolution possibly could be. Having so decided, the Chair understands that the gentleman from New York appeals from its decision.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I very respectfully appeal from the decision of the Chair, and believe that the Speaker himself would be glad if his decision was overruled.

Mr. CALKINS. I move to lay the appeal on the table.

The question being put,

The SPEAKER said: In the opinion of the Chair the motion of the gentleman from Indiana is agreed to.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

So the appeal from the decision of the Chair was laid on the table.

Mr. CALKINS. I yield for a moment to the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. WILLIAMS.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. What right has the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] to yield?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana can only control the floor for the purpose of calling up the question of privilege.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. I ask consent to say a single word which will antagonize nobody. The Committee on Foreign Affairs have been arraigned several times in their absence. They have adjourned their session this morning for the express purpose of showing cause in the House. They will join my friend from New York [Mr. ROBINSON] in waiving the point of order and insisting upon the question of privilege so soon as it shall come up; and I have the assurance of the gentleman from Indiana that after this hour the gentleman from New York may raise his question of privilege; and we will second him.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. The gentleman from Indiana has no hour.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana has not entered upon the debate.

Mr. KASSON. I wish at the proper time to raise the question of consideration upon this contested-election case.

The SPEAKER. The question of consideration has already been raised by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL.] The question is, Will the House proceed to consider the contested-election case of Lynch vs. Chalmers?

The question being taken, there were—ayes 89, noes 94.

Mr. CALKINS. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 97, nays 121, not voting 73; as follows:

So the House refused to consider the contested-election case.

The following pairs were announced from the Clerk's desk:

Mr. CORNELL with Mr. BLACK.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, with Mr. WILSON.

Mr. WEST with Mr. HARRIS, of New Jersey.

Mr. FARWELL, of Illinois, with Mr. MARTIN.

Mr. HISCOCK with Mr. BLACKBURN.

Mr. WAIT with Mr. HOGE.

Mr. WILLITS with Mr. KNOTT.

Mr. MULDROW with Mr. MILES.

Mr. LEEDOM with Mr. SHULTZ.

Mr. GEDDES with Mr. RICE, of Ohio.

Mr. VALENTINE with Mr. HARDY.

Mr. MOREY with Mr. CONVERSE.

Mr. CROWLEY with Mr. NOLAN.

Mr. FISHER with Mr. COBB.

Mr. W. A. WOOD with Mr. BENJAMIN WOOD.

Mr. HENDERSON with Mr. SINGLETON of Illinois.

Mr. MARSH with Mr. MCKENZIE.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS with Mr. BEACH.

Mr. OATES with Mr. NORCROSS.

Mr. RYAN with Mr. LE FEVRE.

Mr. HOUK with Mr. DUGROW.

Mr. WILSON. I voted under the impression my pair with Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, had expired. The pair having been announced as still existing I sent for the paper, and I see by looking at it that I have been laboring under misapprehension, and that it continues until further notice. I therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. HOOKER. I ask unanimous consent to record my vote.

The SPEAKER. That is not allowed.

Mr. HOOKER. Might not the House accord it? I ask it of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not allowed to entertain the request at all. It is not allowed to put it to the House under the rule.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. CALKINS. I think it due to the House to make this statement——

Mr. RANDALL. I object.

Mr. CALKINS. I yield to the majority, but give notice I shall call up the election case each morning hereafter.

AMERICAN CITIZENS IN BRITISH PRISONS.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I wish to make a few remarks on the subject of our American citizens in British prisons. I therefore call up the resolution introduced by me yesterday, and ask for its present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas on the 23d day of January, 1882, a resolution of inquiry was introduced in this House and was on that day referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs; and

Whereas afterward, on the 14th day of February, 1882, the same resolution, having been reported back, was recommitted to the Committee on Foreign Affairs with instructions, all of which will more fully appear by reference to the said resolution and instructions hereto appended and to the record of the proceedings of those days; and

Whereas by clause 2 of Rule XXIV every such resolution is required to be reported back by the committee to which it has been referred within one week of such reference; and

Whereas more than one week, to wit, ten weeks, have elapsed since the reference or recommitment of said resolution to said committee, and no report has been made thereon by said committee: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Affairs be, and they hereby are, discharged from the further consideration of said resolution and that the same be now brought before the House for immediate consideration—

Mr. KASSON. I raise the question of order. I wish also to raise the question of consideration, if it is to lead to general debate this morning and the consumption of time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is unable to state whether it will or not.

Mr. KASSON. But there is a question of order pending.

Mr. BLOUNT. I understand not.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. I am instructed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs to withdraw the question of order and to let the question of privilege be made.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the point of order raised yesterday, that it was not a privileged matter, has been withdrawn.

Mr. KASSON. I make it this morning in pursuance of the understanding.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa will be heard on the point of order if he desires it.

Mr. KASSON. I supposed it was argued yesterday in my absence.

The SPEAKER. It was not argued. The point was made yesterday by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. ORTH,] but was not argued. The Chair is willing to hear the gentleman from Iowa, otherwise the Chair is ready to decide the question now.

Mr. KASSON. I am willing to submit it without debate, as my object is to avoid long debate except on the proper subject before the House.

Mr. ORTH. Before the Chair rules I wish to say when I made the point yesterday I made it in good faith, and believed it was well taken, but on consultation with members of the Committee on Foreign Affairs we had concluded not to press the matter, but to get the resolution directly before the House for action. I understand the gentleman has not withdrawn the point of order on that question.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. The gentleman from Indiana not being present I withdrew the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa renews it.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. And I believe submits it without debate, to get the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. Am I in order?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. No, sir.

Mr. COX, of New York. What is the point of order?

The SPEAKER. It is that this resolution introduced by the gentleman from New York is not a privileged matter.

Mr. COX, of New York. There are two resolutions; which one is the point made on?

The SPEAKER. The resolution introduced by the gentleman from New York yesterday for adoption, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Affairs be, and are hereby, discharged from the further consideration of said resolution, and that the same be now brought before the House for immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. The resolution, from the further consideration of which it is sought to discharge the Committee on Foreign Affairs, is a resolution of inquiry, and originally introduced as such and referred to that committee. Upon being reported back to the House it was recommitted to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, with certain instructions. The Chair holds, in the first place, that the resolution upon being recommitted to the committee holds the same relation to the committee, and the same right under the rules of the House to be considered by the committee and reported back in the same time, as if it had been an original resolution of inquiry referred to them at the time of its recommitment. Under the last clause of paragraph 1, of Rule XXIV, the committees of the House are required to report resolutions of inquiry directed to heads of Executive Departments back within one week from the time of their reference. This being so, the question now before us is, is it a question of privilege to ask to discharge the Committee on Foreign Affairs from the further consideration of the resolution of inquiry as recommitted?

The Chair holds that this is a matter affecting the order of the business of the House. There may be perfectly good, wise, and valid reasons why the committee have not reported back the resolution, but the Chair is inclined to hold that the House may control the matter, and after the time has expired for reporting the resolution back the House has a right, as a matter of privilege, to call upon the committee to report it back or to discharge the committee from its further consideration. The Chair therefore holds that the resolution presented by the gentleman from New York, in so far as it seeks to discharge the Committee on Foreign Affairs from further consideration of the resolution of inquiry, is a matter of privilege, and therefore overrules the point of order.

Mr. KASSON. I now, sir, am bound to raise the question of consideration this morning, and do raise it.

The SPEAKER. The question of consideration may be raised. The question is, Will the House proceed to the consideration of the resolution introduced by the gentleman from New York?

The House divided; and there were—ayes 59, noes 78.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 144, nays 62, not voting 85; as follows:

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. ALDRICH, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills reported that they had examined and found duly enrolled bills of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. No. 3776) granting a pension to Margaret McCormick; and

A bill (H. R. No. 721) to authorize the appointment of an ordnance storekeeper in the Army.

IMPRISONMENT OF AMERICAN CITIZENS ABROAD.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. Mr. Speaker, over a year ago a number of gentlemen——

Mr. DUNNELL. I would like to hear the resolutions read again before the debate begins.

The resolutions were again read.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. Mr. Speaker, over a year ago some gentlemen known as American citizens, recognized by our laws as such, were traveling in Europe or engaged in lawful and proper business, and without having committed any crime, and without any allegation of their having committed any crime, were arrested on mere suspicion, as every American is suspected, and thrown into British dungeons, one after another, and have there been detained ever since. For fifteen or sixteen dreary months these men have lain in loathsome bastiles, damp and badly ventilated, some of them losing their eye-sight, and others with constitutions broken down, all of them appealing to the flag that is known as the starry banner, to which they have sworn allegiance and for which they had shed their blood, to come to their relief in the hour of their despair. I am not here, sir, to-day to make anything of a political question of this. I will give due credit to gentlemen on the opposite side of the Hall by saying that they are faithful and true to the right.

I remember with gratitude, sir, for I observe all these things, that eighteen gentlemen on the opposite side of the House voted to sustain me on the 14th of March last in the only sensible resolution which has been submitted on this question, asking the opinion of the Attorney-General whether if you, sir, went over to Ireland and were thrown into prison under the same circumstances we should allow you to remain there indefinitely; and to get the opinion of the able Attorney-General now in possession of that office as to the law upon that subject. That was voted down by a small majority on the yeas and nays—117 to 102; but I want to give credit to the other side that there were eighteen gentlemen from that quarter who voted for that sensible resolution. I make no imputation against others on either side who voted against it. I have no doubt they were honest in the votes they gave.

But, as I have said, sir, this is not a party question. I do not want to be misunderstood here. I do not come to this Congress, composed of able men from all the States of the Union and from all parts of the country, far more able than I am—I come not here to dictate to them nor to say a word that could be construed into anything like dictation. Nor do I want to appear alone the champion of this cause on this floor. I may have paid more attention to it. Perhaps I owe a deeper debt of obligation to the country where some of those men were born; some of them, I say, for not all were born in Ireland. I understand that among the suspects imprisoned some were native American citizens. I trust I am a good American citizen. I trust that I am a faithful American member of this House of Representatives and of this Congress; and I accord to gentlemen on all sides of the House the devotion to that flag which we ought all to entertain. But, sir, I am afraid that we have been neglecting the subject and getting into wrong ideas in considering these matters; that we have been getting careless of the honor of the flag and the rights of our citizens.

I am not here, sir, to-day to make a set speech. I did intend, owing to the greatness of this subject, to have prepared a speech on this occasion. I went to work and I have some fragments of that preparation here which I cannot use. Other things have interfered with me so that I could not come prepared as I should have been to talk on this subject to-day; but I know the House will bear with me. Even if I make rambling observations I shall try to get in some sensible remarks if I can possibly compass them on this subject and submit them to the consideration of this House. If I had more time I might make them much more brief.

Since the beginning of our Government we have not been fortunate in our representatives to the court of Great Britain. Among the first gentlemen we sent there, the second or third was Rufus King, a native of Maine and a citizen of New York at the time of his appointment. The patriots of the Revolution had awakened the good and common sense of the world to the rights of mankind. The doctrines promulgated by Jefferson with his pen, and vindicated by Washington with his bright and stainless sword, these principles had taken root, and nowhere more deeply than in Ireland, from which came the illustrious men whose swords shed a halo of glory around every battle-field on which Washington struck for liberty.

The people at home, the relatives and correlatives of Stark, of Bennington; of Knox, the organizer of our artillery; of Daniel Morgan, of Ballinascreen, in the county of Derry, in Ireland, who fought the battle of the Cowpens; of the illustrious General Irvine, from Enniskillen; of Mad Anthony Wayne, who took Stony Point; of the distinguished Lewises, of Virginia, noted by five or six noble patriots from that State or Colony who stood by Washington, and their descendants now, honored among the living sons of Virginia, and if the head of that brotherhood had lived he would probably have disputed in the hearts of the American people the supreme love of that people with Washington. He came to this country one of several brothers, and their father, who left Ireland because he had to leave it. And why did he, the head of this grand Virginia family, leave it? Because he had shot a landlord at home.

These principles, I say, were spreading in Ireland among the relatives of these great men, and a number of men, conspicuous in their character and their family connections in Ireland, engaged in what is know in history as the rebellion of 1798. Among those were Thomas Addis Emmet and others, who, after having been long confined in British prisons—not American citizens but Irishmen—were granted the privilege by the British Government to come to this country; and Rufus King, who was then our representative at the Court of Saint James, entered a protest that this country should not be disgraced by letting such criminals come here. Those men Rufus King, our minister, called by the same name that James Russell Lowell is now applying to American citizens in British prisons, and even he has degenerated from King. These distinguished men came here and from them are descended some of the greatest and best men of whom this Republic boasts. Those who go up Broadway and stand in front of Saint Paul's, will find two monuments the most attractive in the city of New York; one on the left hand reared to Thomas Addis Emmet, the other on the right hand to Dr. William J. Mac Nevin, and Montgomery's stands between them. Those two monuments illustrate the history of two of those men whom Rufus King, our minister, would not allow to come to this country for fear it would be disgraced.

And who were those criminals? They were simply criminals like Washington, for we had then just got through the Revolution and established our Government. They were criminals the same as he, Rufus King, himself had been; criminals the same as Thomas Jefferson and the other illustrious men of the Revolution. They were denounced in Great Britain by the British Government as criminals, and unfortunately the American Government was represented there by a man who joined in the British cry, as we now have a man there representing us who joins in the British howl against Irish gentlemen.

Afterward, when Thomas Addis Emmet came here and was one of the foremost lawyers, if not the foremost, at the American bar, and was also attorney-general of the State of New York, Mr. Rufus King and he got into a controversy in the papers. And Rufus King was reminded by this Thomas Addis Emmet that he, King, need not put on airs of superiority over an "Irish criminal," for at one time an ancestor of Rufus King had waited at the back of the chair of an ancestor of Thomas Addis Emmet.

So I say, with all due deference to Mr. Lowell, that the men there in prison are quite equal to him, and some of them superior, and he has no right to look down from the throne of his superciliousness upon these honest American citizens who have appealed in vain for his protection.

Since the time of Rufus King we have had one honest representative of this country in Great Britain, Mr. Jonathan Russell, of Rhode Island, who had the honor, in November, 1811, of demanding his passports to come home that we might "take London and burn it," and commenced the war that was waged against Great Britain on that occasion for the same reason th t war is now threatened—for the unreasonable arrest of American citizens.

And I recall the long list of other distinguished men who were our representatives there; but they were only literary men, and comprehended nothing at all beyond literary matters; respectable, great, and glorious men in their own ways of life: Edward Everett, Washington Irving, George Bancroft, and J. Lothrop Motley, who is an Irishman by descent. They all represented the literary element of this country, and not its political spirit. There was one whom I cannot now pass over without mention, who was a worthy minister sent by General Jackson to England to represent this country. I refer to Louis McLane, the father of the distinguished gentleman from Maryland in this Congress.

But, sir, as I have said, we have had but indifferent luck in the way of representatives in Rufus King and Charles Francis Adams and James Rusell Lowell, who shamefully neglected their duty to protect the lovers and apostles of liberty and the rights of our citizens. Even Reverdy Johnson, the beloved son of Maryland, whom I was permitted to love as a friend and almost worship as a statesman, seemed to limit his conception of American diplomacy to good dinners with the indifferent kind of creatures called the nobility. All our ministers seemed to crawl on their stomachs, except, perhaps, my old friend General Schenck, who went "on all fours"—particularly if they were aces. Our present Secretary of State was commissioned as minister to England, but declined and escaped contamination. Our First Assistant Secretary of State has some time occupied the position of chargé d'affaires. I hope he still retains the manhood of his distinguished father.

I think that Mr. Lowell ought to be recalled, and I have here resolutions which I intend to offer as a substitute at the proper time. I ask the Clerk to read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas it is known and admitted that certain citizens of the United States are unjustly deprived of their liberty by the Government of Great Britain; and

Whereas the President has demanded of that foreign government the reason of such imprisonment and their immediate release; and

Whereas such release has been unreasonably delayed: Therefore,

Resolved, That the President is hereby urgently and earnestly requested forthwith to use such means and take such proceedings as are designated in the law of July 27, 1868, in such case made and provided.

Resolved, That, in the opinion of this House, James Russell Lowell, our minister to England, having mistaken or neglected his duty as our representative in the case of these unjustly imprisoned American citizens, should be recalled.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. Those resolutions are drawn following the language of the statute of 1868. I have no personal feeling against Mr. Lowell, nor do I wish to indulge in any hard language toward him. I think he is a better poet than diplomatist, and I think he had better come home and attend to his poetry. Perhaps he will revive some of the ancient spirit of that poetry if we can get him home where he can breathe American air and get rid of the political filth of his English associations.

Mr. James Russell Lowell about twenty years ago published, among other poetry, his "Bigelow Papers," which represent old Concord Bridge, where the British were whipped by the Yankees in 1775, and Bunker Hill Monument as talking with each other. It was about the time that Commodore Wilkes had taken Mason and Slidell, whom England demanded we should surrender to her. I have here some extracts from the talk of the old bridge, given in Yankee dialect, and if I can "catch the accent," I shall do so. It shows what Mr. Lowell justly thought of England then, and what he should now think of her. Here is the poetry:

I tell ye, England's law, on sea an' land,
Hez ollers ben, "I've got the heaviest hand."
Take nary man? Fine preachin' from her lips!
Why, she hez taken hundreds from our ships,
An' would agin, an' swear she had a right to,
Ef we warn't strong enough to be perlite to.
Of all the sarse thet I can call to mind,
England does make the most unpleasant kind:
It's you're the sinner ollers, she's the saint;
Wut's good's all English, all thet isn't ain't;
Wut profits her is ollers right an' just,
An' ef you don't read Scriptur so, you must;
She's praised herself until she fairly thinks
There ain't no light in Natur when she winks;
Hain't she the Ten Comman'ments in her pus?
Could the world stir 'thout she went, tu, ez mus?
She ain't like other mortals, thet's a fact;
She never stopped the habus corpus act,
Nor specie payments, nor she never yet
Cut down the int'rest on her public debt:
She don't put down rebellion, lets 'em breed,
An' 's ollers willin' Ireland should secede;
She's all thet's honest, honnable, an' fair,
An' when the vartoos died they made her heir.
Ef you want peace, the thing you've gut tu du
Is jes' to shew you're up to fightin', tu.
I recollect how sailors' rights was won
Yard locked in yard, hot gun-lip kissin' gun:
Why, afore thet, John Bull sot up thet he
Hed gut a kind o' mortgage on the sea;
You'd thought he held by Gran'ther Adam's will,
An' ef you knuckle down, he'll think so still.
Better thet all our ships an' all their crews
Should sink to rot in ocean's dreamless ooze,
Each torn flag wavin' challenge ez it went,
An' each dumb gun a brave man's moniment,
Than seek sech peace ez only cowards crave:
Give me the peace of dead men or of brave!

That is "on to London" all the time, and that is the language of James Russell Lowell some twenty years ago.

Early in the present month a literary club, known as the Webster Literary Society, of my own city of Brooklyn, had before them for discussion the question "Have American citizenship and the American flag ceased to be respected abroad?" After full discussion the question was decided in the affirmative. And this reminds me of remarkable expressions made by two Senators during the discussion of the celebrated law of July 27, 1868, in the Senate, Messrs. Stewart of Nevada, and Williams of Oregon. Mr. Williams, afterward Attorney-General of the United States, declared on the 20th of July, 1868, that no nation on the face of the earth had neglected its citizens abroad as we had done, and Mr. Stewart on the same day declared that American citizens traveling abroad had frequently to disguise themselves as British subjects to secure protection and that war with England was not so bad as that kind of American humiliation.

Now, it is to prevent any such accusations as this that I wish to have the House take up this subject and discuss it and end it. I want to get rid of it. I have been all the time getting up here and troubling the House; I do not want to do so any longer. I want it finished. I want a sensible vote to-day which I believe will meet the approbation of gentlemen on both sides—a declaration that our citizens should be permitted to come home if they have committed no crime, and that the law of 1868 should be acknowledged as of some meaning. Having so acted we have discharged our duty, and the responsibility will then be with the Executive, and we mean to hold them to a strict and manly and prompt discharge of their duties, worthy of themselves and of us as custodians of American honor and representatives of American manhood.

I see before me the eloquent Senator from Indiana, [Mr. VOORHEES,] and I will take the liberty of saying in his presence that I listened with admiration to a speech which he delivered in the other end of the Capitol a few days ago. In that speech he deliberately echoed the sentiment of all honest Americans, that the neglect of this subject by the American Government should result in the parties standing before the bar of that Senate on the accusation of this House by impeachment. That declaration was publicly made; it was truly and rightfully made. Such is the degradation which we have been suffering for some time, and from which we can hardly arouse the country.

But it is said, Ireland must be kept down, repressed, because there is crime there. Let me say that this is an English lie. In the language of the celebrated Father Burke, an eminent clergyman who was here a short time ago, it is "a thumping English lie." Let me say that with all the oppression and discontent in Ireland, with all the reasons for anarchy and violence, there is no country upon the face of the earth where life and property are so secure as they are in Ireland. More murders are committed in any State of New England every year than are committed in Ireland. In the city of New York more murders are tried in a month than in Ireland for years.

I repeat, property and life are to-day more secure in that island than in any other portion of the earth. Therefore, the story about crime in Ireland as a reason for repression and oppression is a "thumping English lie" that has been told for the sake of prejudicing the cause of Ireland. You have heard in this city recently, Mr. Speaker, of a man who fired at the assassin of our late President—a cowardly act, in my opinion. A soldier appointed to protect the prisoner fired at him while the prisoner was under his charge; and all over the country people are getting up subscriptions for "Betty and the baby." Yet the very men who are doing this are horror-stricken because somebody shoots at a landlord in Ireland or threatens to do so. Guiteau is a great criminal; I have nothing to say in his behalf; but there are other criminals in the world, if not worse. I think the Irish landlords are the chief of criminals, and if anybody deserves to be killed it is they; and the ancestor of the illustrious Virginia family to which I have referred thought so when he shot one of them before he came away.

I quote a single paragraph from a valuable book just published, "Ireland of To-day," by J. C. McCurdy & Co., of Philadelphia, by M. F. Sullivan, with an introduction by Thomas Power O'Connor, the eloquent member of the British Parliament from Galway, now sitting before me:

Philadelphia is a well-behaved city. It is the "City of Brotherly Love." The tranquil inhabitant of its historic soil possibly suspects that life and property in Ireland are utterly unsafe, yet in Philadelphia, a model city, the "City of Brotherly Love," whose population is 16 per cent. that of Ireland, crime of all kind is very much greater. In Philadelphia in 1879 there were forty-nine homicides. In Ireland there were four persons found guilty of murder.

There are very few criminals in Ireland except the landlords and the English officials. The champion criminal is William E. Gladstone. It is enough to make a hyena laugh or a fiend blush to hear Gladstone and Foster, and the lying press of England and their more despicable lying echoes here, talk of upholding law in Ireland when they themselves have abolished or suspended all law.

Goldwin Smith, a clergyman who has visited this country and who ought certainly to have imbibed some American principles, goes over there and preaches that England must suspend the habeas corpus, deny the right of trial by jury, and violate all the laws of civilized humanity in order to crush the Irish. But they have not been crushed and will not be crushed. Ireland has been for seven centuries suffering under a tyranny greater than any other people has ever endured. But still her spirit lives; still her people worship at the shrine of freedom. Unquenchable love of freedom wherever they may be, wherever they may wander! They love the country of their adoption, but they go back with their love to their mother country.

They are complained of that they love their mother country too much. Can any man cease to love his mother? Are not men's hearts large enough to love their mothers as well as their wives? We have an undying love for our mothers as well as for our wives. Hence it is that Irishmen love their adopted land as they love their wives, and are ready to die for it, but they also love their mother land.

But this Goldwin Smith, who represents the cranky English ideas of law, says England has this remedy. Take them all, crush them, bind them to the stake with fetters, extinguish all their rights, amid the wreck and ruin of everything just let the Irish love of liberty be burned out of them. They cannot accomplish it. Never, sir.

It is hard for me sometimes to get the floor. I have fought for it as well as I could, but some time I will try to get the floor again to introduce a bill. I know the House will dispose of this present matter speedily and honorably. Then I have in my mind to introduce a bill, but I am afraid if it be read before I get the floor you will rule it neither privileged nor in order. The title of it shall be "A bill for the relief of England, for the benefit of Ireland, and for the glory of the United States." I am not going to let it out on this occasion. [Laughter.] I have the plan clearly in my mind. If it were done it would end all this trouble, for England has more trouble with Ireland now than anything under her dynasty, and I can show her the way to permanent and honorable peace.

But, sir, returning to our imprisoned citizens, what is the law of the case? It is very clearly laid down.

It is now nearly seven centuries ago that John, by the grace of God King of England, Lord of Ireland, Duke of Normandy and Aquitaine, and Earl of Anjou, by the articles of Magna Charta, given by his hand in the meadow which is called Runnymede, between Windsor and Staines, the 15th day of June, A. D. 1215, and in the seventeenth year of his reign, in the presence of God and for the salvation of his own soul and of the souls of his ancestors and heirs, covenanted with the people of England "that no freeman's body shall be taken, nor imprisoned, nor disseized, nor outlawed, nor famished, nor in any way be damaged, nor shall the King send him to prison by force, excepting by the judgment of his peers and by the law of the land, and that the men of his kingdom shall have and hold the aforesaid liberties, rights, and concessions to them and their heirs from him and his heirs in all things and places forever." To show how much more advanced the tyrant John of the dark ages was in liberal ideas compared with the degenerate fraud of the nineteenth century, William Ewart Gladstone, I quote three articles from Magna Charta:

39. No freeman shall be seized, or imprisoned, or disfranchised, or outlawed, or in any way destroyed, nor will we condemn him, nor will we commit him to prison, excepting by the legal judgment of his peers or by the law of the land.

40. To none will we sell, to none will we deny, to none will we delay right or justice.

41. All merchants shall have safety and security in coming into England and going out of England, and in staying and in traveling through England, as well by land as by water, to buy and sell without any unjust exactions, according to ancient and right customs, excepting in the time of war; and if they be of a country at war against us, and if such are found in our land at the beginning of a war, they shall be apprehended without injury of their bodies and goods until it be known to us or to our chief justiciary how the merchants of our country are treated who are found in the country at war against us; and if ours be in safety there, the others shall be in safety in our land.

Within a third of a year from signing the Magna Charta, John died, and was succeeded by his son, Henry III, then only ten years of age, and Henry was crowned within ten days of the death of his father, with William Marshall, Earl of Pembroke, as protector, and in less than thirteen months thereafter the youthful King and his sagacious protector renewed the charter with all its original solemnities and formalities and nearly word for word in its text, and made a remarkable addition, addressed to all his faithful subjects settled throughout Ireland, in these words:

Commending your faith in the Lord, which you have always shown unto the Lord, our Father, and are at this day exhibiting unto us and ours, we will give a token of your fidelity, so manifest and so famous to our Kingdom of Ireland, the liberties of our Kingdom of England, granted by our father and ourself out of our grace that you and your heirs may perpetually rejoice; which liberties, distinctly reduced to writing by the common council of all our realm, we send to you, our faithful subjects, signed with the seal of our Lord Gualo, Legate of the Apostolic See, and of our faithful William Marshall, Earl of Pembroke, the guardian of us and of our kingdom.

Here the rulers of England pledged to their subjects of England and to the people of Ireland, including Charles Stewart Parnell, and to citizens and subjects of other nations, including Daniel McSweeny, that no man should be in all future time arrested or imprisoned without legal judgment of his peers, and that all persons, including McSweeny and O'Connor, shall have safety and security in coming into and going out of the realm; and even in time of war, that strangers belonging to the hostile country should be treated as kindly as British subjects were treated in those hostile countries, and should be in safety.

How flagrantly this unparalleled tyrant, Gladstone, who now afflicts Great Britain and offends humanity, has violated all these pledges to England's own subjects and the strangers within its borders which were given by the tyrants of seven centuries ago!

And here, sir, I cannot help contrasting the former glory of England under John and the Henrys and the Georges with her present shame under the Gladstones and Brights and Fosters of our day—her freedom under the Tory Pitt with her slavery under the Liberal Gladstone. Turn to the magnificent oration of the great Irish advocate, Curran, in defense of Archibald Hamilton Rowan on the 29th day of January, 1794, with British soil under Tory Pitt, and ask what could he have said in 1882 with British soil disgraced in the eyes of all mankind by Liberal Gladstone. I shall try to read the contrast in parallel columns:

1794, under Tory Pitt.	1882, under Liberal Gladstone.
I speak in the spirit of British law, which makes liberty commensurate with and inseparable from British soil, which proclaims even to the stranger and the sojourner, the moment he sets his foot upon British earth, that the ground on which he stands is holy and consecrated by the genius of universal emancipation. No matter in what language his doom may have been pronounced; no matter what complexion incompatible with freedom an Indian or an African sun may have burned upon him; no matter in what disastrous battle his liberty may have been cloven down; no matter with what solemnity he may have been devoted upon the altar of slavery, the first moment he touches the sacred soil of Britain the altar and the god sink together in the dust, his soul walks abroad in her own majesty, his body swells beyond the measure of his chains, that burst from around him, and he stands redeemed, regenerated, and disenthralled by the irresistible genius of universal emancipation.	I speak in the spirit of British oppression, which makes despotism commensurate with and inseparable from British soil, which proclaims even to the stranger and the sojourner, the moment he sets his foot upon British earth, that the ground on which he stands is accursed and desecrated by the genius of unlimited imprisonment. No matter in what language his liberty may have been pronounced; no matter what guarantees incompatible with oppression he may have secured in other lands; no matter on what victorious battle-fields his citizenship may have been secured; no matter with what solemnities he may have been devoted upon the altar of freedom, the first moment he touches the polluted soil of Britain the prison yawns for his body and the chains coil themselves around his limbs; his soul sickens with the thought of imprisonment without trial; his body shrinks beneath the terror of punishment limited only by the suspicion of irresponsible despots, and he sinks into a limitless torture which has no termination but the unbridled tenure of a tyrant's will.

I hold, sir, that this old Magna Charta of John and its ratification and extension to Ireland by Henry and his successors are our guarantee for the protection of our citizens traveling or engaged in business there, and that whatever outrages they may inflict and the civilized world may permit them to inflict upon their own subjects, they cannot suspend that Magna Charta in time of peace so far as our citizens are concerned. In that instrument foreign nations have the guarantee that for all time their citizens shall have safety and security in coming into and going out of British possessions, in staying and traveling through those possessions—"staying," mark you; no authority to impose conditions never to return excepting in time of war, and even if we were at war with England our citizens are secured in residing there with treatment similar to what we extend to her subjects. These rights are secured to our naturalized citizens by the fourteenth article of the amendment of the Constitution, which provides as follows:

All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside.

That article was under consideration in Congress at the time the law of July 27, 1868, was under consideration; and its ratification was announced the day after that law was signed. That law was carefully considered, to prevent just such outrages as Great Britain has been perpetrating upon our citizens for the last twelve or fifteen months. It reads as follows:

Whereas the right of expatriation is a natural and inherent right of all people, indispensable to the enjoyment of the rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; and whereas in the recognition of this principle, this Government has freely received emigrants from all nations, and invested them with the rights of citizenship; and whereas it is claimed that such American citizens, with their descendants, are subjects of foreign states, owing allegiance to the governments thereof; and whereas it is necessary to the maintenance of public peace that this claim of foreign allegiance should be promptly and finally disavowed: Therefore

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That any declaration, instruction, opinion, order, or decision of any officers of this Government which denies, restricts, impairs, or questions the right of expatriation is hereby declared inconsistent with the fundamental principles of this Government.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That all naturalized citizens of the United States, while in foreign states, shall be entitled to, and shall receive from this Government, the same protection of persons and property that is accorded to native-born citizens in like situations and circumstances.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That whenever it shall be made known to the President that any citizen of the United States has been unjustly deprived of his liberty by or under the authority of any foreign government, it shall be the duty of the President forthwith to demand of that government the reasons for such imprisonment, and if it appears to be wrongful and in violation of the rights of American citizenship the President shall forthwith demand the release of such citizen, and if the release so demanded is unreasonably delayed or refused, it shall be the duty of the President to use such means, not amounting to acts of war, as he may think necessary and proper to obtain or effectuate such release, and all the facts and proceedings relative thereto shall as soon as practicable be communicated by the President to Congress.

These rights are secured to our naturalized and native citizens both alike by that law and by the treaty of 1870, made with England in pursuance thereof, both of which she is now persistently violating by imprisoning both native and adopted citizens. I think I may be pardoned for a few words on the history of this disputed question of the rights of naturalized citizens.

When the patriots of the Revolution wrung from the grasp of England the independence of their country she yielded with a bad grace. She looked upon the people of the young Republic as inferior beings. The officers of our Army and Navy were frequently insulted by British officers of similar rank and inferior manhood, which led to several duels, in which, among others, that grand model of a naval hero, the son of an Irish mother, Commodore Decatur, taught them manners. Our flag was insulted on every sea by the claims which England set up to our naturalized citizens, whom she frequently impressed into her service, taking them by force from the protection of our flag. For this we waged with her the second war. During that war she threatened to hang as traitors the naturalized citizens whom she had taken in battles fighting for the United States. President Madison and General Scott gave notice that they would hang two of her officers or men for every one of our's that was thus punished, and she had to abandon her brutal designs. After the conclusion of the war two attempts were made to enact laws defining the rights of naturalized citizens and declaring the right of expatriation, but they failed; and so England, after all the waste of war, clung to her feudal doctrine of perpetual allegiance and denied the validity of our naturalization laws.

If any one will turn to the Senate Journal of the second session of the Twenty-seventh Congress for February 18, 1842, he will find on page 176 the following statement:

Mr. Clay presented the memorial of WILLIAM E. ROBINSON, praying that the rights secured to native citizens may be extended to naturalized immigrants from foreign countries; which was referred to the Committe on Foreign Relations.

It will be seen from this that it is now over forty years ago since I commenced urging, as I am doing to-day, the importance of this subject upon Congress, and my prayer was presented by Henry Clay, of Kentucky, to the Senate. I have proved faithful to this cause, and great things have been achieved. About a month afterward I forwarded to Mr. Clay a petition signed by others similar to my own, and his remarks on presenting it will be found in the Congressional Globe, second session Twenty-seventh Congress, 1841–1842, page 365. Those who like to turn to his remarks will find that his remedy was about the same as my recent "on to London." He then declared that if England treated our naturalized citizens in any way different from their treatment of native citizens, their protection would be by our cannon.

But notwithstanding this declaration of Mr. Clay, England still continued to insult and despise American citizenship, and in 1848, during the threatened rebellion of Smith O'Brien and others, England filled her prisons with American citizens, and I vexed the ears of the State Department with their wrongs until they were released. Mr. Ryan, of Cincinnati, and Mr. Bergen, of Boston, were two conspicuous cases—but there were many others—and the English authorities went so far in their insults to the United States as to issue an order that all Americans, without distinction, landing in Ireland should be arrested. A somewhat angry correspondence ensued between the two governments, in which England insolently acknowledged the issuing of such an order. Mr. Bancroft, our minister, wrote an indignant protest, and after much delay our prisoners were released. I was then editor of a paper in New York called The People, in which these matters were reviewed in a very plain-spoken protest of five or six columns against English insolence and American submission.

In 1866 I was elected to Congress from Brooklyn, and our first session commenced on the 4th of March, 1867. English and German prisons were then full of American citizens. I think there were over a hundred in Ireland. Three days after taking my seat, to wit, on the 7th of March, 1867, I offered a resolution, which was unanimously adopted, calling for information on their arrest and imprisonment. On the 20th of that month the State Department answered that it was deemed inexpedient to give the information. After a recess of some three months Congress again assembled, and on the 10th of July, 1867, I had a resolution adopted by unanimous consent requesting the Committee on Foreign Affairs, of which I was a member, to report immediately whether American citizens had been arrested without charge of crime committed on British soil, quoting an editorial from the New York Herald, rather different in tone from its articles now; and I then said, as I have said in this Congress, that I hoped there was spirit enough in our country and pride enough in the mettle of our Army and Navy to secure the prisoners' release.

On November 21, 1867, I moved the impeachment of Mr. Adams, our minister to England, for neglect of duty in regard to these prisoners. I also moved that the President be requested to telegraph to Mr. Adams to demand immediately his passport and return home. I likewise moved that the Secretary of State be instructed to communicate to this House all correspondence and information on the subject, without reference to its effect, to be considered, if need be, in secret session of this House. I held the floor when the House adjourned from the 21st till the 25th. On the 23d the Manchester martyrs were executed, three of them dying nobly and one now residing in Washington, saved by urgent cable dispatches from Mr. Seward on my suggestion. In closing my speech on the 25th I demanded freedom from arrest of all American citizens who are not charged with the commission of any crime and a speedy trial for those charged with crime. I denounced all attempts to extort pledges from American citizens that they should leave the country and never return, and that the benefit of English law should be as fully extended to native and adopted citizens as to the subjects or citizens of other countries, and urged the immediate consideration of a bill by the Committee on Foreign Affairs such as was afterward reported by General Banks.

It was now nearly nine months since I had first introduced the subject into Congress, and no one had said a word to sustain me. I again spoke on the 2d of December, 1867, the first day of the second session of the Fortieth Congress, and on this day I was ably seconded by Norman B. Judd, of Chicago, who had been our minister to Prussia. His speech will be found in the Congresional Globe, second session Fortieth Congress, commencing on page 7. He opened his speech in these words:

> Mr. Speaker, I have listened with attention to the detail of grievances made by the honorable gentleman from New York, [Mr. ROBINSON,] and I say here and at this time that any member of this House who can listen to that detail of wrongs and not feel his blood flow a little quicker through his veins, is not the American citizen that I supposed him to be.

In the mean time the country had become thoroughly aroused. Mass-meetings were held in the large cities. Two were held at Cooper Institute, at which speeches were made by General Halpine, Chief-Justice Daly, Horace Greeley, General Cochrane, John McKeon, and others, at which thanks were voted to me by name. The State Department finally sent us in the information asked for in my resolutions, which was published in two volumes, with addenda, and on the 27th of January, 1868, the bill now known as the bill of July 27, 1868, or as sections 2000 and 2001 of the Revised Statutes, was introduced from our committee.

And here I wish to call the attention of my colleague [Mr. COX] to a report of his speech delivered at Cooper Institute on the 3d day of the present month, as I find it reported in the Irish World, in which he is made to say:

> By the law of 1868, which was the work of General Banks—all honor to him for it, [applause]—we endeavored by the moral forces of the Federal Congress to compel the Executive to observe this progressive canon of international law.

May I ask my colleague if he is here correctly reported?

Mr. COX, of New York. What is the question of my colleague?

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. Did my friend from New York say that he gave all the honor in that meeting in the Cooper Institute to General Banks for the passage of the law of July, 1868?

Mr. COX, of New York. He presented the bill and passed the bill; and I say all honor to him for his action in that connection. When I find a man, a member of the old American party, as General Banks was, who came forward and took that stand in reference to American citizens, I say and I repeat, all honor to him.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. Did my friend from New York say all honor to General Banks for that bill?

Mr. COX, of New York. I do not remember the exact language that I used.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. Is my friend correctly reported at that meeting?

Mr. COX, of New York. I do not remember. I said, in substance, all honor to General Banks for his efforts in that direction. I do not limit my honors. [Laughter.]

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. And I say all honor for what he did, too, in that direction; and there is no man here who will do more honor to General Banks than I for that; but there are other gentlemen here upon the floor—the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. ORTH,] with whom I am in a kind of suspended hostility—he did his duty, too, on that question of getting the bill through. How could General Banks pass a bill? He made one step and cast one vote in the direction of what I had been preaching here for years before, amid storms of abuse from the members of this House, and storms of abuse throughout the press of the country and the English press; the same kind of abuse with which I am met now, as I was for twelve months before I succeeded in getting the House and the gentleman from Massachusetts and the gentleman from Indiana to take up and consider a measure affecting, as that did, the honor of the American Government and the rights of its citizens. I labored in order to secure the passage of that measure and to express the sentiment of the American people, and labored alone for many long months amid a storm of opposition. Then, after the matter had been wafted on its way toward perfection, after both parties had put it in their platforms, and after I had stood the storm of abuse and forced the recognition of American citizenship, the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. Banks, stepped in and took command, because he was chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, of which I was a member, and the bill was passed through the House. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I do say that it was not proper for my colleague to use the remark that is attributed to him in that meeting at Cooper Institute, where he gives all honor to General Banks for succeeding in securing the passage of such a measure.

But my colleague will see how unjust to him it would be if some fifteen years hence, when this measure should be referred to and my friend from Wisconsin, [Mr. WILLIAMS,] the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, shall have proposed some measure on the subject, to say "all honor to Mr. WILLIAMS for it." I doubt not Mr. WILLIAMS will discharge his duty honorably and well, but it would be injustice to Mr. COX as well as to myself to say all honor to Mr. WILLIAMS for the measure in the Forty-seventh Congress which resulted in the release of McSweeny, O'Connor, and others from British jails. Nor would it increase the justice of the thing if some Know-nothing in the future should get all the credit for the great services which my colleague has rendered to naturalized citizens merely because he was a Know-nothing. I do not think it excuses the attempted larceny by proving that it was done for the benefit of a Know-nothing. I have no doubt there were some patriotic though mistaken men among Know-nothings, but if they want laurels they can snatch them from other brows than mine.

There is no man living who appreciates General Banks's noble services on that occasion more fully and generously than myself. But the very meeting at which my colleague was represented as saying "all honor to General Banks," and which until this moment I did not believe he said, as I was present and did not hear him make that declaration, or I should have corrected it on the spot, was called and engineered to take away the credit of this movement here from my colleague and others who deserved it, and to that meeting I was not invited, nor was my colleague, till a very late hour. It is well that neither my colleague nor myself need any manager's invitation to such a meeting in New York.

But the gentleman says he does not limit his honors. I do not object to his disposing of his honors as he likes, but I hope he will limit himself in disposing of mine.

Now, sir, I am just a little jealous on this subject—the honor for the passage of this bill of 1868. My colleague was not then in Congress to help me.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ORTH] in the Cooper Union meeting is reported as saying:

> In 1868 the American Congress formulated for the first time into law the sentiment of protection to American citizens. Now, then, what is that law? It is as sacred to American citizens as any line in the Declaration of Independence. It is as important to the protection of the citizen abroad as the Constitution of the Government is important to the protection of the citizen at home. Under this law we plant ourselves, upon this law we stand, and from this law no power on God's earth can move us. [Tremendous cheering, renewed again and again, the whole audience rising.]

Now, sir, the distinguished and learned gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] a few days since did me full justice. I hesitate to quote from him, it is so complimentary, but it may as well be referred to for the sake of keeping history correct. Referring to the law of 1868, and its passage through both Houses, Mr. HEWITT says:

After carefully examining the steps by which it was secured, I am prepared to say that he [W. E. ROBINSON] is fully justified in claiming the legislation of 1868 as his work. * * * This was the work of my colleague, [WILLIAM E. ROBINSON,] and there is no man, not even a Republican, who can justly contest his claim to the credit of this great measure of justice and natural right.

He says other complimentary things of this measure, and of me—a measure which he declares, nearly in the words of the gentleman from Indiana, uttered a month later, "a declaration of rights scarcely less important to the freedom of the world than the Declaration of Independence."

I might quote from the speech of the Senator now before me, [Mr. VOORHEES,] to which I have already referred. In speaking of the war with England of 1812, the Senator said:

My prayer is that it may not so happen again, but the true meaning of this great act of July, 1868, for which the credit is so largely due to my distinguished friend from the House of Representatives, now before me, from the Brooklyn district of New York, [Mr. ROBINSON,] contemplates an appeal to force rather than submission to the insolence, outrage, dishonor, and open shame now inflicted on the citizens, the flag, and the name of this Republic. I honor every word and line of this act. I rejoice in its scope and meaning. When this Government no longer violates it, when the American authorities execute it, the American name will be mentioned with reverence and awe where it is now spoken with derision and contempt.

I have received hundreds of letters from distinguished men in this country and Europe, expressing thanks for the work which I have been doing here—presidents and professors of colleges, editors, clergymen, and literary men—which, though they are not made public, console me for the unmerited and unlimited abuse of the lying toadies of British power now too largely controlling the American press. Here is a brief extract from one which I received this morning from Judge Jeremiah S. Black, of Pennsylvania—perhaps the greatest American statesman living:

BROCKIE, (near York,) April 24, 1882.

I got your speech since I came home. It came under cover franked by Mr. (Senator) BAYARD. * * * As an American citizen who loves justice and hates wrong, I cannot but admire the man who has done as much as you have to make up and sustain the great issue between free government and despotic rule on both sides of the Atlantic, and therefore,

I am now, and forever will be, yours, most truly,

J. S. BLACK.

Such testimonials as that make large compensation for all the drivcling abuse of the toadies above referred to.

But to return to the law of 1868, so much has been said about it that I shall give a brief history of its passage through Congress. This history is taken from a lecture which I delivered in Cooper Union on the 23d of May, 1870—twelve years ago. The mayor of the city of New York was in the chair and made very flattering remarks on introducing me, which I shall not further refer to:

At the close of our recent war many of our bravest soldiers, made citizens of this Republic both by the pen and the sword, visited the scenes of their childhood in Ireland, some for pleasure, some on business, and some (it were foolish to deny) not unwilling to take a hand in any fight that might be waged for Irish nationality. Those who took any part in any act of rebellion in Ireland claimed no protection from this Government, except that they should have a fair trial under the laws of the realm. But England made indiscriminate arrests of American citizens, without any form of law, on mere suspicion; and about the opening of the Fortieth Congress some hundred American citizens, both naturalized and native, most of them without having said or done anything, except the mere act of landing, were thrown into prison and most cruelly treated. Our consuls were denied access to them. England claimed perpetual allegiance and questioned the validity of our naturalization laws, going so far as to distinctly deny the right of our consul to see or communicate with a naturalized American citizen; and yet the only roar of American cannon heard on the British shores was the salute of Farragut's fleet, whose echoes rang through the prison cells of unconvicted and unaccused American citizens.

Pardon me if I refer to the fact that, for some reason totally inexplicable, the American press, generally so just and generous, belittled the entire subject by abusing its persistent advocate as talking Fenianism and Ireland. If ever there was a purely and proudly American question it was this. Let me call attention to this other fact, that although one man, almost unaided and alone, for about twelve months urged this question upon the people's representatives against the neglect of Congress and the sneers of the press, yet he afterward had the satisfaction of seeing ten to twenty members at once struggling for the floor and screaming for the Speaker's ear when it came fully before the House. Among those who addressed the House upon this subject were Messrs. Banks, Boutwell, Boyer, Brooks, Butler, Dawes, Griswold, Eldredge, Ingersol, Jenckes, Judd, Kerr, Logan, Maynard, Morgan, Orth, Paine, Pile, Van Trump, E. B. Washburne, Wilson, Woodbridge, Woodward, and others, and many of them six, eight, or ten times. So, too, in the Senate, Messrs. Buckalew, Conkling, Conness, Drake, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Hendricks, Howard, Morton, Stewart, Sumner, and others spoke, some of them frequently.

IMPORTANCE OF THIS AMERICAN MEASURE.

How great and grand the question was may be seen from the very brief extracts I shall make from some of the speeches delivered upon it in its course through the House.

Mr. Judd, of Illinois, formerly our minister to Prussia, and well acquainted with the question, addressed the House at length on the 2d day of December, 1867. He said he had listened attentively to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. ROBINSON,] and the question was a national one. The honor and dignity of the nation were involved in the question, and to neglect or delay action upon it as it was now presented would sink this proud country almost out of the list of nations. He concluded his remarks by this expressive sentence:

"To settle this conflict upon the basis of Americanism would possess for me more attraction than the reputation of having purchased a hemisphere. I regard the protection of national citizenship as far above the acquisition of territory, and so I believe the future historian will write it."

Mr. Wilson, of Iowa, chairman of the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives, in a speech delivered by him January 30, 1868, said:

"We are not now dealing with a mere question of election, nor playing a pleasing game for the votes of naturalized citizens. Whoever views the present occasion through such glasses will greatly mistake the magnitude of the proportions of the subject with which we are dealing. The stern fact that we are breasting the current and immemorial doctrine of most of the nations of the earth, respecting the right of expatriation, should place us on a higher plane of statesmanship than that which consults merely the present and transient effect of its action."

Speaking of the second section of the bill as it was finally adopted, protecting native and naturalized citizens alike, Mr. Wilson said:

"Thus far the section challenges the attention and practice of every nation from which we have drawn the foreign element of our population. It is affirmative, aggressive, and boldly American. Let this be declared as the policy of this country and no one can mistake it. It is a grand assault on the miserable feudal doctrine of non-expatriation. It sounds like the deep-swelling tones of a nation whose origin and growth rest upon the right of expatriation. It is the voice of potential America riving the policies which assert the perpetual allegiance of a man to the place of his birth. It breathes the breath of life into that clause of the Constitution which declares that Congress shall have power to establish a uniform rule of naturalization. It gives vitality to this constitutional power, and elevates our naturalization laws above the level of cheats and snares."

Judge Woodbridge, of Vermont, one of the ablest men in Congress, in his speech of February 12, 1868, said:

"No graver question has ever been presented before the American Congress. * * * In whatever aspect we view it, one of two results must inevitably follow, either successful negotiation, or a foreign war. It is above party. It rises above the making and unmaking of Presidents. It assumes the proportions of a great national question, enunciating the inherent right of expatriation, and the determination of our Government to extend hereafter the same protection of person and property to the naturalized and native-born citizen."

Now, strange it is, is it not, if all Messrs. Judd, Wilson, and Woodbridge here say, be true, that Congressional action was delayed till the Fortieth Congress! Stranger still, is it not, that this national question, so far above the acquisition of territory, this boldly American question, this question that rises above making and unmaking of Presidents, owed its success in the Fortieth Congress to two natives of Ireland, one in the Senate, and the other in the House of Representatives, who gave themselves and their fellow-members no rest until this great American measure, the greatest of the nineteenth century, was accomplished.

PASSAGE THROUGH THE HOUSE.

I propose now to give a very brief sketch of the progress of this great question through both Houses of Congress. I shall claim no praise, attach no blame, put forth or keep back nothing from personal or party feeling. I shall merely state the facts as they occurred, giving the dates of the proceedings which can be read in full in the Congressional Globe. May I not invoke your pardon if in the early stages of its progress I have to refer to myself more frequently than I desire to do.

The question was first introduced on the 7th of March, 1867, the third day after the assembling of the Fortieth Congress. Upon that day Mr. ROBINSON, of Brooklyn, introduced a resolution, which passed unanimously, calling upon the President to communicate all correspondence, documents, and proceedings relating to the arrest, imprisonment, and treatment of American citizens in Great Britain for two years last past. Thirteen days afterward, March 20, 1867, the President communicated to the House a letter from Secretary Seward, refusing to give the correspondence on the ground that its publication might be detrimental to the public good!

Congress adjourned, or took a recess, from the 30th of March and reassembled on the 3d of July. On the 10th of that month Mr. ROBINSON, by unanimous consent, had a resolution passed requesting the Committee on Foreign Affairs to report immediately whether any American citizen had been arrested, tried, or convicted and sentenced in Great Britain for words spoken or acts done in the United States. Mr. ROBINSON read a statement, furnished him by W. F. Lyons, esq., of the New York Herald, together with an editorial from that paper of March 11, 1867, showing that Stephen J. Meany had been so convicted for acts done in New York. Mr. ROBINSON said he hoped there was spirit enough in the country, and that our Army metal was heavy enough to secure the prisoner's release. He also referred to the cases of Nagle, Warren, and others who had been arrested immediately on landing in Ireland on the first day of the previous month. Thaddeus Stevens said he hoped we would not attempt to review the judgment of British courts. This error of Mr. Stevens was one into which many men seemed most willingly to fall while discussing this question. No one pretended that we could here review or reverse the decisions of British courts. But if Great Britain persisted in trying and punishing our citizens for acts committed on our own soil, it was our duty to send a cannon-ball whizzing through those decisions of British courts and through the British Government, which controlled these courts. I utter no new sentiment, for this was just the remedy urged by Henry Clay, in the Senate of the United States, in 1842. England did not pretend to review or pass upon the decisions of the courts of Theodorus of Abyssinia. No; but she sent her armies over sea and land, as we should have done, and amid the smoking ruins of the capital, and over the lifeless body of the sovereign, she not only reviewed but reversed the decisions, as we too should have done. Does any one suppose if any of our courts had passed sentence on Mason and Slidell, after they were taken and brought in by Commodore Wilkes, that England would not have demanded their release or fired her last pound of metal in their protection, and in reversal of the decrees of our courts!

On the 20th of July, 1867, the State Department informed the Committee on Foreign Affairs that there was no such information as was asked by the resolution of the 10th, except the case of McCafferty. Mr. Cullom then reported a resolution from the Committee on Foreign Affairs requesting the President to inform the House whether he had information upon the subject, and requesting him to secure relief to and maintain the rights of our citizens abroad. Upon this resolution Mr. ROBINSON briefly addressed the House, stating that the cases of Meany, Nagle, and others were notorious throughout the world; yet the State Department seemed to have no information from our ministers and consuls abroad.

That same day Congress again took a recess till the 21st day of November, 1867, and upon that day Mr. ROBINSON, finding that nothing seemed to rouse the Government of the United States to a sense of the indignities heaped upon our citizens, offered a preamble and resolution for the impeachment of our minister to England and for the production of the correspondence on the arrest of our citizens by Great Britian, without reference to its public effect, to be considered if need be in secret session of the House. Upon this question, on the 21st and 25th of November, 1867, he spoke an hour, urging immediate protection to our citizens and Congressional action on the right of expatriation. He sketched the preparations just then being made by England to rescue her citizens from the prisons of Abyssinia, and closed by indicating three points on American citizenship which the United States would insist upon and which were in the bill afterward passed through Congress. The day he made that speech a member of the English House of Peers was in the diplomatic gallery, and Rev. Newman Hall, who had opened the House that day with prayer, was an attentive listener. The spirit of the opening prayer was not sustained in the subsequent speech.

On Monday, December 2, the second session of the Fortieth Congress commenced, and upon that day Mr. ROBINSON again occupied the floor for an hour, urging immediate protection to our citizens and prompt action in Congress in declaring by law the right of expatriation and predicting the final triumph of this great American measure.

It was now nine months since the member from Brooklyn had first introduced the question into the House, and up to this time no other member had made any speech in favor of the movement. This day, however, Mr. Judd, of Illinois, followed Mr. ROBINSON and delivered a speech, from which we have already quoted a sentence, urging prompt action. The whole question was then referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

In the meanwhile the two speeches of Mr. ROBINSON and this of Mr. Judd were published in pamphlet form and extensively circulated throughout the country. Vast meetings were held in New York and all the leading cities of the Union, at which the chief men of the nation attended and spoke. The Legislatures of New York and most of the other States of the Union passed joint resolutions, which were forwarded to Congress by the governors of those States, all demanding that Congress should declare by law the right of expatriation, and that our Government should afford prompt and efficient protection to our citizens abroad. These reports of meetings, resolves of State Legislatures, and the numerous propositions now offered by members were all referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. That committee consisted of Messrs. Banks of Massachusetts, ORTH of Indiana, Cullom of Illinois, Washburne of Wisconsin, McCarthy of New York, Blair of Michigan, Myers of Pennsylvania, ROBINSON of New York, and Morgan of Ohio, in the order I have mentioned them; Mr. Banks, of course, being chairman; and by him the bill was afterward reported to the House.

The country had now roused itself and Congress was awake, and every member seemed to have a bill or joint resolution to offer. December 4, 1867, Mr. Cullom; December 9, Mr. Cook; December 20, Mr. Price; January 9, Mr. Wood; January 13, Mr. Burr; January 14, Mr. McCarthy; January 20, Mr. Van Horn, and the same day Mr. Brooks introduced joint resolutions. All those resolutions declaring for the right of expatriation and for protection to our citizens were referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

On the 27th day of January, 1868, the bill which had been matured by the committee was reported by Mr. Banks, providing reprisals as a remedy for the unjust arrest of our citizens. It was not by any means perfect, but it was thought best to report it to the House and invoke criticism and receive propositions for amendment.

On the 28th day of January, 1868, the bill came up for discussion. Mr. Spaulding opposed the reprisal clause, but proposed to make the unreasonable imprisonment of our citizens just cause of war. Messrs. Wilson, Farnsworth, Chanler, and Judd made suggestions for alterations and amendments. Mr. Banks defended the reprisal clause in a set speech. He stated that the immigrants since the organization of our Government and their descendants now number over twenty-one millions, or about three fifths of our entire population, and European laws hold all these people, to the second and third generation, perhaps for all time, to perpetual allegiance.

January 30 the bill was again taken up. Messrs. Banks, Donnelly, Judge Woodward, Wilson of Iowa, Pile, and Myers spoke upon the question; some for and others opposed to reprisals.

February 3 a very exciting debate occurred. Mr. ROBINSON having succeeded, by a vote of yeas 97 to 30 nays, in having the rules suspended, to introduce a resolution requesting the President to demand the release of Nagle, a new trial for Warren and others, and upon refusal to recall our minister and make reprisals. Mr. ROBINSON spoke at length in favor of prompt action. Messrs. Banks and Bingham opposed him. It was finally referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

February 4 the bill was again taken up, Messrs. Bailey, Higby, Butler, and Judd speaking upon it.

February 5 it came up again. Mr. Judd continued and concluded his remarks.

February 6 Mr. Chanler spoke. Judge Woodward followed, denouncing the proceedings of British courts in dealing with suspected Fenians as gross outrages upon our rights of citizenship, which demanded the immediate interposition of our Executive.

February 11 Messrs. Hunter, Cook, Baker, Ashley, Orth, and Clarke spoke upon the question.

February 12 Messrs. Morgan, Judge Van Trump, E. B. Washburne, Wilson, Pile, Jenckes, Judd, Boyer, Higby, Butler, Baker, Eldredge, Pruyn, and Woodbridge spoke upon the bill. Mr. Banks then moved the previous question, but this was lost—yeas 39, nays 78—showing that the House desired amendments.

February 13 Mr. Jenckes spoke at length upon the bill. He stated that, according to a recent English writer, General Grant might be arrested in England for fighting the battles of Vicksburgh and Petersburgh; for, as a British subject of ancestors immigrating since the Revolution, he had no right to interfere in a war between the North and South, both being at peace with Great Britain! The bill was then referred back to the committee with the numerous amendments and substitutes offered, where it remained nearly a month.

In the mean time on the 10th of February, 1868, the President, in reply to Mr. ROBINSON'S resolution of November 25, 1867, sent in the correspondence asked for, which was published in two volumes.

February 17 Mr. Griswold offered a substitute proposing, among other provisions, that American citizens arrested abroad should be tried in ten days after arrest, and Mr. Starkweather introduced a bill February 18, which passed the House in five minutes—yeas 114, nays 29—which was lost in the Senate, appropriating $50,000 for the relief of our citizens imprisoned abroad.

March 10, 1868, Mr. Banks reported from the committee the amended bill. It affirmed that the right of expatriation always existed as a natural right. That naturalized citizens should be protected as native citizens, and if our citizens were wrongfully imprisoned abroad the President should make reprisals. Mr. Banks, Judge Van Trump, and General Morgan made speeches upon it, and then it went over for several days.

March 21 Mr. Wood, of New York, introduced a substitute providing for reprisals.

March 28 the bill came up again, but impeachment was progressing, and it went over till April 20.

Upon that day Mr. Elliot of Massachusetts, spoke and proposed modifications. Mr. Jenckes also proposed a substitute with many provisions for losing and gaining and protecting citizenship. Mr. Paine, Mr. Pile, and Judge Van Trump suggested modifications, and then the previous question was ordered—yeas 71, nays 25. Mr. Banks made the closing speech. After a running debate with Messrs. Elliot, Dawes, Judd, Benton, Jenckes, Coburn, and others, Mr. Banks concluded; the vote was taken, amendments voted down, and the bill passed by yeas 104, nays 4. The nays were Ashley of Nevada, Baker of Illinois, Jenckes of Rhode Island, and Loan of Missouri.

During the entire debate there was no speech made directly against the bill. All were in favor of it; the only division was about the form in which it should pass.

And so, by the order of the House of Representatives of the United States, on the 20th of April, 1868, after mature deliberation, only four votes in the negative, and those not inimical to the general tenor of the bill, the President was to seize the first British subjects he could find and hold them till each American naturalized citizen, who had been denied the protection given to native citizens, should be released.

Pity it is that for a long time, and in some cases even now, the very outrages for which we were to make reprisals existed, and still exist, and yet no demand and no reprisals and no cannon!

Interest in this question now crossed the Rotunda to the north end of the Capitol and beat against the doors of the Senate.

PASSAGE THROUGH THE SENATE.

And here it met much opposition. April 23 it was promptly reported to the Senate from the House and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, consisting of Senators Sumner, Fessenden, Cameron, Harlan, Morton, Patterson of New Hampshire, and Johnson. That committee, I believe, had agreed not to act upon it at all, but committees and delegations from several cities visited Washington and urged its prompt passage.

June 15, while the Senate still slumbered over it, Mr. ROBINSON succeeded in passing through the House a resolution declaring that Warren and Costello had been imprisoned and convicted for words and acts spoken and done in the United States, and requesting the President to see to their release with proper ceremonies to our flag. This resolution Secretary Seward sent to our minister, who read it to Lord Stanley July 9, 1868, and one week afterward Lord Stanley announced that England accepted the American doctrine, and abandoned her claim to perpetual allegiance. This was telegraphed by cable, and read by Mr. Sumner to the Senate.

June 25, after it had slept two months in committee, it was reported to the Senate. Two weeks after that (July 8) Mr. Conness, of California, moved to take it up, but the Senate refused, Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio, objecting. In the mean time both the great political parties had made this question a principal plank in their platforms, and it would not be put aside.

July 10, 1868, Mr. Conness had it made the special order for the next Monday by a vote of yeas 22, nays 8; Mr. Pomeroy, of Kansas, objecting that he would prefer attending to citizens at home—that is, dividing spoils—to protecting them abroad.

July 13 it was the special order, but not in order at all, and it was put off again.

July 16 Mr. Conness moved to take it up, but was opposed and voted down by 28 to 21. The same day, at eleven o'clock p. m., another effort was made to take it up; and then, on motion of Senator Conkling, the Senate adjourned.

July 17 Mr. Conness moved to take it up, but it went over again.

After numerous delays it finally came up for discussion in the Senate July 18, 1868.

Mr. Sumner, chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, opened the discussion. The Senate committee had stricken out the clause adopted by the House almost unanimously, which provided that if any American citizen be arrested or detained by any foreign power or government, contrary to this act, upon the ground that naturalization does not operate to dissolve his allegiance to his native sovereign, or if any citizen whose release has been demanded be detained, or unreasonably delayed, or refused, the President should be empowered to suspend commercial relations, wholly or in part, with the offending power; and, if nothing else proved available, to order the arrest and imprisonment of any citizen or subject of the offending power found within the United States, unless he had declared his intentions to become naturalized or was an embassador; and had inserted instead thereof that the President, in such case, should report to Congress for their prompt action. What that prompt action was to be let the cases of Nagle, Warren, Costello, Meany, Halpin, McCafferty, and a hundred others—some released, some dead, and some still pining in British prisons or goaded into madness—let these answer.

Mr. Sumner opened his speech by reading a cable telegram dated the previous day, at London, stating that Lord Stanley had said in a public speech that the English Government was ready to accept the American doctrine. He protested against the House bill as a bolt of war, and exclaimed: "Suppose this bolt is hurled at England; all that various commerce, interchange of goods, shipping, steamers, all the multitudinous threads of business by which the two peoples are woven together, warp and woof, as in a mighty loom, all these to be severed!" At the very moment Mr. Sumner uttered these multitudinous words, England had swept our commerce from the seas by her Alabamas. All that shipping and those steamers of which he seemed so thoughtful were the property of England, whose bad faith with us had driven our ships and steamers from all seas. All those goods were of English fabric. What objections had we if England chose to sever such wicked warpings and woofings rather than abandon her practice of trampling on our citizenship! Even if those steamers and commerce and shipping and goods were our own, would it not be better to sink them all in the depths of the ocean rather than submit to national degradation? Mr. Sumner concluded by expressing the fear that the person seized in the President's reprisals might be Mr. Dickens, Mr. Trollope, or Rev. Newman Hall, all then in this country. And why not, Mr. Sumner? If England wantonly seizes and imprisons our Nagles and Halpins and Warrens, why should not we treat her subjects in the same way? Are not our citizens and soldiers made of as good clay as any of England's Halls or Dickenses, or any of her wandering Trollopes?

Mr. Conness followed, and proposed to restore the House clause, for reprisals, answering Mr. Sumner, and reminding that Senator how he kept the Senate and the country agitated over the colored woman who had been denied the right to ride in a first-class car on the Alexandria road, but for our citizens and soldiers in foreign prisons no action of the Government is urged by him.

Messrs. Howard, Frelinghuysen, and Drake followed. Mr. Drake made this remarkable declaration: "I do not wish—I should feel humiliated as a Senator of the United States—to have it go forth from this Chamber that the United States stood still and allowed an American citizen to be convicted in a British court, and immured in a British prison, merely for words that he spoke in the United States." True for you, Mr. Drake; you should feel humiliated, for the disgraceful fact was just so. The House of Representatives had unanimously and truly said so by adopting Mr. ROBINSON'S resolution of June 15, over one month ago; and the proof of it, printed for your information by Congress, had been lying on your desk six months, and you may well feel a humiliation which is in no way mitigated by ignorance.

July 20 Messrs. Patterson, of New Hampshire, Morton, Stewart, and Williams spoke. Mr. Williams proposed the amendment, afterward substantially adopted, making it the duty of the President to use all means short of acts of war to protect our citizens. He declared that no nation on the face of the earth neglected its citizens abroad as we had done. And Mr. Stewart declared that American citizens abroad had frequently to disguise themselves as British subjects to secure protection, and that war with England was not so bad as American humiliation.

July 22 Messrs. Vickers, Buckalew, and Sumner spoke, Mr. Sumner declaring that the House proposal was unutterable barbarism. The vote was then taken and the House clause for reprisals was stricken out—yeas 30, nays 7. The nays were Senators Conness, Sprague, Nye, Stewart, Thayer, Tipton, and Whyte.

Mr. Williams now renewed his amendment. Mr. Sumner opposed even this; he was willing that diplomatic relations might be suspended. Mr. Williams asked Mr. Sumner why both parties had put this subject into their political platforms if there was no necessity for energetic action. Fessenden replied that he would answer that question. He said "there had been some excitement among our Irish population on the Fenian troubles. Many of our citizens had been arrested in Great Britain; some had done no harm and should not have been arrested. So in Germany some had been arrested for military service. Now, the Republican party was very much afraid it would lose the German votes if it did not do something and the Democrats thought they would gain the votes if they did something. The Democratic party thought they would lose the Irish votes if they did not do something, and the Republican party hoped to get them if they did something." And such, in the opinion of the ablest statesman then in the Senate, were the low motives to action of both parties in advocating this great measure. And after having openly acknowledged that many of our citizens had been, without cause, imprisoned in England, he did not seem possessed of enough sense of national manhood or honor as to even ask, much less demand, their release. Mr. Conness again told Mr. Sumner that he would quickly interfere if the citizens arrested were of a different color. He thought Mr. Sumner's bill was an insult to every naturalized citizen.

Mr. Sumner vigorously returned Mr. Conness's charge and quoted from his speech in Faneuil Hall November 2, 1855, when few were ready to stand up for emigrants against Know-nothingism, showing how foreigners shone at our bar, bent the muscles to labor, walked in high places of commerce and in the retreats of learning, and were conspicuous among our distinguished living and illustrious dead.

Mr. Conness was somewhat staggered by this quotation, but remarked that he supposed Mr. Sumner, by merely stretching out his hand, could produce some old dissertation of his on almost any subject, but he said when American ideas are brought into conflict with European ideas he would not select Mr. Sumner as the American advocate!

Mr. Buckalew proposed that the President should exert all his constitutional powers to protect our citizens. Mr. Conkling favored this; Mr. Williams contended for his idea. The yeas and nays were then taken on Mr. Williams's proposition. No quorum was discovered. Another vote discovered a quorum, and Mr. Williams's proposition, empowering the President to resort to everything but acts of war to protect our citizens, was adopted by 19 to 15, Conness voting for it and Sumner against it. Mr. Buckalew now proposed his substitute, but, the quorum disappearing, the Senate adjourned.

July 25 debate was resumed and Mr. Williams's amendment adopted the day previous was stricken out, and Mr. Buckalew's proposition that the President should exert all his constitutional powers, which he ought to do without this new law, was adopted by yeas 27, nays 21; Sumner in the affirmative, Conness in the negative.

Mr. Conness said what little vitality had been in the bill was stricken out, and he had now no further interest in it. Mr. Howard also expressed himself dissatisfied and moved to have the withdrawal of our minister as the remedy. Mr. Stewart took the same view. Mr. Sprague declared himself in favor of retaliation, then reprisals, then war in maintenance of the inviolability of American citizenship, for all of which we had illustrious examples in English and American history. He did not mean to commit himself to easy terms of citizenship to foreigners, and might exclude the Irish altogether. Mr. Yates contended that the American flag should be the protection of native and naturalized citizens the world over.

Then Mr. Buckalew's amendment, which had just been adopted, was stricken out, and Mr. Howard's proposition again inserted—yeas 23, nays 19.

Mr. Ferry, of Connecticut, then moved that our citizens should be equally protected under the laws and treaties. Mr. Conness thought this effeminate, and read an article from the New York Sun of the previous day stating that Colonel Warren had forced the question of naturalization on the British authorities and had driven them into a corner from which there was no retreat, and that while they yielded their feudal doctrines they were wreaking their vengeance upon him. Mr. Conkling followed, pitching into the President. Mr. Howard said as the law now stood the President had no power to demand the release of American citizens. Mr. Morrill, of Maine, favored Mr. Howard's proposition.

The vote was then taken on Mr. FERRY's proposition, and it was lost—17 to 32; Sumner for it, and Conness opposed. Mr. Wade, on this question, voted with Conness. Mr. Williams then moved to substitute his own for Mr. Howard's, just adopted. Mr. Fessenden advocated Mr. Buckalew's, so did Mr. Sumner. Mr. Buckalew's proposition was lost by a vote of 21 to 25. Mr. Williams's proposition, which had been previously adopted, 19 to 15, and stricken out to make room for Mr. Buckalew's proposition—27 to 21—was now inserted by a vote of 33 to 14—Conness yea, Sumner nay—in place of Mr. Howard's, which had been inserted in place of Mr. Buckalew's by a vote of 23 to 19.

Mr. Howard felt dissatisfied. Mr. Sumner and Mr. Frelinghuysen thought the first two sections of the bill sufficient, which would cut off all substitutes and amendments.

Mr. Trumbull here, somewhat boldly, moved to lay the bill on the table; but for this only 4—Howard, Morrill of Vermont, Ross, and Van Winkle—voted, to 37 in the negative. The bill then went over till Saturday, July 25, and Congress was to adjourn on Monday, the 27th; and there was therefore but one day to pass it through the Senate, to have the House concur in the amendments, to have it engrossed, passed, and sent to the President for his approval.

Saturday, July 25, the bill so amended as in Committee of the Whole was reported to the Senate and the amendments agreed to—yeas 30, nays 12.

Mr. Ferry then proposed to strike out the first section, declaring the doctrine of expatriation. Mr. Conness opposed and Mr. Howard favored it; but it was voted down—yeas 9, nays 29. This time Conness and Sumner voted together.

Mr Sumner then moved to strike out the third section, (Mr. Williams's proposition) which had been just inserted; this was voted down.

The bill having been read a third time, the question was on its passage. Mr. Howard opposed it on account of the third section; it gave too much power to the President. He said we owed nothing to Fenianism. This Senator, with Mr. Dawes of the House, called American citizenship "Fenianism." Mr. Ferry also spoke against the bill, and denied that perpetual allegiance was inconsistent with the principle of republicanism.

The vote was finally taken, Mr. Drake calling for the yeas and nays, and the bill passed by yeas 39, nays 5. The nays were Ferry, Fessenden, Fowler, Howard, and Van Winkle.

The bill was immediately, and on the same day, reported to the House, and in five minutes afterward was passed as amended by unanimous vote.

It was approved by President Johnson July 27, 1868.

IMPORTANCE OF THE BILL.

It is the most important bill that ever passed our Congress or received the signature of any Executive. This was the opinion of many of the ablest men in both Houses, and though not as good or perfect as it might and should be, yet if executed in its spirit with boldness and vigor will prevent for all future time the arrest of any American citizen, native or naturalized, for words or acts, no matter how boldly spoken or done, in the United States.

This bill was introduced into the House on the 27th of January, 1868, and became a law by the President's signature the 27th of July, 1868. During these six months of its perilous passage through both Houses the continued incarceration of our citizens kept ringing in the ears of Congress. Thus Mr. ROBINSON, in his speech on the 3d of February, 1868, said:

"How long must American citizens be kept in British prisons before we can reach some department that will listen to their cry? Sir, six, nine, twelve months have elapsed since I first called attention to this subject, and these prisoners still rot in jail. * * * in cold, damp British jails, badly fed and poorly clothed, while no man is raising a hand to liberate them or a voice to comfort them or a cup of consolation to their quivering lips. * * * I intend, God giving me strength, to press this subject in every way and without cessation. If I do not succeed now you will hear from me again. * * * I have advocated and will continue to advocate prompt and energetic action."

In a subsequent speech Mr. ROBINSON said to the House: "I promised you that with God's help I should press this subject without cessation, and you shall know no peace till this matter is settled. I shall devise means to keep it before the House, the country, and the world till the prison bars that shut hoarsely upon these American citizens shall ring out the music of their deliverance. Their sorrowing hearts shall brighten in the light of the stars, and their blushes shall be hidden in the crimson of their flag. * * * Sir, I wish to emphasize the declaration that there never was a nation, ancient or modern, strong or weak, civilized or barbarian, that quietly and tamely submitted to such insults to its citizens as we have for years and are to-day enduring. I shall move the impeachment of every one impeachable and censure every one censurable till you act or call me to an account, and then I shall welcome your censure, for I would rather be expelled from this House than remain here if these indignities are to be tamely endured; * * * and if this House still refuse to demand the release of Warren and Costello and others similarly wrongfully imprisoned American citizens, I shall resign my seat here and refuse to become particeps criminis in this national disgrace and this shameful dereliction of public duty. My children will point with pleasure to the part I took, and your children will wonder that you hesitated so long to do what you must yet do, demand the immediate release of your imprisoned citizens or summon your Army and Navy to sweep from the sea and vanquish on the land every power that opposes their liberation; * * * and under the united command of Grant and Lee, Hancock and Longstreet, Sheridan and Johnston, strike one blow, effectual forever, for the glory of our flag and the sanctity of our citizenship."

There were other questions of great moment discussed in this Fortieth Congress, some of evil, others of good import. But its crowning glory, the crowning glory of all Congresses is the passage of this great American measure, which had within itself intrinsic strength enough to force its way through both Houses of Congress, into both political platforms, and to overthrow the hoary heresy of seven hundred years; to compel England and Prussia and other nations to recognize its bold Americanism by treaties with us, and to compel even now the British Parliament to succumb; an act having already passed both houses of Parliament, and having within a few days received the royal sanction, for free emigration and the absolute right of expatriation.

Now, I do not mean to say that either this bill or those treaties, or this act of Parliament, are or will be all that is desired, but the chain is broken, the battle is fought, feudal Europe goes down before free America, leaving only the details of the surrender and the proper terms of capitulation.

It is worth noticing that while I was engaged in urging this great measure to its successful completion the same pack of hounds were after me in full cry with the same ferocity that now animates them. A single line from the New York Times, one of the pack then and now in full cry and hot pursuit, of the date of December 3, 1867, will suffice. It is as follows:

ROBINSON opened his batteries. * * * The House is already tired of this subject and listened with impatience.

You will remember, Mr. Speaker, the scene on this floor on the 31st day of January last. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ORTH] took occasion to ridicule me because I had cited the example of England in her war with Abyssinia, in which she rescued her prisoners from King Theodorus, the capital being burned and the King being killed. He [Mr. ORTH] insisted on misrepresenting me and in refusing me a single minute to explain, by which the public was misled about my position, and even now stubbornly refuses to be corrected. He represented me as getting a war steamer, armed with many guns, which I named the Bombastes Furioso. I think he had more appropriately given that name to the captain than to the ship. Bombastes was a hero, with the dukedom of Strombelo. He had a sweetheart in Distaffina, and a grateful but tricky king in Artaxominous, and wore a huge pair of Hoosier boots. It did well enough on that 31st day of January to ridicule my humble efforts to liberate our citizens from British jails. But when the country became aroused, when public meetings and legislative bodies had indorsed my movement and my name, and the prairie of public feeling was on fire, the tune was changed, ridicule was silenced, and those who had derided me were quite willing to jump on my wagon.

Well, I went to the meeting at the Cooper Union on the 3d of April. The "Bombastes" was under full headway, and to my great astonishment I found that my friend from Indiana had deposed me from the captaincy of that vessel and had taken full command himself. The cast of characters could not well have been surpassed, even when the play was produced at the Theater Royal, London. There was Artaxominous, King of Utopia, who had installed the honorable gentleman from Indiana in the place made vacant by his dismissal of the member from Brooklyn. There was Fusbos—in fact there were more than one Fusbos running around the King and carrying his commands. There was the whole army, consisting of a long drummer and a short fifer, with a tall and a short soldier. There was Distaffina, with colored chintz gown, open in front, crimson calamanco petticoat, white muslin apron, mob cap, &c., and there was General Bombastes Furioso in full dress—a general's military suit, jack-boots, comic powdered wig and pigtail, long sword, sash, small cocked hat and plume, and gauntlets. That I may do him no injustice I quote from his speech.

I know what I speak of, for I am chairman of the sub-committee that has this matter in charge, and I know that the action that will be taken will be one of the proudest facts in American history. I am not betraying official confidence when I say that within ten days you are likely to be called together either to rejoice over the liberation of these men or for a more serious cause. The President of the United States is moving forward.

Why, this beats Bombastes and Blarney both rolled into one. One of the proudest facts! Well, the battle of Monmouth, the taking of Yorktown, the passage of the batteries below New Orleans, and the bombardment of Vicksburgh are proud facts in American history. Nothing surely could equal them at this day except the burning of London. And then the comfort that the President was not moving backward! And also to think that within ten days from that glorious 3d of April, to wit, the 13th of April, 1882, we should all be called together! Alas, Mr. Speaker, twice ten days are gone, and we are not called together for a jubilee of laughter or of preparation for slaughter.

Who dares this pair of boots displace
Must meet Bombastes face to face.

Hope told a flattering tale—
A tub thrown to a whale.

Now, while my friend here to-day has been frightened almost to death because I have hinted that I might offer a resolution that the President should demand all American citizens unjustly detained, as provided in the law of July 27, 1868, I turn to his speech made three weeks ago in Cooper Union as reported in the Irish Nation, and I find this sentence:

I tell you that that committee (of which I am chairman) will march right up to the prison doors of Great Britain and demand that those prison doors be opened. We are going to move, and move forward; no backward movement in this matter.

Why, I was ridiculed because I threatened to take London with Sherman and Porter, but here the gentleman from Indiana is going to take it with his sub-committee.

Now, all my critics say that if any American citizen is wrongfully imprisoned by Great Britain we must demand his release. "So say we all of us." But what if England refuses to comply with our demand? I say fight. Washington said to England, "Independence or fight;" Madison said to England, "Give up the right of search or fight;" Jackson said to France, "Pay or fight;" and I say, and this House says, and all true Americans say, "Give our citizens a prompt fair trial or a speedy release, or fight." Even Jones of the Times, and Reid of the Tribune, and Bennett of the Herald say we should make the demand for their release. But will any of this trio tell me what are they going to do if England refuses our reasonable demand? I know nothing in history to illustrate their action; so we must take to fiction, and that rare Irish author, Sheridan, has given us a picture in his unrivaled "Rivals" of the position in which these doughty heroes would be placed if England should refuse. The New York Herald of Saturday last criticises my way, wherein I showed that England, when the King of Abyssinia had wrongfully imprisoned some of her subjects, sent Napier over with force enough to release her subjects, and in doing so the capital of the enemy was destroyed and the King killed, and I said, "I ask no more than that we send over force enough to take our citizens out of British bastiles, and if in getting them out the city of London goes to ashes we shall only be following England's example in a less provoking and less flagrant case." I did not say "On to London!"

I knew there was no necessity. All that was necessary for us to do was to demand the release of our citizens or the passport of our minister and there would have been no war; and if war does come it will arise from our pusillanimity in not showing some pluck from the beginning. But why should we not take London if our national honor demands it? Did we not take Montreal; did we not try to take Quebec when that brave Irishman, Montgomery, fell? Did we not take New Orleans and Vicksburgh and Richmond from a braver army than England can ever put in the field? Is there a fool in the universe who would say that London could not be more easily taken than Vicksburgh was? We need no army or navy from this side of the Atlantic; the army and navy that would take London and Dublin within one month after a declaration of war with the United States are now in Europe. Half of the British army and navy are Irish and the other half have no love for the government that has impoverished and starved them. In less than a month after the first shot fired by England against the United States the Stars and Stripes would be floating from the mizzen-peaks and flag-staffs of their largest ships and strongest fortifications. All this might not be so, but will any one deny that a war with England would result in an American victory? If such an one exists let him step forth and declare it.

Now, when these critics so severely condemn my plan, let us see what theirs is. Your imagination, sir, will immediately recall the name of Bob Acres. That individual made a demand upon one occasion which was refused. Nothing of course could come of it but a fight, unless one of the parties backed down. We will imagine the Herald as Bob Acres, making the demand and being flatly refused by "my dear Granville." He calls in General Sherman or Admiral Porter, whom we shall name Sir Lucius O'Trigger, and issues his challenge for the refusal which Granville so scornfully gave him. Sir Lucius Sherman appeals to Bob's honor, that if he make the demand he must fight, and thus they converse:

Bob. I grow full of anger, Sir Lucius! I fire apace; odds, hilts, and blades! I find a man may have a deal of valor in him and not know it. Your words are a grenadier's march to my heart. I believe courage must be catching. I certainly do feel a kind of valor arising as it were, a kind of courage as I may say. Odds, flints, pans, and triggers, I'll challenge him directly. The thunder of your words has soured the milk of human kindness in my heart. I must be in a passion, Sir Lucius; I must be in a rage! Dear Sir Lucius, let me be in a rage if you love me!

Sir Lucius. (looking at his watch.) Sure they don't mean to disappoint us. Hah! No, faith, I think I see them coming.

Bob. Hey! What! Coming!

Sir Lucius. Ay.

Bob. Well, let them come; hey! Sir Lucius! We—we—we—we won't run!

Sir Lucius. Run!

Bob. No, I say. We won't run, by my valor!

Sir Lucius. What the devil's the matter with you?

Bob. Nothing, nothing, my dear friend, my dear Sir Lucius; but I—I—I don't feel quite so bold somehow as I did.

Sir Lucius. Oh, fie! Consider your honor.

Bob. Ay, true—my honor. Do, Sir Lucius, edge in a word or two every now and then about my honor.

Sir Lucius. Well, here they're coming.

Bob. Sir Lucius, if I wasn't with you I should almost think I was afraid. If my valor should leave me! Valor will come and go!

Sir Lucius. Then pray keep it fast while you have it.

Bob. Sir Lucius, I doubt it is going—yes, my valor is certainly going; it is sneaking off; I feel it oozing out, as it were, at the palms of my hands.

Sir Lucius. Choose your weapons.

Bob. Odds life! Sir Lucius, I'm not going to fight. These are my particular friends. What! quarrel with my dear friend! Zounds, Sir Lucius, you would not have me so unnatural!

Sir Lucius. Upon my conscience, Mr. Acres, your valor has oozed away with a vengeance. Pooh! pooh! you are little better than a coward.

It is time, sir, that we should come to an understanding with the rest of the world as to what an American citizen is. England tells us, and our minister echoes their ideas, that they will molest no American unless he is suspected, (of Americanism.) The brainless throng of folly and fashion that go abroad from this country to spend the money which their fathers got by industry and energy, or from fraudulent contracts, and who feel themselves in the third heaven of happiness if they can bask in the splendor of effete monarchy or touch the hem of the garment of some disreputable lord, try to pass themselves off as the true type of Americanism. How heartily these proud nobles despise these toadies every person of sense knows, but they will never be molested, for these lords and dukes know that there is not enough of American manhood in a ship load of them to manifest itself. They will try to forget American republicanism by fawning and kneeling around the tyrants and oppressors. But they no more represent or typify American manhood than the capon of Bucks county in Pennsylvania represents the game blue hen's chicken of Delaware. There is not a drop of genuine American blood in their degenerate veins.

But a genuine American, who believes in Bunker Hill and the Declaration of Independence, who goes back to visit the paternal home of his ancestors in Ireland, who loves liberty and hates oppression, who sees English insolence and despotism in Ireland and is not afraid to express himself in respectful and legal Yankee language against the tyrant and for the oppressed, he will always be suspected and in danger of imprisonment. An honest, hearty, manly American is as terrible to throned or titled tyrants as dynamite. A true American traveling in Europe is a peripatetic protest against monarchy and monopoly. He will impregnate the air wherever he goes by the healthy perfume of republicanism, and you can no more divest him of that dangerous contagion than you could rob the rose of its perfume, even if you carried it into the infernal regions, where its fragrance would be exhaled from every shriveling leaf. Imagine, if you can, any genuine Yankee visiting Ireland and seeing the heartless landlord evicting the helpless tenant and his wife and children from the little cabin in which his fathers for centuries lived and died, without muttering in poorly-suppressed anger his abhorrence of the oppressor and his sympathy for the victim—and he of course would be a suspect.

Now, that is the kind of Yankee for whom we seek protection. The other kind do not need it and are not worth it. And this protection we must have. There are thousands of Englishmen in every large city who refuse to be naturalized, who have their St. George's societies, and praise up monarchy, and run down republicanism, and we do not throw them into prison as suspects. If we did England would promptly and potentially demand their release. Now, England must give as well as take. If her subjects can mingle in society here and express their preference for monarchy our citizens must be allowed to travel there and express in respectful language their preference for republicanism, unless you intend to give in to England's insolent pretensions, as tersely expressed by James Russell Lowell:

It's you're the sinner allers, she's the saint,
Wat 's good 's all English, all that isn't ain't.

And it must be understood that no American citizen shall ever be forced to accept the degrading terms of leaving the country never to return. If any American citizen violates any law let him have a fair and speedy trial. If guilty and convicted let him be punished according to law; but we say to England now, and she must listen and hear, that we will not allow her to arrest any American citizen on suspicion, and then, when she cannot prove any crime against him, annex degrading conditions to his release, unless she consents that we can do the same with her subjects.

I cannot help contrasting the prompt manner in which our Government went to the relief of some American citizens in Persia when compared with our slow movements for the relief of those in Ireland. On the 20th of November, 1880, Mr. R. R. Dawes, then a member elect of this Congress, wrote from Marietta, Ohio, to our Secretary of State, Mr. Evarts, stating that a number of Presbyterian missionaries, including his sister, her husband and family, were threatened with danger at Oroomiah, in Persia, from the Mohammedan population who accused them, wrongfully as they claimed, with complicity with the Koordish Sheik, whose forces were then confronting Oroomiah. This country had no diplomatic representative in Persia, and so, on the 26th of November, 1880, Mr. Evarts wrote to Mr. Lowell, our minister to London, asking him to solicit the interference of the British minister in Persia to save our citizens. On the 11th of December Mr. Lowell sent a cable dispatch to Mr. Evarts stating that he had seen the foreign secretary, that the secretary had telegraphed to the British minister, and that the Persian Government had instructed its representative at Oroomiah to protect the American missionaries. Mr. Lowell received Mr. Evarts's dispatch on the 7th of December; the same day he wrote to Lord Granville, and on the 10th Lord Granville had an answer back from Teheran, in Persia, which he sent to Mr. Lowell, informing him that the Persian Government had telegraphed to Oroomiah to protect the American citizens. Thus in three days from the receipt of Mr. Evarts's letter Mr. Lowell had secured our citizens in Persia. It takes him twelve months before he can ask for protection to a citizen in Ireland.

At a mass-meeting held in Chickering Hall, in the city of New York, the 1st of February last, to protest against the treatment of the Jews in Russia, and to express sympathy with them in their sufferings, the mayor of the city presided, and among the vice-presidents were Hamilton Fish, Edwards Pierrepont, Robert Bonner, and other prominent citizens. Among the speakers were Judge Davis, William M. Evarts, Dr. John Hall, and Dr. Howard Crosby. Mr. Evarts, in describing the persecutions of the Jews, drew the following picture, which was more applicable to Ireland than to the borders of the Black and Baltic Seas:

These persecutions, these oppressions, these cruelties, these outrages have taken every form of atrocity in the experience of mankind or which the resources of the human tongue can describe. Men have been cruelly murdered, women brutally outraged, children dashed to pieces or burnt alive in their homes, thousands of families, shelterless and homeless, have been reduced to beggary; even banishment from the boundaries has been exercised in this misery and desolation.

And then he justifies American interference, because this "is the oppression of men and women by men and women; and we are men and women, and it justifies us in limiting, in resenting, in protesting, and in preventing."

And Dr. Hall advocated the idea that we should act "as a sort of external conscience to Russia, and if there be failure, then the Lord God Omnipotent reigneth and the punishment must come." All this is very applicable to England, who stands more than Russia in need of an external conscience.

I have no desire, Mr. Speaker, in discussing this question, to say an unkind word of any gentleman on the committee or of any member of this House. I have no ill feeling toward any one, not even against England, outside of her barbarous and brutal treatment of her own subjects and our citizens. I have a right to complain of delays, and I hope I may be allowed to do so without being considered as attacking or assailing any one. The first day of the present session I had a resolution drawn up in the proper shape, requesting the President to execute the law of July 27, 1868. After several vain endeavors to be heard in order I, on the 16th day of December, 1881, announced then, out of order, as privileged, and told an unwilling House that they should hear from me again. I managed to get over half a column of rulings against me in the RECORD, and this sentence:

Our citizens are suffering unjust imprisonment abroad, and yet nobody can be heard in their behalf. [Cries of "Order!"]

Finding that I could not get a hearing in the House, I gave the resolutions to the associated press, and they were published in the New York evening papers of that day and the daily papers of the next morning. That is now over four months ago, and these men still remain in prison, or did so till within a few days.

On Monday, January 23, my colleague [Mr. COX] introduced the resolution now before the committee; that is, three months ago. They were bound by the rule to report that resolution back again in one week. They kept it there and on the 14th of February, they reported it back with a resolution to lay it on the table. This House voted that proposition down, and the resolution was recommitted with the instructions proposed by my colleague [Mr. COX] appended to the resolution. There it slept again until the 24th of March, when I called the attention of the House to the delay, and was informed by the chairman and another member of the committee that in a day or two we should have a satisfactory report. That was a full month ago yesterday, and here we are again in pursuit of information under difficulties.

Upon the 31st day of January last, now nearly three months ago, this House, by resolutions and petitions presented by Mr. COX, Mr. UPSON, and others, requested the President to obtain a list of all American citizens, naturalized or native born, under arrest or imprisonment in Great Britain, with the cause of their arrest, and all information and correspondence on the subject. I hold in my hand the first answer of the President to this House, the assembled Representatives of the people of the United States. It consists of a single leaf of printed matter, and the only information it gives is contained in ten lines of a note written by the Secretary of State, and it took nine weeks (sixty-three days) to write that, and during all that time, our eagle in the gutter of monarchical insolence, not one line of the voluminous correspondence on file in the Department given in this first answer to the respectful request of this House, and but poorly supplied in the second installment. In place of that we have the unnecessary assurance that between the State Department and the keepers of the bastiles where innocent American citizens are wrongfully imprisoned negotiations are going on in a spirit of entire friendship. While all the real American journalists through their papers, and the leading American statesmen, including ex-members of the Cabinet, Senators, and Representatives, including both presiding officers of their respective Houses, in public meetings, by speeches and letters, are denouncing the unutterable insult of one party and the inexplicable delay of the other, our servants are telling us that things are just as they should be, and entire friendship exists between the oppressor and the serene representatives of the oppressed.

Mr. Speaker, when I first brought this question before the House on the 16th day of December, now over four months ago, I was pleading for immediate attention to the wrongs of American citizens, then and several months before and ever since suffering wrongful imprisonment. That question was, and still is, the most vital American question claiming the attention of an American Congress. In the debate on the question on the 31st of January, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ORTH] laid down the law that American citizens were subject to British law the same as British subjects; that is, that our citizens could be arrested on mere suspicion and held without being charged with crime and without trial at the will of the foreign ministry contrary to Magna Charta, habeas corpus, trial by jury, and other defenses of liberty of which Englishmen used to boast, but which are all now submerged in the Gladstone mud. I denounced the whole thing as a humbug. I said on this floor that it would take a thousand years of such proceedings to get a fly out of a molasses-cup. Was I not justified in saying so? This resolution went to the Committee on Foreign Affairs nearly three months ago. It should have been reported back in five minutes. The committee should have been instructed to remain in their room without food or drink or sleep till they reported it back to the House for immediate action; but what have we seen in that committee? Day after day that committee has had dreamy sessions and dreary answers to their questions concerning suspicions on the fertilizing exports of Peru. Was this of as much importance as the continued incarceration of a dozen of innocent American citizens, every hour of whose detention was as malodorous as the subject of their Peruvian researches?

Sir, the apostle Paul in his Epistle to the Philippians declared that he accounted all things but dung that he might win Christ. I do not know how that rough Anglo-Saxon word has been rendered in the new version. I was brought up on the old translation, and I have little respect for the new, which knocks "hell" out of the Bible, but looking at the proceedings in the Committee on Foreign Affairs it would seem as if some Americans would risk American honor and sacrifice once again their Saviour to win guano!

There are many other matters and considerations which I should dwell upon, but time and space forbid. I intended to refer to the case of J. C. Wright, recently insulted in Brazil. I just now see in front of me the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. UPDEGRAFF.] I intended to have copied some extracts from his eloquent speech delivered a few days since in this House. I quote a single paragraph to show what an honest American statesman thinks of that country whose flag some Americans are anxious to salute and whose government they are ready to praise. He says:

Such is the condition to which England's policy—cruel and crushing—has reduced her people. More than one-thirtieth of her entire population, by the authority of her own parliamentary returns, are public paupers. From her borders, as they can, they crowd to this country to find honored labor, free homes, open schools, and prosperous industry. To establish and make strong her own grasping policy she has ruined her own agriculture; robbed Ireland—glorious, beautiful, but now stricken Ireland—of its trade and its nationality; holds plundered India, famine-stricken, in the dust, and now, robber-nation of the earth, grasps at our industries, and, with measureless audacity, tells us it is to be done, all done, in the sweet name and under the mocking mask of universal brotherhood.

One of the most objectionable things I have seen in this business is the laborious clerical services we are rendering England in detecting flaws in the title of our citizens to their citizenship. M. P. Boyton went to Europe. He was arrested on charge of crime, tried and acquitted; then he was arrested on suspicion, and kept in prison till he grew blind. He claimed protection as an American citizen. He produced his passport with the seal of the State Department. His release or speedy trial should have been instantly demanded. It took our representatives a good while to do it, but they finally proved to themselves and to Europe that the seal of the State Department was a fraud and a lie, and I suppose European despots will be at liberty hereafter to look upon all our passports and documents under the State Department seal as lies and frauds. Just now, it seems by papers recently sent to us from the State Department that our folks are engaged in picking flaws in the naturalization papers of O'Mahoney and McEnery. Is it worth our while to pay ministers and consuls to do this work for the British Government? If such dirty work must be done, let the British Government do it by their own spies and at their own expense. The law as laid down by our own Supreme Court is that we must take the record as correct and not go behind it to pick flaws, and that naturalized citizens should not be called upon always to prove the regularity of the different proceedings by which their passports or naturalization papers were obtained. Lord Lyons in the numerous demands he made on our Government to release suspects in our war never waited to send home for proof of their being English subjects.

I wish to say, sir, and I say it with great pleasure, that I am able to correct an error into which I fell in my first speech, relying on Appleton's Encyclopædia, about Commodore Ingraham, who rescued Koszta in such a brilliant American fashion. The old patriot and hero is not dead, but still living near Charleston, in South Carolina, and might take a hand in the fight if there should be one, as I am informed by his son-in-law in Baltimore, whose wife is not only the daughter of Captain Ingraham but the grand-daughter of that great Irish-American patriot and jurist, John Rutledge, of South Carolina, the first judge appointed by Washington to the Supreme Court of the United States, and afterward appointed by him Chief-Justice of that court.

It is curious to notice that the two governments are unwilling to let Congress and Parliament know what is going on about these suspects. I beg leave to notice the fact, without dwelling on it, that public meetings and the Legislatures of the several States are passing resolutions in favor of the measure on which I am now speaking, and demanding the recall of Minister Lowell.

What shall we do to be saved? Washington warned us against foreign influence. He saw that monarchical representatives mingling with the giddy leads of our society might injure our republicanism. Jefferson wished that a sea of fire rolled between us and Europe. What he feared was the dangerous influence of foreign courts upon our democratic institutions. Shall we withdraw all our foreign ministers and ask Europe to withdraw theirs? Diplomatic dinners make us forget diplomatic duties.

We must not forget our duty to these wronged American citizens, after they are all restored. We must see that ample compensation shall be paid to all of them.

And now, Mr. Speaker, allow me to say in conclusion, feeling the influence of warm hearts on this and on that side of the House, appreciating fully and freely the loyalty and devotion of every member to the flag and the honor of the country, I still think I have a just claim in connection with the success of this measure, going back to the time when I first commenced to urge it upon Congress, over forty years ago, through Henry Clay, down through the history of the law of July 27, 1868, and in my course in this Congress, however irregular or erratic, that there is no man on this side of the House among my party friends, or on that side of the House among my old friends, that would deny me some credit. I think I can claim that if our Government had not proved unfaithful to their duties, they had fallen into neglect, or at least had not sufficiently appreciated the importance of protecting our humblest citizens. I know how little my feeble efforts could have accomplished in this or the Fortieth Congress without the generous and more powerful support of others on both sides of the Chamber. Still I claim that my efforts have not been without good. When I came here I found the American eagle drugged and drowsy, his blood poisoned with political pyæmia, his beak filled with Lowell garbage, and his pinions wet with the mildew of monarchy. I roused him from his ignoble slumber; I brushed the mildew from his plumage; I gave his majestic voice to the music of Liberty and his imperlai wing to fan the tempest and soar to the sun.

Mr. ORTH. I understand the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] desires to be heard. How much time does the gentleman wish?

Mr. COX, of New York. I think ten minutes will be ample.

Mr. ORTH. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. COX, of New York. My colleague [Mr. ROBINSON] addressed me a question a moment ago. If we are in earnest in vindicating American citizenship, if we mean earnestly that our citizens shall be enlarged from their prisons, I should not say one word here to impede, and everything gracefully to aid, such a laudable object.

Let gentlemen on both sides of this House have proper credit. Let no man assume to himself any special credit in such a laudable endeavor. I am not unfamiliar myself with the practical business of this nature, as many ex-prisoners testify. I would not, sir, be on my feet to-day on this question again as I have been, perhaps, too frequently, were it not that my constituents desire and demand representation on this subject. They have had it from me and I propose always to stand by my resolutions as the exponents of their generous thoughts.

It is no discredit to my colleague [Mr. ROBINSON] that he takes my two resolutions as the basis of his action and endeavors to lift them up into prominence. I am very proud to see him thus notice my efforts in behalf of his countrymen. All honor to him.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I ask my colleague to allow me to contradict him. I give him the fullest credit; I would rather do credit to him than myself; and if I have not done it before I thank him now for the honorable, generous, and able manner in which he has stood by me. And I have never said anything else.

Mr. COX, of New York. And I thank the gentleman for standing by me in all these matters.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. Let us stand together.

Mr. COX, of New York. I would if I could and he would—there is hardly room on that brow—place a fitting chaplet for his services to Ireland! I give my colleague all the honors for his indefatigable exertions in 1868 and since. I care not myself for these transient honors. They come and go like rainbows. They make and unmake Congressmen. Let Congressmen come and go! Nor should we care so much how it may concern one race or another, nor how it may affect Ireland in her landed system or otherwise.

I desire, sir, to rise to the height of an American argument, that we are, in passing this resolution for the prompt trial or prompt release of American citizens, vindicating, not Irishmen, not Ireland, not naturalized or native citizens, but citizenship. We vindicate anew Magna Charta. We vindicate citizenship and the bills of right. We stand by citizenship and fair trial and trial by a jury of the vicinage and a jury of peers, or equals.

Consciously I represent the American sentiment expressed by Rufus Choate. He said of our party that he loved the Democracy because it had "gay and festive defiance of foreign dictation."

I need not argue to you, Mr. Speaker—and I think, sir, thanks are due to you for your assistance in endeavoring to bring forward these measures—I need not argue to you, sir, the necessity of vindicating Magna Charta. It is as old as King John and the barons. It is as old as Stephen Langdon, the Archbishop of Canterbury who gave the anathema maranatha against those who violated Magna Charta. Was it not this Catholic-Democratic primate of England who had Te deum laudamus sung in Westminster Abbey because of the great charter of liberty? What is that charter? Has it been violated? And what is our duty when it is violated in the persons of our citizens? I need not read to you the dead Latin in which it is expressed. I have it here in our most stalwart English:

No freeman—

Says the thirty-ninth article of Magna Charta—

No freeman shall be taken, or imprisoned, or disseized, or outlawed, or exiled, or any wise destroyed; nor will we go upon him, nor will we send upon him, unless by the lawful judgment of his peers or by the law of the land; to none will we sell, to none will we deny or delay, right or justice.

That was said centuries ago, reaffirmed in England more than thirty times, and fixed in our American Constitution as a cardinal idea.

Did not Sir James Mackintosh regard this thirty-ninth article as the most effectual security against oppression? Was there any wisdom devised by man equal to it in the interest of freedom? Does not Hallam term these as essential clauses to protect personal liberty and property? Did he not feel that arbitrary imprisonment and spoliation might be prevented by such declarations? If the House will but regard our Constitution and its forerunners, it would allow no dispossession of the freehold anywhere under Magna Charta.

I said this cardinal idea was fixed in our own Constitution. Here is the language:

Nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law.

It is not a question, as Mr. Lowell makes it, whether the British Government shall care for American citizens equally with British citizens.

The question is whether, when our own citizens are arrested under the infamous "coercion act" which violates Magna Charta and every principle of personal liberty, we shall not raise the standard of our country to cover our own citizens against this attempt to seize, imprison, and detain without trial.

This is the main question. It concerns the German as well as the Celt. We should abrogate the Bancroft treaty, because that treaty breaks the principle. It concerns every man, who, wherever born, gives his allegiance to this country.

Why, Mr. Speaker, I could go back even to Holy Writ and vindicate this measure. Paul's imprisonment is an example for all time. He is the hero for a fight for personal human liberty. But I want to say to the gentlemen on the Foreign Affairs Committee that when they bring this resolution forward, or when the House discharges them from its consideration and my resolution comes to the front, as it will if we discharge them—I wish to say to that committee that I would like them, for their honor and the honor of this House, to place it on high ground. Let us not ask Mr. Lowell to beg Lord Granville as a matter of comity or friendship, in honeyed or poetic phrases, to recognize our American citizenship and to enlarge our citizens, but demand it—demand it in the name of 50,000,000 of free people—demand it as the right of our citizens, having the shield of our country over them.

When, sir, Paul was imprisoned, and when the magistrates sent the sergeants to him, saying, "Let these men go," and the keeper of the prison told the saying to Paul, "The magistrates have sent to let you go; now, therefore, depart and go in peace," what did Paul say?

They have beaten us openly uncondemned, being Romans, and have cast us into prison; and now do they thrust us out privily? nay verily; but let them come themselves and fetch us out.

And the sergeants told these words unto the magistrates: and they feared, when they heard that they were Romans.

"Romans!" The pride of early civism and polity. Have we no desire to emulate such pride? Have we no Hebraic, Christian, or human pride for the glory of personal rights?

And, I say, let the English Government, if they thrust these men out of prison privily, give an account openly; or rather let them do it openly before the world, recognizing our right to demand them as an element of that citizenship in which we are proud to number them.

Mr. Speaker, I fear I have already trespassed too long. I will say, in conclusion, that whatever may be the proposition of my friend and colleague, [Mr. ROBINSON,] if the House votes to discharge the Committee on Foreign Affairs, let us put it in the terse old tough Anglo-Saxon of the Magna Charta translation I have read. Let us demand for the American citizens a trial; no year of imprisonment, but a hearing at once, or otherwise a release, demanding that the American people will do their duty to the men who have stood by our flag, with arms in their hands and with ballots at the polls. [Applause.]

Mr. ORTH. Mr. Speaker, I shall endeavor in the few remarks that I feel called upon this morning to submit to the House to try and bring this question out of the region of poetry and sentiment down to the solid fact, to the important fact that this House is to-day considering one of the most interesting and one of the most delicate questions before this Congress, I might almost say before Congress for many years.

The pending resolution, offered by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. ROBINSON,] is to discharge the Committee on Foreign Affairs from the further consideration of the question pertaining to our imprisoned citizens in Ireland. Ordinarily that is a pretty severe motion to be made in this House in reference to any committee. I regret that it was made, and especially do I regret that it was made apparently upon the suggestion of one of my colleagues, whom I do not now see in his seat, [Mr. CALKINS.] But the resolution has been presented, and this House must now act upon it.

I desire simply to say here for myself and for the committee that this House will, as I hope and trust, act as its cool and deliberate judgment may dictate. But before that action I beg of the members to inform themselves, if they have not done so already, of the true status and condition of this case and the position in which this House will be placed when you discharge your Committee on Foreign Affairs and then proceed to vote upon and adopt a resolution instructing the President of the United States to make demands of the British Government in reference to certain citizens——

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. Not instructing; not instructing.

Mr. ORTH. I know what I am talking about.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I am glad of it.

Mr. ORTH. I do not wish to be interrupted.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I will not interrupt you.

Mr. ORTH. I did not interrupt the gentleman from New York, and I trust that so far as I am concerned and he is concerned the "suspended hostility" which he talked about will continue to be suspended for a time at least.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. One word.

Mr. ORTH. I do not wish to be interrupted.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I will not interrupt you again. I only want to say that I have no hostile feeling whatever toward you.

Mr. ORTH. I have no more interest in this matter than any other member on this floor, but the House having referred this matter to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, it becomes my duty as a member of said committee to lay the facts before the House, so that it shall be enabled to act understandingly. So far as possible I desire the House to be fully posted as to the consequences of its action. Before you start upon the journey marked out by the resolution see where it will lead you. I beg you not to start upon a journey from which you will be compelled to retrace your steps. The American Government has never yet in her intercourse with other nations taken untenable positions, none from which she has been compelled to retrace her steps.

So far as mere sympathy is concerned, I have sympathy not only with the Irish people, but with all people who seek to improve their condition and who resist oppression. But there is a difference between sympathy and duty. The Irish people are a part of the British Empire, and while we sympathize with them, and have a right to sympathize with them, we must not lose sight of international obligations and of our own honor and dignity. The American Congress or the American people cannot use that sympathy as a mere cloak to foment trouble among the people of a neighboring and friendly nation.

Another thing, and I wish to say it right here. No man has a higher regard for American citizenship than I have. I hold it above all price; and thus holding it, I declare most emphatically that so far as I can by my vote or my influence interpose, such citizenship shall only be used as a shield and never as a sword. It shall be used only for honorable and never for dishonorable or disreputable purposes. Before closing my remarks I shall make practical application of this position.

The motion is made here to discharge the Committee on Foreign Affairs—to pass upon us at least an implied censure. Have we been derelict in our duty? Have we shown ourselves incompetent or unwilling to discharge the trust committed to our hands? Oh, yes, it is said; we have not reported within a week. We have not, I admit, in this most important matter complied literally and technically with the language of one of our rules. We have regarded rather the gravity of the trust than the literal words of the rules, and we have felt ourselves fully justified in this course; but even in doing so we have kept entirely within the spirit of the rules, as an examination of the facts apparent on the record fully demonstrates. Let me invite your attention to these facts. On the 31st day of January, 1882, the House passed a resolution which had prior to that date been reported from the Committee on Foreign Affairs. I ask the Clerk to read it. I beg the House to remember the dates as we progress.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the President be requested to obtain a list of all American citizens, naturalized or native-born, under arrest or imprisonment by authority of the British Government, with a statement of the cause or causes of such arrest and imprisonment, and especially such of said citizens as may have been thus arrested and imprisoned under the suspension of the habeas corpus in Ireland; and, if not incompatible with the public interest, that he communicate such information, when received, to this House, together with all correspondence now on file in the Department of State relating to any existing arrest and imprisonment of citizens as aforesaid.

Mr. ORTH. I want you to mark the language of that resolution and its date. On the 31st of January, 1882, the President was requested to obtain a list of all imprisoned Americans—"all imprisoned Americans." Does not the greater include the less? Does not all include a part? When "all Americans" are embraced in that resolution, do you not include O'Connor and Hart and O'Mahoney and McEnery? These men are included in the general resolution requesting the President to take action with regard to "all Americans imprisoned." The President has acted; he is acting to-day. Where is the evidence of it? The gentleman from New York [Mr. ROBINSON] yesterday in the exuberance of his patriotism stated that none of these men had been discharged since this action was taken. That gentleman is much mistaken. The President has acted under that resolution. Here is the message that he sent to this House on the 5th of April, containing eighty-eight pages of information in reference to "all Americans imprisoned in Ireland"—not merely O'Mahoney and O'Connor and Hart and McEnery, but all Americans. The President is acting now. This message, communicated to the House on the 5th of April, states that two of the persons embraced in the special resolution of the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] have already been released.

Mr. COX, of New York. Three.

Mr. ORTH. I beg the gentleman's pardon, two. Mr. Lowell states on the 3d of April that Walsh had already been released. Walsh was not included in the resolution. In addition to Walsh, Hart and O'Connor have been released. Thus two of the four are at liberty. What about the other two? I will state the facts, and gentlemen can draw their own inferences. As regards McEnery and O'Mahoney, the British Government has said to them, "We will open your prison doors, and you may go right back to America."

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I do not want to interrupt the gentleman——

Mr. ORTH. I do not wish any interruption. I state what the record will sustain.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. The interruption would be worthy your consideration, but you will not listen.

Mr. ORTH. I want this House to know the exact condition of things before it votes to discharge the Committee on Foreign Affairs and take up the resolution calling upon the President to make a demand with regard to four persons, two of whom are already at liberty. I do not express any opinion as to whether these men to whom liberty has been offered on condition of their coming at once to this country ought to accept it; that is another question and is a matter resting entirely in their own discretion. I am stating the fact that the British Government has said to Mahoney and McEnery, "We will open the prison-doors, and you may go back to America on the first steamer." It seems to me that if I were wrongfully and unjustly imprisoned I should refuse a conditional release. I would stay in prison rather than take my liberty on that condition. But I am stating the facts to the House and to the country.

Again, on the 23d of January, eight days before the House adopted the resolution I have had read at the Clerk's desk, this House, upon the motion of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX,] adopted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States, if not incompatible with the public service, be requested to communicate to this House all correspondence with the British Government on file in the State Department with reference to the case of D. H. O'Connor, a citizen of the United States, now imprisoned in Ireland.

After the House had adopted the general resolution already referred to, embracing all American citizens imprisoned, the Committee on Foreign Affairs reported this resolution to the House with recommendation that it lie on the table. The report is indorsed upon the resolution, and reads:

The Committee on Foreign Affairs have had this resolution under consideration, and instructed me to report the same to the House with a recommendation that the same be laid on the table. GODLOVE S. ORTH

Why? Because the D. H. O'Connor therein named is one of the persons embraced in the resolution to which I have referred, namely, "all American citizens." But the House, instead of agreeing to the report of the committee, recommitted the resolution, with instructions that in addition to the case of O'Connor the committee should also inquire with reference to the cases of Michael Hart, of Lawrence, Massachusetts; H. O'Mahoney, of Buffalo, New York, and John McEnery, citizens of the United States. Were they not all embraced in the general resolution that the President should inquire with regard to all imprisoned Americans? Undoubtedly they were.

Your committee has not made a formal report upon that resolution and instructions, and I will tell you why. In the first place, they were all embraced in the general resolution. In the second place, we were constantly engaged in conference with the State Department, which was in almost daily correspondence with our representative in Great Britain in regard to procuring the release of these identical prisoners named here. I hold in my hand, Mr. Speaker, a document printed for the use of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, but which has long since been made public, containing correspondence between the committee and the Secretary of State, showing our diligence in this matter. I furnished the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROBINSON] with a copy, and hence he cannot be ignorant of its contents and of the work of this committee; yet with all this information before him he introduced into this House a resolution to discharge the committee and bring up this discussion again. Why, sir, I will not refer to any gentleman in particular; but somehow or other it appears to me that there are some gentlemen more solicitous about the Irish in Brooklyn than the Irish in Ireland. [Laughter.]

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. That is not so.

Mr. ORTH. I did not say that was the case with the gentleman from New York. There is the work of your committee under this resolution, showing that we have been diligent day after day and week after week in obtaining from the Department of State information upon one of the most intricate and delicate questions that have entered into the diplomacy of this Government since the close of the war.

The American Government had questions of this kind to deal with during the war for the suppression of the rebellion. The Government would occasionally get hold of a British subject suspected of complicity with the rebellion, and put him in jail; the writ of habeas corpus having been suspended, Great Britain would make complaint, and we released the British subject when we saw fit to do so. We must not forget our own history in the discussion of this question. The archives of the State Department will bear me out in saying that not a day nor an hour has been lost in attempting to assert the rights of American citizenship against the operations of the "coercion act" in England. We have not been derelict in our duty; the State Department and the Executive have not been derelict in their duty. Yet it is proposed to bring before you (because if the committee be discharged the resolution will be before you) a resolution to do—what? To demand the release of two parties already released, and the release of two others concerning whom this House has not the evidence requisite for intelligent action. Can any member of the House rise in his place and say that he knows McEnery to be an American citizen?

I pause for a reply. And yet if you discharge the committee you will be called upon to vote for a resolution instructing the President to demand the release of McEnery. Suppose Great Britain should refuse your demand? What then? Have you thought of that. Will you "burn London?" Or will you meekly recede from your demand? When one nation makes a demand of another it must be prepared to take the consequences of a refusal of that demand; and that is the question you have before you to-day; and, sir, before its importance your election cases and your tariff commissions sink into utter insignificance.

Now, then, no member has told me that McEnery is an American citizen. Our committee has been trying for the last six weeks to ascertain the fact, if possible, and we have failed to make such discovery.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. You have been twelve months at one case.

Mr. ORTH. I will come to that case in a half minute and I will comment on it. It is the case of O'Mahoney, doubtless, to which the gentleman refers. I believe he was at one time a resident of Buffalo, and if the honorable gentleman representing the Buffalo district is in his seat I wish to ask whether he knows O'Mahoney. I do not see him now in his seat, and hence pass on.

Several MEMBERS. He is not here.

Mr. ORTH. You are called on to pass a resolution instructing the President to demand the trial or release of O'Mahoney. Is there a single member within the sound of my voice who can tell you the precise status of O'Mahoney? Can either of the gentlemen from New York tell us his status to-day? Will they affirm on their own knowledge or on reliable information that O'Mahoney at the time of his arrest was bona fide an American citizen and entitled to the protection of the American Government? At the time of his arrest he was holding an office in Great Britain under the authority of British law. You say he is an American citizen in whose behalf we must proceed. I wish you now to listen to the report made by Mr. Brooks, our consul at Cork in 1881, in reference to Mr. O'Mahoney. I ask the Clerk to read it. I ask gentlemen, in view of the facts stated in that consular report, whether they are willing to instruct the President to demand, in the absence of further investigation and further testimony, the release of O'Mahoney, who held office under the British Government the very day he was arrested.

The Clerk read as follows:

[Inclosure 23 in No. 331.]

Mr. Brooks to Mr. Badeau.

UNITED STATES CONSULATE,
Cork, Ireland, June 22, 1881.

SIR: In the matter of the application of Henry O'Mahoney, political prisoner, now in Her Majesty's jail at Limerick, in this consular district, for assistance or protection, based upon the claim that he is a citizen of the United States, I have to report the following additional facts:

On Tuesday, the 21st instant, with the permission of F. McG. Eagar, esq., governor of the prison, I had a very lengthy interview with O'Mahoney in the governor's office. I had previously intimated in a personal way to Mr. Macarthy, president magistrate at Limerick, the time and purpose of this interview, and had invited him to be present at it as a representative of Her Majesty's Government. He was not present, however, until the interview had been nearly concluded.

The purport of O'Mahoney's statements was, in brief, as follows:

He was discharged from the United States Navy in the fall of 1865, and had lost his discharge papers. Subsequent to his discharge he remained in the United States, living in Kansas, Missouri, and the Mississippi Valley until 1874, when he returned to Ireland. During this period, in 1866, he made application to the county court, Caddo Parish, Shreveport, Louisiana, for his naturalization papers, basing his application upon his service in the Navy. The papers were not issued, the reason for which failure to issue he did not state.

His return to Ireland in 1874 was occasioned by the "hard times" then prevailing in the United States, and because he had lost money by bank failures as well as failures of contractors for whom he had worked as a sub-contractor in the erection of saw-mills. He remained in Ireland two years, and returned again to the United States in 1876, but returned to Ireland soon after. He was married in Ireland in 1875, and in October of that year obtained a license under the local laws to keep a "public house;" i. e., as a retailer of liquors, spirits, &c. This house and license his wife has kept and used at Ballydehob ever since, and still keeps and enjoys the same. In 1879 he returned to the United States and went to Lockport, New York, and from thence to Buffalo.

In February, 1880, he applied for and obtained naturalization papers in Lockport, a copy of the certificate of which was forwarded inclosed in my dispatch to you under date of June 15, instant.

In January, 1881, he returned to Ireland, for the purpose, as he most emphatically declared, of disposing of his property in Ballydehob and going with his family back to Lockport, where, he says, he now owns a small property. After his last arrival at Ballydehob he took part in the then prevailing political agitation, and being a rate-payer, (tax-payer and voter,) was urged by his neighbors to stand as a candidate for poor-law guardian. He objected to this, but was finally duly nominated, elected, and qualified, after which he entered upon and discharged the duties of his office up to the time of his arrest and incarceration.

He added that he knew the office of poor-law guardian was one of important trust, if not of emolument, and that the discharge of its duties involved the assessment and levy of taxes (striking rates) and the practical administration or execution of the laws of this country.

To the question, "What demand or claim do you wish to prefer or ask of the United States Government?" he answered, "I demand and claim protection the same as the British Government gave to its subjects in New York during the draft riots in the late war. I am an American citizen, and want to get out of this country. I want a fair trial; I want justice and a speedy trial, and I want the protection of the American Government to secure these things to me."

To the further question, "Suppose the British Government were to permit your release from prison upon condition of your immediate return to the United States, would you accept such terms?" he replied, "I cannot promise that, for it would take a year to close up my affairs here and sell out my property; but I do not want to stay in this country, and am willing and anxious to leave it as soon as I can."

O'Mahoney further explained that the foregoing statement of dates or years may not be technically correct, and that he gave it from memory, to the best of his recollection and belief.

In conclusion he repeated his request for the immediate interference of the United States authorities in his behalf.

To conclude the record in O'Mahoney's case it is necessary to state that he stands committed under the so-called "coercion act" as a suspect, on suspicion of having been implicated in an assault with fire-arms, with intent to kill, upon Mr. George Henry Swanton, justice of the peace, Gortnagrough, Ballydehob.

I have to add that before I left the prison I was informed that two or more prisoners were anxious to see me for the purpose of preferring their claims, similar to those of O'Mahoney's. In response to this information, I declared my willingness to take cognizance of their cases upon proper application in due form.

As I have received no instructions up to date in O'Mahoney's case from the legation or other source, I shall, unless otherwise directed, permit the matter to drop here.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

E. P. BROOKS, Consul, &c.

Mr. ORTH. Now, I want the House to bear in mind one or two remarkable facts connected with the case of O'Mahoney. And even in this case of O'Mahoney the British Government has said they will open his prison doors and let him go back to Lockport or Buffalo or anywhere he wants to go, if he will only leave Ireland and not return during the present Irish troubles.

In 1874 he went to Ireland. He remained there, married, his wife rented a hotel, took out a license, and in 1879, when these troubles were commencing in Ireland, he came over to this country and became naturalized in 1880. He returned to Ireland, with his naturalization papers in his pocket, became a candidate for office under the British Crown, was elected, and accepted that office, entered upon its duties, and was discharging the duties of that office when arrested upon suspicion of having been engaged in killing a man.

Without any information whatever you are now called upon, if you follow the lead of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. ROBINSON,] to vote that the President shall demand the release of O'Mahoney. I do not think you are going to do it. I discharge my duty to this House when I bring these facts before it, and the House will discharge its duty, in my judgment, when it will lay this resolution promptly upon the table, unless it should be withdrawn by its mover; and, Mr. Speaker, when the debate is closed I shall claim the floor for the purpose of moving to lay it upon the table.

This troublesome question, Mr. Speaker, is being practically settled by the firm and dignified course of the President under our former resolution. He is discharging his duty honestly and faithfully under said resolution—a resolution which embraces "all American citizens." Do you want any more? Why warn us about A, B, and C? Why have any special case when they are all embraced under the general resolution? There is no reason for it whatever, except to keep up a turmoil and excitement more for the benefit or delectation of certain Irishmen in Brooklyn than for any practical good it will accomplish for those who are alleged to be unjustly deprived of their liberty.

I said a while ago, Mr. Speaker, that American citizenship must be used as a shield and not as a sword. I made that statement with reference to this man O'Mahoney. He is using his citizenship in what manner? Why, by seeking its protection when he gets into trouble? But how does his citizenship claim appear in connection with the fact that he has returned to his mother country, gone apparently into permanent business there; becomes a candidate for office, was elected, and held the office, discharged its duties, put the emoluments of his office into his pocket, and when trouble comes hauls out his naturalization papers. When peace exists in Ireland he uses his hotel license; when troubles come—and come partly through his instrumentality—then he uses his "papers."

I simply throw out the statement for the purpose of impressing upon the House the necessity of acting with caution in a grave question of this kind. Your committee, in the prosecution of this investigation, have moved cautiously all through the case, knowing the gravity of the situation.

Why should we break down the position that Secretary Seward took during our troubles in the time of the rebellion? I need not say to this House that the naturalized foreigners never had a truer or a better friend in favor of their American citizenship than Mr. Seward. He says here in 1866, in a dispatch to Minister Adams, and I ask attention to this:

It may be expected that some of our Irish-born naturalized citizens who are now sojourning or traveling in Ireland should be arrested on complaint of complicity in seditious proceedings. The situation will, for a time, necessarily become inconvenient and embarassing. I know of no way in which you can meet it more properly than by pursuing the course which you have indicated. Americans, whether native born or naturalized, owe submission to the same laws in Great Britain as British subjects while residing there and enjoying the protection of that government. We applied the converse of this principle to British subjects who were sojourning or traveling in the United States during the late rebellion.

That is the language of a warm friend of the naturalized American. Now suppose you make your demand upon the British Government, what would be the result? Lord Granville would refer you to that part of the diplomatic history of our country during the rebellion when we imprisoned British subjects and held them under a suspension of the habeas corpus until we saw fit to release them. You do not want to place yourselves in a position where you are successfully confronted by the principles laid down by our Government in the time of its trouble. The President of the United States is acting carefully, cautiously, and intelligently in this matter, and he deserves the commendations of the American Congress, instead of having here, every week or two, this scene to go out to the country, which leads to false impressions and succeeds only in getting the country into commotion. There is no occasion for it. The President is acting prudently in the matter, and the results will come in time.

And further, Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that I feel authorized in making the statement in regard to McEnery that there are good reasons for the belief that within a short time he will secure his unconditional release; but as to O'Mahoney, that presents a case surrounded by greater difficulties. But if we intend to follow him with the flag and afford him our protection, then let me state to the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROBINSON] that O'Mahoney is embraced in the general release, and no such resolution is necessary in his case. I submit that from the official facts before us, and which the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROBINSON] had an opportunity of reading, because I placed the pamphlet in his hands at least two weeks ago, there is no need for precipitancy; and with these official facts there is also the knowledge that if O'Mahoney was an American citizen there is a question at least worthy of consideration whether, by permanent residence in Ireland and accepting and performing official function as a public officer under British law, he has not by his own acts forfeited his American citizenship. He has not resided in this country sixty days since his naturalization; went abroad, engaged in business, and held office, and yet you are going to demand of the British Government for him that he be unconditionally released.

Let him show by his works that he appreciates his American citizenship. He was not traveling abroad as a gentleman of leisure or residing there temporarily as an American citizen. He was keeping a hotel under a license from the British Government. He was holding an office under the same government, a collector of the poor-rate taxes, and putting the emoluments in his pocket. He was suspected of killing a justice of the peace and imprisoned on account thereof.

Now you want to solemnly pass a resolution that this man is entitled to the active, energetic, and prompt co-operation of this Government in order to have him released. I think not.

I do not know that I have anything further to add to this matter. I recollect that in 1866, during the Fenian excitement, I had some little part in getting some of our Irish friends out of trouble. I stated here a moment ago that Great Britain would open the doors of the prison without delay if O'Mahoney would step aboard a ship at Queenstown and come to this country. I repeat that now. He could be released at once if he desired it. Now here is the way Secretary Seward looked at a similar state of facts in 1866 in a dispatch to Minister Adams with regard to a number of citizens in Irish jails:

Under these circumstances, you will be expected to suggest to Lord Clarendon the expediency of the exercise of clemency to the extent at least of releasing all of the American citizens, native or naturalized, who are in confinement upon the condition of their returning to the United States.

Secretary Seward, the firm, devoted friend of the naturalized citizen, who did more to secure the rights of naturalized citizens than any American official, suggested to the American minister at London to secure if possible the release of American citizens then imprisoned by promising they would come home, and suggested the exercise of his good offices in getting them out, stating:

While such a proceeding on the part of the British Government would seem to be an entirely safe one, it cannot be doubted that it would have a tranquilizing effect here.

I have presented the naked facts in this case as developed by official correspondence to this House. Before you take the action you are invited to take by the adoption of the resolution discharging our committee from the further consideration of the subject see that you are fully posted as to the facts we have presented and the consequences which may flow from such action. If you do so we shall be content, but the unanimous judgment, as I believe, of our committee is that this subject is now progressing satisfactorily, and the result will commend itself to the calm, deliberate judgment of the American people.

I now yield the balance of my time to my colleague on the committee, [Mr. DEUSTER.]

Mr. DEUSTER. Mr. Speaker, there can be no member upon the floor of this House more solicitous and anxious to see amplest protection afforded the naturalized citizen than I am. I looked upon my designation as a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs more as an evidence of a commendable desire to guarantee our naturalized citizens the fullest protection of their rights while abroad, by placing one of their own number upon the committee, than as a recognition of my own fitness. I agree with the honorable gentleman from New York [Mr. ROBINSON] in demanding speedy investigation into any cases arising in foreign countries in which the life, liberty, or safety of an American is at stake. I am also sorry to confess that I consider half of our treaties hardly worth the paper they were written upon; and in regard to one of them, the "naturalization treaty" with Germany, I have endeavored to secure the influence of Congress with the Executive to have it annulled, rather than disgrace our statute-books any longer, even if we can get nothing better in its place, because under it the most flagrant violations of the treaty were constantly occurring, and because it expatriated an American citizen for no better reason than two years' absence from the United States and temporary residence in Germany.

But in the present case I know that the committee is not at fault in not pushing this investigation more rapidly. The resolution, in accordance with usage, was referred to a sub-committee, and this sub-committee, before proceeding further, was in duty bound to ascertain, first, whether the Executive had complied with the plain provisions of the act of Congress of July 27, 1868, now section 2001 of the Revised Statutes, which reads as follows:

SEC. 2001. Whenever it is made known to the President that any citizen of the United States has been unjustly deprived of his liberty by or under the authority of any foreign government, it shall be the duty of the President forthwith to demand of that government the reasons of such imprisonment; and if it appears to be wrongful and in violation of the rights of American citizenship, the President shall forthwith demand the release of such citizen, and if the release so demanded is unreasonably delayed or refused, the President shall use such means, not amounting to acts of war, as he may think necessary and proper to obtain or effectuate the release; and all the facts and proceedings relative thereto shall as soon as practicable be communicated by the President to Congress.

A request was made for the official correspondence which had passed between the two governments, and it was not until a few days ago that it was submitted to the committee in printed form. It would be a manifest injustice now to deprive the whole committee of the opportunity to look into this matter and to report, if possible, such remedies for the future as may suggest themselves during their deliberation upon it. I hope the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROBINSON] will take a more favorable view of the matter and withdraw his resolution.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

Sundry messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, who also announced that the President had approved and signed a joint resolution of the following title:

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 197) making an appropriation to supply a deficiency in the appropriations for public printing and binding for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882.

AMERICAN CITIZENS IN BRITISH PRISONS.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin, rose.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. Will the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. DEUSTER] yield to me a portion of his time?

Mr. DEUSTER. I yield the gentleman from New York the balance of my time.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. If my colleague will reserve his time till I can be heard, I will then yield to the gentleman from New York what time he wants; but I desire to get in a statement before the House completely dissolves this afternoon.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. All I want is a few minutes to respond to what was said by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. ORTH.]

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. What we may say in this discussion or what we may do on this resolution may be of slight consequence or it may be of the utmost importance. I cast no imputation upon the intelligence of the House. But if any member here fancies that this is a mere moot debate, a mere speculative question upon which votes can be cast on this side or that with safety, I give as my opinion that it may turn out that a vote recorded on this resolution to-day may prove to be one of the most important given in the American Congress at its present session.

It matters little what may have been done in the past. I gladly accord to my friend from New York [Mr. ROBINSON] honesty and earnestness of purpose. I accord to him freely his share of the credit for the legislation placed upon the statute-book relative to the imprisonment of American citizens abroad, and I believe his efforts, as his colleague from New York [Mr. HEWITT] said the other day, "both in order and out of order and more out of order than in," have tended largely to bring this question to the front.

Sir, I believe the President and the State Department in this country and the foreign office in Great Britain realize the importance of this question, whether we do or not. I must assume, as I most sincerely believe, that our friends desire that these men be released and that they with us are working for that result in good faith. But administrations in Great Britain, like administrations in this country, contend with opposing parties whose greatest desire is sometimes to cripple, and, if possible, overthrow them.

I am accredited with no confidential knowledge to disclose here, but we may imagine parties in England watching every movement of the Gladstone government, and only too glad to have occasion for a pretense to raise the cry of partiality to American citizens over those of Great Britain; possibly to move a vote of want of confidence and overturn the existing government, which means remorseless war on Ireland. If I am allowed the expression, it may be barely possible that the existing government "is between the devil and the deep sea" on this very question, anxions to grant all we ask, yet compelled to move with circumspection lest it be unable to grant anything at all.

If that be so, then I beg the attention of gentlemen to the importance of the question and the delicacy of the diplomatic negotiations which may be passing through the sea while we stand talking here to-day. It matters little what an individual may do or think. It may matter little what a committee of this House may do; but it may be of vast importance how the American House of Representatives, as the direct organ of the American people, shall act on a resolution like this, when important and delicate negotiations are on foot, when practical results have been already achieved, and the final consummation is just within our reach. It is well to pause—and I think gentlemen on both sides of the House will agree with me—well to pause, I say, and consider whether the present is just the time to vote for a resolution couched in the language of demand and defiance to the British Government.

But, sir, we have been summoned as a committee to the bar of this House to show cause why a vote of censure, for it amounts to that, should not be pronounced upon us. The action of the committee may best be judged by what it has done. Whatever may have occurred before this resolution was referred to us we certainly cannot be blamed for. For what has transpired since within the scope of our jurisdiction we hold ourselves responsible; and we now invite the House to judge of our case as we shall present it, and to say whether we have acted discreetly and wisely. On the 16th of December last a resolution was introduced into the House by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX.] The committees of the House had not then been appointed. The Committee on Foreign Affairs of course had not been organized; and the resolution was informally referred to that committee for action when it should be appointed. The resolution was as follows:

Resolved, That the President be requested to obtain a list of all American citizens, naturalized or native-born, under arrest or imprisonment by authority of the British Government, with a statement of the cause or causes of such arrest and imprisonment, and especially such of said citizens as may have been thus arrested and imprisoned under the suspension of the habeas corpus in Ireland; and, if not incompatible with the public interest, that he communicate such information, when received, to this House, together with all correspondence now on file in the Department of State relating to any existing arrest and imprisonment of citizens as aforesaid.

On the 21st of December the committees of the House were appointed. On the 10th of January the Committee on Foreign Affairs organized, and the above resolution was referred to a sub-committee, of which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ORTH] was chairman. On the 26th of January, after the matter had been discussed in committee, and it had been counseled that the sub-committee should confer with the Department of State, the chairman of that committee, under instructions from the general committee, reported the resolution to the House. It was discussed on that day by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. ROBINSON]—fully discussed. All the history of this question was gone into, and all matters of legislation pertaining to it were exhaustively discussed. It was also most ably discussed by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX.] Ample time was given, by favor of the committee, to both those gentlemen. It went over till the 31st of January, when it came up as unfinished business, and again it was discussed by the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. DUNNELL,] by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. ORTH,] by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. ROBINSON,] and by the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ROBESON,] and I believe others. Ample time was again given for discussion, and the resolution was unanimously adopted by the House.

We then thought and still think that that resolution was broad enough to cover every possible case. The resolution was adopted on the 31st of January, and went immediately to the President. What further control had our committee over that? On the 24th of January the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] introduced the resolution upon which we are called upon to report. It was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. As was stated in the House, we regarded it as superfluous. It had been covered by the broader resolution already adopted and sent to the President. On the 15th of February the resolution was reported to the House by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. ORTH,] that it do lie on the table. This was opposed, and my friend from New York [Mr. ROBINSON] again discussed the question. The distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] proposed his amendment, which was ruled out of order by the Speaker as not germane. The Committee on Foreign Affairs then asked the House to adopt the resolution then and there if it was deemed material by anybody. That was no lack of diligence. We asked to send it to the President. Three members of the committee at least appealed to the House to adopt it.

The gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX,] after some explanation, offered his amendment again, with the motion to recommit with instructions, and the chairman of the sub-committee [Mr. ORTH] said to the House that he hoped the amendment would be adopted, and it was adopted. That is the resolution which is now before our committee, and the motion is now made to discharge the committee from its further consideration, and to bring it before the House. Let us see what that resolution really is. It reads:

Resolved, That the President of the United States, if not incompatible with the public service, be requested to communicate to this House all correspondence with the British Government on file in the State Department with reference to the case of D. H. O'Connor, a citizen of the United States now imprisoned in Ireland.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] moved to recommit the resolution, and, when asked by the Speaker if he insisted upon his motion, replied:

I do, with instructions to insert at the end of the present resolution the following, which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

"And also in the cases of reference to Michael Hart, of Lawrence, Massachusetts; H. O'Mahoney, of Buffalo, New York; and John McEnery, citizens of the United States, now imprisoned in Ireland, with instructions to request the President of the United States to demand of the British Government the prompt trial of these citizens or their prompt release.

What instructions and to whom? Instructions to the Committee on Foreign Affairs? What does it instruct the Committee on Foreign Affairs to do? Nothing, except to add at the end of the resolution the amendment proposed. When that is done it becomes a part of and is embodied in the original resolution. Who then does it instruct? Why, sir, it instructs the President, if not incompatible with the public service, to furnish this information, and also to instruct himself to request himself to demand the prompt trial or prompt release of these American citizens. Read it. It is that or it is nothing.

Mr. COX, of New York. The Committee on Foreign Affairs was instructed.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. I beg pardon. The committee was instructed to add that to the original resolution, and when added, as the gentleman will see on reading the original and the amendment, it instructs the President to make this demand instead of instructing the committee to request him to make it.

Mr. COX, of New York. The committee has not obeyed the instructions.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. I will come to that. And we will see why.

Mr. COX, of New York. I would like to hear it.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. This was on the 14th of February. On the 2d day of March this discussion broke out again in the general debate on the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill and continued for two days. The point seemed to be not so much the release of the prisoners in Ireland as to settle the question, if possible, which party in this country had done the most in the past for the Irish citizen. I make no criticism on that discussion. It was both able and interesting. I only note the fact that it ran for two days and finally ran into the five-minute debate on the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill. Certainly the House has had ample opportunity to discuss this question.

It then rested till Saturday last, when it came up again in the absence of the majority of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. DUNNELL,] one of its members, explained the position of the committee. Yet the matter was pressed, and notice of this motion given to discharge the committee from the further consideration of the resolution and bring it before the House.

Now, we take no exception to this. We simply note in passing that it was the understanding that we should keep the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX,] and the gentleman from New York, [Mr. ROBINSON,] advised in regard to the state of negotiations, so far as we properly could. Neither of those gentlemen will complain that we did not carry out that agreement faithfully, and I must believe there has been misapprehension somewhere. This is the history of the question in the open House.

Now, let us see what has been done by the committee and by the State Department. On the 22d day of October Dennis O'Connor was arrested and imprisoned in Ireland. On the 10th day of November his brother in Baltimore wrote to the Secretary of State, Mr. Blaine, stating the facts in regard to the incarceration of Dennis O'Connor, and on the very next day the Secretary wrote to Mr. Lowell, requesting him to bring the question of the arrest to the attention of the British Government.

On the 4th day of February Lord Granville replies, regretting that he cannot release him. This is five days after the first resolution was adopted by the House. I take it the Committee on Foreign Affairs were not authorized to do anything until they got this general resolution before them. And then all they had to do was to report it to the House for the House to adopt and send to the President. I repeat, in five days after the adoption of that resolution Granville replies that he regrets that he cannot release O'Connor.

Now, let us take the history of the case chronologically. January 31, as I say, the House adopted the resolution. February 10 it was transmitted by Mr. Frelinghuysen to Mr. Lowell, and he was asked to comply with its terms with as little delay as possible. February 24 Mr. Lowell replies that the resolution calls for the names of all persons arrested, native and foreign born, and that it is so comprehensive he fears much time must elapse before he can answer.

March 3 Mr. Frelinghuysen cables Mr. Lowell to use all due diligence, especially as to Hart and McSweeney, and report by cable. There was not much negligence in that, not much delay there.

March 4 Mr. Lowell cables as to Hart and McSweeney. The same day the Secretary cables that as to O'Connor, Hart, McSweeney and Dalton—mark the language—the President hopes that without discussion the lord-lieutenant of Ireland will use his discretion under the law to order prompt trials in these cases.

Was not that going as far as diplomatic courtesy between friendly nations would permit; was it not about as direct and urgent as it well could be, and was it not far more effective than to have made some defiant demand by the Executive or House of Representatives in order to vaunt ourselves in the face of England? The result shows that it was.

What was that result? This was on the 4th of March. On the 7th of March Mr. Lowell cables that the dispatch has been communicated to Lord Granville, who informs him it will have immediate attention. On the 16th of March Mr. Frelinghuysen cables that the President does not wish to appear unreasonable, but it would relieve him if he were able to acquaint Congress of the granting of his request without delay. Was there any shrinking from duty, either on the part of the President or the Department of State here? What was the result again? The urgent, almost imperative, request was sent March 16. On the 4th of April the President sends to this House his message conveying the report of the Secretary of State, in which the whole matter is summed up. Here it is:

To the President:

The Secretary of State, to whom was referred the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 31st of January last, requesting the President "to obtain a list of all American citizens, naturalized or native-born, under arrest or imprisonment by authority of the British Government, with a statement of the cause or causes of such arrest and imprisonment, and especially such of said citizens as may have been thus arrested and imprisoned under the suspension of the habeas corpus in Ireland, and, if not incompatible with the public interest, that he communicate such information, when received, to this House, together with all correspondence now on file in the Department of State relating to any existing arrest and imprisonment of citizens as aforesaid," has the honor to inform the President, in part response to this request of the House of Representatives, that for some time past active negotiations have been carried on between the two governments. These negotiations have been conducted in a spirit of entire friendship, and it affords the Secretary of State pleasure to acquaint the President that on the 2d instant information was received by the Department of State that all the American citizens held as prisoners in Ireland had been released except three; and that since that date the further information has reached him that O'Connor, Hart, Walsh, Dalton, and White are not now in prison. The negotiations are still being conducted with a view to the release of the remaining prisoners, and the hope is entertained that a result will be reached satisfactory and honorable alike to both governments.

Respectfully submitted.

FREDK. T. FRELINGHUYSEN.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, April 4, 1882.

If the Committee on Foreign Affairs were charged with anything, if the Department of State had any duty, if the President had any obligation resting upon him, if there was any purpose worthy of the action of this House, it was the practical release of the countrymen of my friend Mr. ROBINSON from the prison-houses of Ireland. Two of the four embraced in this resolution have been released; and when I tell my friends from New York [Mr. COX and Mr. ROBINSON] that, so far as we are permitted to report from the State Department, these negotiations are still going on by cable dispatches, and that if we are given even until next week our committee hope to be able to report back the resolution, with the intelligence that the entire number of imprisoned American citizens have been released, we are met in the House by a resolution that we be discharged and the President be ordered and directed to incontinently slap England in the face and do something worthy of the American eagle! The only question is whether it is wise, in the present advanced state of our negotiations, to do this.

Now, what is the last intelligence? I may say that while the relations of our committee with the State Department are at least quasi-confidential, and nothing from them should be stated in open House, the New York Tribune of last Sunday contains a dispatch of the day before from Mr. Smalley, its London correspondent, portions of which I will read to show the conditions of those negotiations on Friday last, four days ago:

Mr. Lowell again urged Mr. Forster to waive the condition that the Irish-American suspects shall leave the country.

My friend [Mr. ROBINSON] in his earnestness, his honesty, and his zeal, I doubt not would say that if a man is innocent he has a right to stay anywhere; but the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ORTH] has read from the diplomatic correspondence of 1866, showing that Mr. Seward, then at the head of the State Department, inaugurated these conditions and begged as a favor of the Government of Great Britain that the prisoners be released on the exact conditions that they should return home. Not only in one case, but two, three, four, five cases in which we asked for a conditional release and gladly accepted it.

In 1861, when Great Britain demanded the release of a prisoner of war confined by our Government, it was granted, but the released prisoner was at least in one case put under $2,500 bonds to obey the laws and preserve allegiance to the United States.

My friend here will say that under the legislation of 1868 that policy has been modified; that by the enactment of Congress the President is required to demand the release of prisoners; but would it be strange if Great Britain pleaded the precedent? And yet I am able to say to my friend, at least by what I will read presently, that no such condition has been accepted by our Government; yet gentlemen cannot fail to see how embarrassing the situation is or may be. Mr. Smalley's dispatch reads as follows:

[By cable to the Tribune.]

LONDON, April 22.

The continuous pressure upon the British Government during the week on behalf of the Irish-American suspects leaves the situation nearly unchanged. Statements published to-day on this subject are inaccurate in some particulars, although it is true that an interview occurred yesterday—between Mr. Lowell and Mr. Forster. Mr. Lowell again urged Mr. Forster to waive the condition precedent to their release.

That was last Friday—

The gentleman from Brooklyn would ask nothing more than that. Let me read it again:

Mr. Lowell again urged Mr. Forster to waive the condition precedent to their release that the suspects shall leave the country, on which condition long since release was offered to them, although this fact seems to be imperfectly known here. Mr. Forster, though most desirous to grant the liberation of the suspects, does not see his way to their unconditional discharge.

Now this was on Friday last, and on Saturday this resolution was introduced in the House.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I did not then know the facts the gentleman now states.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. I thank the gentleman for this frank avowal. It is what we might expect, and it shows the importance of first ascertaining the facts through proper channels. I know there can be no difference—certainly there can be no feeling—between the two gentlemen from New York, the committee, and the rest of the House. The thing we all want is to open the prison door and set the innocent free. The dispatch says further:

The ministers consider themselves unable to grant their unconditional liberation while the existing correspondence which the ministers stand pledged to publish leaves it doubtful on what grounds the American Government claims such release. They consider, further, that unconditional release, after the refusal of the suspects to leave the country, would be equivalent to an implicit permission for dangerous men to remain in the country and resume their mischievous practices. The government in such case would find itself in the dilemma either to rearrest the suspects and renew the diplomatic difficulties or to tolerate whatever the Irish-Americans might choose to undertake. Fresh claims to American citizenship continue to be presented, including those of two suspects who have been imprisoned and remained silent for months.

The pertinacity of the American Government and the unwillingness to accept conditions of release here deemed reasonable and even liberal undoubtedly embarrass the ministry, who find themselves obliged to deal simultaneously with Mr. Lowell's iterated urgent applications and the incessant demands in Parliament for information which, pending the negotiations, cannot prudently be given.

"The pertinacity of the American Government." And yet we are told that the Government is not pertinacious. On this side we have the House of Representatives clamoring for all the details of this negotiation, and on that they have the House of Commons clamoring, while, as we have repeatedly assured gentlemen these negotiations are, as we surely hope, being brought to amicable and satisfactory conclusions.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there can be no difference on the part of the House in regard to the practical point to be accomplished. I am gratified to believe, for once at least, we can rise above partisan and personal feeling here, and do an act of justice to men who ask relief and pray for the protection of our Government. Why, sir, sympathy with Ireland belongs to no party. Sympathy of that kind is born of God and ingrained in humanity. If we are at liberty to discuss that question here, if it were wise to do it, I think you would find that party and those gentlemen who have sympathized with the oppressed everywhere do sympathize with Ireland in her present distress. They could not help it if they would. It is not for me to utter any word here which, even though it were regarded of sufficient importance to be considered anywhere, would irritate in a time like this; but I can say what England's philosophers, historians, poets, and statesmen have said in the past; and I can do it without offense. Speaking in that line, I can but give expression to the belief that the radical difficulty with Ireland to-day is that for five centuries the attempt has been made, if I may not say by brute force, at least by physical might and power alone, to enslave a people whom God never made for slaves. [Applause.]

Even the Norman in his conquest could not absorb the dauntless spirit of the Irishman, but Ireland absorbed and assimilated the Norman. Who shall conquer and stamp out the conquerors? We would be less than human if in passing over the rough and bloody track of Ireland's history our hearts were not stirred to the profoundest depths to-day. The same policy—as Americans we must regard it a mistaken policy—which has been pursued since the fourteenth century culminates in the nineteenth, and Ireland under the domination of one of the leading powers of earth is in anarchy. This is not exceptional but normal. Surely if the crushing weight of power could tranquilize her she should long ere this have been at peace.

There has been but one policy for Ireland, whenever she dared to hold up her head and claim her God-given rights, since the fourteenth century; since Malby, the president of Connaught, boasted that he had subdued her people; that he consumed them with fire and sword; that he spared neither old nor young; that he entered their mountains and burned all their corn-houses; that he drove them forth in frost and rain; and that they were submissive enough then. Only one policy, Mr. Speaker, since under Elizabeth and James the First Ireland was entered only to be persecuted, when the lord deputy of Ireland declared that famine must consume the Irish and that hunger was more effective than the sword, and boasted that he had ravaged the banks of the Lough even to within four miles of Dungannon, and had killed man, woman, and child, horse and beast, and whatever could be found. Only one policy, since Ireland stretched forth her famished arms to Cromwell, hoping and pleading for mercy and relief, and was answered by confiscation of her lands, by sack and ruin of her cities, her homes given to the soldiery and her people driven west of the Shannon, into the bogs and moorland and mountains of the five western counties; ordered to assemble there by the 1st of May, and forbidden to appear within two miles of the Shannon or four miles of the sea; the homeless, houseless, fever-stricken, and famished people turned out to die, with no shelter above them but the vault of heaven, the very woes of death wafted back upon them by the chill-breath of ocean breezes. Surely Ireland should have been subdued and peaceable if Cromwell's might could subdue her.

No, Mr. Speaker, we on this side of the House are not altogether ignorant of the history, the wrongs, and sufferings of Ireland, whether it be in the mere glimpse of events I have referred to or in the famine of 1830, 1848, and 1879. We do not and we cannot forget these things, and we offer England no offense to-day when we allude to them. Gladstone, only in 1880, told us that eviction was a "sentence of starvation." We must be pardoned for not understanding in America how prosperity can come, how peace can be expected under a system discouraging the tenant from all improvements by increasing rent in proportion to the improvements he makes at his own expense, and the horrors of eviction grow upon us like the specters of the night. We do not and we cannot forget the "crowbar brigade," when seven hundred persons were driven out into the storm, when the roofs were pulled from over their heads, when fever-stricken patients were not even spared, but carried out into the night-air to die!

Is there a just God; and can peace come on such terms? America cannot forget, if she would, when in 1848 Lord Hertford collected $130,000 rent from his famishing tenants. A. T. Stewart, our merchant prince, freighted a ship with provisions at a cost of $25,000 and sent her sailing forth to Ireland on her God-given mission of mercy! How can we fail to feel when we are assured that men, women, and children subsist from April to September in famine years upon potatoes alone, without one particle of bread or milk? The poorest of our laborers have three meat meals a week; Ireland's laborers even now have three meat meals a year! Christmas, Easter, and Michaelmas! Mr. Doherty once said that the people of Ireland were no better fed than the beasts that browse on the fields. If we must sympathize with Ireland, we cannot blame her sons, who have tasted the sweets of American liberty, if they sympathize with her also. No, Mr. Speaker, Ireland may be crushed again under the red hoofs of relentless war, but peace will never come to her through that storm cloud. Starve her no more, but give her small holdings of land. Gratify the Irishman's love of home, if he can secure but five acres of land. Root him to his own soil and he will grow and flourish. Let him feel that he has an interest in his native isle, and he will work for her prosperity and fight for her defense. Then, through just and equal laws, humanely administered and willingly obeyed, Ireland shall enjoy that peace which she has never known, and the blessing of constitutional law shall be hers.

Mr. Speaker, I was compelled to speak thus or not speak at all. But I need not remind the House that Great Britain is our neighbor in the great family of nations, and that however much we may differ from her in the management of her domestic concerns, it is not ours to interfere if we could. We know our responsibilities and we respect her rights. We do not forget our common lineage, or that we have drank from her fountain of literature and law. Our commercial relations are vaster with her than with any other nation of the earth. We know our treaty obligations and what all the conditions of peace with a friendly nation require. While we remember these things to heed them, so too do we remember what should be Ireland's glory. Her genius lights up every page of literature, stands out in history, poetry, and art; her orators have stirred the world, while Irish valor flashes in the vanguard of every war waged for the rights of man. As a government we cannot interfere between England and Ireland. We can only hope, and register that hope here to-day, that, through wise counsel and wise statesmanship and mutual forbearance, that peace and prosperity which so now bless our favored land may shed its benign influence over unhappy Ireland, and that the bright Emerald Isle may emerge from her long night of darkness and distress. [Applause.]

Mr. DE MOTTE rose.

Mr. COX, of New York. I desire to say, Mr. Speaker, in response to what has fallen——

Mr. BLOUNT. I would like to ask, Mr. Speaker, how much time the gentleman from Wisconsin has remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. MILLS in the chair.) The gentleman has fifteen minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. COX, of New York. The gentleman from Wisconsin, I understand, has yielded the floor to me. I only want about five minutes. If, however, the gentleman from Indiana desires to proceed I will yield to him.

Mr. DE MOTTE. Mr. Speaker, I think I appreciate the gravity of the question which we are discussing. I think also that I appreciate the importance of the vote which we will be called upon soon to cast on this question, and therefore, while I would not criticise the Committee on Foreign Affairs, I feel as if we had not been fairly dealt with in everything connected with this subject.

We are told that if this man O'Mahoney is a citizen at all he is but very little a citizen. I wanted to say, sir, that I recognize no grade in citizenship. The man who is a citizen of this Government for one minute is as much entitled to consideration from the Government and from all the various departments of the Government as the man who is born here and grown to manhood under our flag and who has spent all his days upon our soil. There can be no distinction between them. The very moment he has ceased taking the oath of allegiance to the country there attaches to him everything which dignifies a citizen of the American Republic. And while this is true, it is also true that the duties and the obligations of the nation are as much due to him as they are to every other citizen, no matter who he may be. Again, we were told that we are asked to judge upon this question with only one-tenth of the facts before us which were before the Committee on Foreign Affairs. Why is it that we are called upon to judge if the committee have not given us everything they have that bears upon the subject?

Mr. ORTH. Will my colleague yield for a reply?

Mr. DE MOTTE. No, sir; I cannot yield. I am simply stating the facts as I have understood them from my colleague.

Mr. ORTH. I can explain to the gentleman the meaning of that statement. There were many facts before the committee that are not yet determined.

Mr. DE MOTTE. I refer now to the question of citizenship. The gentleman has stated, as I understood him, that we were asked to determine the question here presented with only one-tenth of the matter which the committee have had. I am aware of the fact that the committee have doubtless had information before them which has not been communicated to the House. I am aware of the fact that there are many things which perhaps may not properly be stated to the House, but I am not aware that there can be anything in the possession of that committee which we are not entitled to have, if it relates to the question of whether this man is a citizen of the United States or not.

Mr. ORTH. If the gentleman is correct in his conclusion why is it that the very language of the resolution itself, and of all other resolutions of a similar character, states in the preamble that the President shall communicate such information "if not incompatible with the public interests?" Now, my colleague must recognize the fact that it is not at all times compatible with public interests to give information touching the diplomatic affairs of the Government to other nations.

Mr. DE MOTTE. I know all that. I recognize the justice of what the gentleman says; but is there anything incompatible with the public interests in telling this House everything that is known by the committee as to whether this man O'Mahoney is a citizen of the United States or not? That is simply what I ask, and I suppose that I must have misunderstood my colleague, for I certainly understood him to say that we did not have all of the facts which the committee had in reference to the question of citizenship.

Now, I say in all justice to the House, when we are called upon to act on this or similar questions the information should be laid before us. I do not believe that it would be wise or prudent, perhaps, that they should give under the circumstances all of the information which has come before them upon the general question; but we are entitled to everything that bears upon the simple fact of whether he is a citizen or not. If there be other facts about his citizenship let us have them, so that we may cast our votes with our eyes open and clearly understand what we are doing. That is what I rose for.

Mr. COX, of New York. Mr. Speaker, I do not see why both sides of the House should not concur in some proper resolution now on this subject, and especially with a view to public business in the future. I therefore propose as a substitute for the resolution of the gentleman from New York, and, if it be in order, as a substitute for my own resolution, which the committee reports back, a proposition which will obviate all of the troubles growing out of the O'Mahoney case or any other case. If Mr. O'Mahoney is not a citizen of the United States, or if by any action of his he has lost his citizenship, or if anybody else who may be now or hereafter imprisoned comes within or without the category of citizenship, I would like to reach him by a general resolution. Therefore I propose a resolution which I think will cover the whole case. It will end this matter; it will save sending it back to the Committee on Foreign Affairs again for any further action.

Resolved, That the President of the United States, if not incompatible with the public interest, be requested to communicate to this House any additional correspondence with the British Government on file in the State Department with reference to the alleged imprisonment of citizens of the United States in Ireland, and that the President be requested to continue his demand of the British Government for the prompt release or prompt trial of any citizens of the United States who may now remain unjustly imprisoned in that country.

I ask the House to adopt that resolution as a substitute for the resolution of the gentleman from the Brooklyn district of New York, [Mr. ROBINSON.]

Mr. KASSON. As a substitute for everything.

Mr. COX, of New York. As a substitute for everything. It gives the emphasis of the House and of our people to this demand.

Mr. ORTH. If this is offered as a substitute for the pending resolution of the gentleman from New York on my right, [Mr. ROBINSON,] I presume there will be no objection from any quarter to its being adopted.

Mr. COX, of New York. Let me say one word more.

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask the gentleman to have the resolution read from the Clerk's desk. I did not hear it distinctly.

Mr. COX, of New York. I will have it read in a moment. I am always very proud to hear my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. WILLIAMS] speak. I like to come upon this side of the House [Mr. COX was speaking from the Republican side of the House] to catch from his lips the burning eloquence with which he discusses these themes of personal freedom. I speak from this side of the House just now because I am in a compromising mood, and besides I lack that eloquent enthusiasm which he possesses. But when my friend from Wisconsin, who is my successor as chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, undertakes to eulogize the Gladstone administration, when he undertakes to say that our action may embarrass the government party in the British Commons, I say that no administration in England from the time of Lord Castlereagh to this time ever placed its iron heel so brutally and so cowardly upon the neck of Ireland as this Gladstone administration. Not content with arresting Davitt and Parnell and Dillon and O'Kelley, members of Parliament, and by a double cloture putting them within the bars, this Gladstone administration, forgetful of Naples and the grand brochure of the premier, arrested women, gave them in mercy twenty-odd hours of solitary confinement; and these were women of intelligence and purity. And is this the administration commended for our example?

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman allow me a moment? I think my friend must have misapprehended me. I quoted Mr. Gladstone's remarks of 1880, and I called attention to the fact that we were negotiating with the Gladstone government, and it might not be wise to do anything by our action here to-day which would prevent that government from consummating negotiations already on foot. If I went further, I stand corrected by my friend from New York; for that is all I intended.

Mr. COX, of New York. I presume my friend from Wisconsin will see in the report of his remarks that he needs just a little correction, not much, from me.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. I guess not much.

Mr. COX, of New York. All right. Only I say to him the Irish people in this country and in Ireland would welcome back as a harbinger of peace to Ireland the old, bitter, conservative Tory government as far better than its present administration; for if ever there was cruelty practiced toward any people from the time when the Second Henry began and Elizabeth completed the subjugation, and when the king's writ could not run beyond the pale outside of Dublin, down to this time of perilous discontent, no more brutal and unjust administration in its disregard of peasant, citizen, and foreigner ever existed.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. Being on this side of the House does inspire my friend from New York. [Laughter.]

Mr. COX, of New York. I believe there is on this side of the House a great deal of liberal, humane, and kindly sentiment. I feel that is the case when I look all around me; and gentlemen will accord to me that I have never undertaken to make this a party question. I love to see you men come up to the help of Ireland in her distress against the mighty. It is not for us here in an American Congress to rally for free land, nor for anything but freedom, in its generous and general sense, such as nations may note.

What vicissitudes has not Ireland had! Through her terrible trial of seven hundred years she may come out at last with her autonomy. Why, even the Parliament of Canada are considering resolutions asking England to give to Ireland a legislature like her own. Why should not Ireland have our sympathy? Why should not the people of our country, who are so tinctured and imbued with the old Celtic spirit of bravery, literature, politics, art, and science—why should not men like my friend from Wisconsin, who can with eloquence and courage lead a crusade against slavery and wrong—raise their voices for free sails, plows, land, and life; and return to Ireland in her calamity the generous echo of this House in the verse of our gifted minister to England in his best days:

> They have rights who dare maintain them;
> We are traitors to our sires,
> Smothering in their holy ashes
> Freedom's new-lit altar-fires.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. No. 576) authorizing the Court of Claims to determine the question of liability of the United States for damages to the Norwegian bark Atlantic by collision with the United States steamer Vandalia;

A bill (S. No. 679) for the relief of William A. Gavett;

A bill (S. No. 1026) to permit grain brought by Canadian farmers to be ground at mills of the United States adjacent to Canadian territory under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Treasury Department;

A bill (S. No. 1041) for the relief of E. P. Smith;

A bill (S. No. 1287) to authorize the appointment of an additional judge for the judicial district of the United States for the State of Nevada;

A bill (S. No. 1434) providing for the allotment of lands in severalty to the Indians residing upon the Umatilla reservation in the State of Oregon, and granting patents therefor, and for other purposes; and

A bill (S. No. 1572) for the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi and Missouri Rivers.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a bill and joint resolutions of the House of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. No. 1014) for the relief of Joseph L. Stevens;

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 161) making an appropriation to enable the Light-House Board to meet the expenses consequent upon the flood in the Mississippi River; and Joint resolution (H. R. No. 185) granting the use of tents at the soldiers' reunion to be held at Belle Plaine, Iowa, in the month of September or October, 1882.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed a resolution, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, providing for the printing of 10,000 copies of the report of the Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries for the year 1881.

Also, a bill (S. No. 1455) to provide for the allotment of lands in severalty to Indians on the various reservations, and to extend the protection of the laws of the States and Territories over the Indians, and for other purposes.

AMERICAN CITIZENS IN BRITISH PRISONS.

Mr. CALKINS. I ask that the resolution offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] be now read.

The SPEAKER. That resolution is not before the House at this time.

Mr. BLOUNT. I hope it will be read.

The SPEAKER. The resolution before the House is a resolution to discharge the Committee on Foreign Affairs from the further consideration of the resolution of inquiry which was referred to them. The resolution of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX,] as the Chair understands, is intended as a substitute for the resolution of inquiry now before the Committee on Foreign Affairs, when it shall have been brought back before the House.

Mr. CALKINS. If no point of order is made upon it, the other can be considered as withdrawn.

The SPEAKER. The resolution before the House might be withdrawn and the other adopted.

Mr. CALKINS. I hope that will be done.

The SPEAKER. It could not be offered as a substitute for the other, for the other has been referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs and is now before that committee.

Mr. BLOUNT. I prefer to go on now.

Mr. COX, of New York. No one makes any point of order on it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would hardly know what would become of the pending resolution if the other was adopted; it would still be pending before the House.

Mr. COX, of New York. That is under the control of my colleague, [Mr. ROBINSON.]

Mr. BAYNE. Why cannot the one be offered as a substitute for the other?

The SPEAKER. For what other?

Mr. BAYNE. For the resolution offered by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. ROBINSON.]

The SPEAKER. That resolution was held to be in order because it was a resolution to discharge the Committee on Foreign Affairs from the further consideration of the resolution of inquiry referred to them. The resolution to discharge the committee has not yet been acted upon, and the resolution of inquiry is still before the committee. The resolution of the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] could not be offered as a substitute for the resolution of inquiry until the resolution of inquiry was brought before the House.

Mr. COX, of New York. My colleague [Mr. ROBINSON] will withdraw his resolution if he can be permitted to explain a little.

Mr. CALKINS. It is not desirable to have the committee discharged, but it is desirable to have a resolution adopted as a substitute for the whole matter.

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not yield the floor.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. I understand the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROBINSON] will consent to withdraw his resolution after making some remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] has been recognized.

Mr. BLOUNT. I have the floor and prefer to go on.

Mr. WALKER. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WALKER. Is not the resolution to discharge the Committee on Foreign Affairs from the further consideration of the resolution now before them, and to bring that resolution of inquiry before the House for its action, impliedly, at least, a reflection on that committee?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think that is a parliamentary inquiry. The Committee on Foreign Affairs may have a perfectly good reason for not reporting back the resolution of inquiry, and the House may have a good reason for discharging the committee from its further consideration. That is not a parliamentary inquiry, in the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, I have no committee pride in the consideration of the question now before the House. It is of higher importance than any mere petty pride of success to-day. This is a matter which may involve this country in a tremendous conflict with the British Government. I believe this is the logical consequence of the proposed action, if gentlemen on this floor are speaking, not to the crowd, not to the mob, but addressing themselves to the sense of this House as a deliberative body.

What is the resolution of February 14? After requesting the President of the United States to furnish certain information to the House, there is added to the resolution the following:

And also in reference to the cases of Mr. Hart, of Lawrence, Massachusetts; H. O'Mahoney, of Buffalo, New York, and John McEnry, citizens of the United States, now imprisoned in Ireland, with instructions to request the President of the United States to demand of the British Government the prompt trial of these citizens or their prompt release.

I presume that if the President of the United States shall demand of the British Government the prompt trial of these citizens or their prompt release gentlemen who are now criticising unfavorably the Committee on Foreign Affairs mean in good faith to stand by his administration in that demand; mean in good faith to stand where the honest and earnest gentleman [Mr. ROBINSON, of New York] who is pressing this matter stands, when he says: "If they decline to respond favorably to that demand, I mean war."

The gentleman has referred to complaints and abuses made of himself. I want that gentleman to understand, and I want the country to understand, that I am not complaining of him. I believe that the agitation in this House by that gentleman has produced speedy action on the part of this administration. I believe that for months before the matter had been allowed to lag.

But I believe that at this hour the administration is undertaking to do all that we can reasonably ask of it; and although it be a Republican administration, when I think it is in the honest discharge of its high duty I shall not be found obstructing it in the discharge of that duty, though I shall regret if in my action here I shall find myself differing with many of those with whom I have been accustomed heretofore to act.

How were we circumstanced when this matter was submitted to the Committee on Foreign Affairs? We were informed by the executive department of the Government that important negotiations were pending; that they were likely to result beneficially and in accordance with the disposition of the House when this resolution was referred, and that our citizens were likely to be released, unless by the agitation of the question in the House something should occur which would embarrass those with whom this Government was communicating in Great Britain.

And, sir, when that information, emanating from the highest officer of the executive branch of the Government of the United States, came to the committee, I felt it to be my duty as a Representative to accept that statement as true, and to agree to stand still in this matter. If that is bad faith to this House, if that is neglect of official duty, if I have wronged my country in doing that, I am responsible for it. If I was wrong in responding properly as I considered to a suggestion from the executive branch of this Government to restrain action in view of the pendency of what the President believed to be a successful effort to release American citizens, I am ready to take the consequences. This is all my explanation; and this is why, so far as I am concerned, I was willing to stand still and not report this matter back promptly. I do not know what motives may have actuated other gentlemen.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this discussion has taken a very strange course, considering the magnitude of the parties involved. It is a question demanding something more than harangues upon this floor. The discussion of Magna Charta sanctioned by British authorities for generations has been paraded here; and we are not only demanding, so far as this debate goes, the release of these citizens, we are actually taking the position that the whole British system is wrong on the subject of the rights of humanity. Thus widely have we wandered from the subject-matter before the House. This is a matter between two of the greatest nations of the globe. If war should arise between them it will be no child's play. This generation knows what war means; and the American people I take it do not want war unless it shall come upon just grounds.

The British Government alleges that it has a right to a hearing. It states in its communications to us that in the country governed by its laws there is a class of citizens in rebellion. You and I may think that rebellion right; and so far as I am personally concerned, I admire the spirit that organized it. I trust that it will progress in its struggle, accepting nothing short of absolute independence. I am not of those who denounce the Irish people as turbulent. I admire their turbulence; it is but the sign of that spirit of liberty which it seems to me in any other race subjected to the pressure that has been placed upon them would have been crushed out.

We have nothing to do with the laws that Great Britain may pass for British subjects. She has seen fit to pass a statute of March 2, 1881, suspending the writ of habeas corpus. Under that law the lord lieutenant of Ireland may arrest anybody whom he suspects. The right of speedy trial cannot be demanded successfully. These measures are harsh, but Great Britain says (and she has a right to deliberate upon the question) that the circumstances justify such legislation. Sir, would this Government tolerate for a moment the suggestion from any source on the face of the earth that its legislation was wrong, was unchristian, and must be suppressed? By no means. Then I take it that any reasonable man must admit that so far as this legislation goes it is English legislation, for which we are not responsible. The arrest of British subjects may be harsh, but it is no fault of ours. It is not in accord with the policy of our Government that we should assume to interfere.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have before me a correspondence illustrative of the policy of the American Government under similar circumstances during the late war. I send to the Clerk's desk, and ask to have read three short letters, illustrating the American policy toward British subjects arrested under a suspension of the habeas corpus during our late war.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, November 11, 1862.

SIR: The instruction of the 16th ultimo from the British foreign office, in relation to the case of Mr. Francis Carroll, which you recently left at this Department, and which is herewith returned to you, having been communicated to Major L. C. Turner, associate judge-advocate, I now have the honor to inclose to you a copy of his reply. It will be seen that an order has been issued by the War Department for Mr. Carroll's discharge, in conformity with the terms suggested by this Government, and acceded to by that of her Britannic majesty.

I have the honor to be, with high consideration, sir, your obedient servant,
WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

Hon. WILLIAM STUART, &c.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington City, D. C., November 8, 1862.

SIR: I have the honor to inclose a copy of the order issued by this Department for the discharge of Francis Carroll, (a British subject,) from Fort La Fayette, upon his compliance with the conditions in said order stated; which conditions are in conformity with the "terms" suggested by this Government, and to which her Britannic majesty's government accedes. I have transmitted the order for the discharge of Francis Carroll to the United States marshal in New York, that he may superintend its proper execution. I inclose, also, herewith the instructions from the British foreign office, as requested.

I have the honor to be, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
L. C. TURNER, Judge-Advocate.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,
Secretary of State.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington City, D. C., November 8, 1862.

SIR: You are hereby directed to discharge from custody Francis Carroll, a British subject, upon his agreeing to leave the United States immediately, and not return again during the continuance of the present rebellious war, and giving security, to the approval of the United States marshal (Murray) that he will perform and keep said agreement; or, upon his giving sufficient guarantee, to be approved by the said United States marshal, for his good conduct as a resident of the United States, and that he will do no act, by word or deed, to aid and encourage the rebels or the rebellion.

By order of the Secretary of War:
L. C. TURNER, Judge-Advocate.

Colonel MARTIN BURKE,
Commanding at Fort La Fayette.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, such was the policy of the American Government at that time in reference to British subjects, and it was acceded to by the British Government. Their citizens were released on the express condition they should leave this country.

In the face of such conduct on the part of the two governments when this was engaged in a great civil war, how would we expect the British Government to meet us turning away from all they conceded to us, refusing this negotiation, refusing even the ordinary diplomatic intercourse, all efforts gradually to approach an agreement, and coming to it with an absolute demand? I take it any man who understands the spirit of our own people or of our ancestors in Great Britain would answer, their manhood would compel them at once to cease to negotiate; that all parties in the British Parliament would unite at once, Gladstone and the opposition, and say, While we are willing to do all we can toward amicable negotiation, while we are willing to observe the precedent established during the American troubles of 1861-'65, yet when it comes in the form of an absolute demand, meaning war, the British lion will not crouch.

I say, Mr. Speaker, this is what this resolution means, if it means anything worthy of this House, and for one I propose in what I shall do to be careful of the responsibility I am taking upon myself. I have before me an act which has been read and commented on as the American policy since the action of the Government during the war, and I desire to call the attention of the House to it. It does seem to me the most arrant humbuggery of the Irish people in this country that could be started, and I do not think gentlemen on either side can claim any amount of credit for the passage of it. I send it to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act concerning the rights of American citizens in foreign states.

Whereas the right of expatriation is a natural and inherent right of all people, indispensable to the enjoyment of the rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; and whereas in the recognition of this principle, this Government has freely received emigrants from all nations, and invested them with the rights of citizenship; and whereas it is claimed that such American citizens, with their descendants, are subjects of foreign states, owing allegiance to the governments thereof; and whereas it is necessary to the maintenance of public peace that this claim of foreign allegiance should be promptly and finally disavowed: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That any declaration, instruction, opinion, order, or decision of any officers of this Government which denies, restricts, impairs, or questions the right of expatriation is hereby declared inconsistent with the fundamental principles of this Government.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That all naturalized citizens of the United States, while in foreign states, shall be entitled to, and shall receive from this Government, the same protection of persons and property that is accorded to native-born citizens in like situations and circumstances.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That whenever it shall be made known to the President that any citizen of the United States has been unjustly deprived of his liberty by or under the authority of any foreign government, it shall be the duty of the President forthwith to demand of that government the reasons for such imprisonment, and if it appears to be wrongful and in violation of the rights of American citizenship the President shall forthwith demand the release of such citizen, and if the release so demanded is unreasonably delayed or refused, it shall be the duty of the President to use such means, not amounting to acts of war, as he may think necessary and proper to obtain or effectuate such release, and all the facts and proceedings relative thereto shall as soon as practicable be communicated by the President to Congress.

Approved July 27, 1868.

Mr. BLOUNT. The House will observe that the first section of this act simply establishes the right of expatriation. The second provides naturalized citizens shall have the same protection as native-bern, a matter about which there has been no dispute with any country I know of for a great many years. It certainly was not a practical question at the time the law was passed.

The last section is, that "whenever it is made known to the President that any citizen of the United States has been unjustly deprived of his liberty by or under the authority of any foreign government, it shall be the duty of the President forthwith to demand of that government the reasons of such imprisonment; and if it appears to be wrongful and in violation of the rights of American citizenship, the President shall forthwith demand the release of such citizen, and if the release so demanded is unreasonably delayed or refused, the President shall use such means, not amounting to acts of war, as he may think necessary and proper to obtain or effectuate the release; and all the facts and proceedings relative thereto shall as soon as practicable be communicated by the President to Congress."

There is very little in that, it seems to me, after all that has been said about it. The President is inhibited from any act of war. It leaves the matter where it would have been without it. It leaves it in the hands of Congress. Whether it was passed or not made no difference. I take it that it was guarded in that way for a purpose; that there was a good deal of clamor and a disposition to toady to clamor in certain quarters, and that while it looked very belligerent, it was perfectly harmless.

Now, Mr. Speaker, having said this much as to the policy of this Government during the war and under the statute I have cited, let us come to the complaint suggested by these resolutions. It is proposed that we shall request the President to make an absolute demand for the release of certain citizens or their immediate trial. That is the position in which the gentlemen favoring the proposition now pending would place this Government.

Now, I ask, in the first place, is it necessary, admitting that the policy of the American people is all that you say it is, admitting that there is in this law all the guarantee that is claimed for it and all the protection for individual rights which the statutes can give—I say is it necessary to proceed in the manner proposed here? Let us look at it. Suppose the President of the United States is negotiating with the British Government for the release of these people; suppose he has not gone in the form of an absolute demand, but that he takes a more courteous, diplomatic, and careful method, and approaches the subject in a sagacious, statesmanlike manner; then I ask what else can you desire to be done? Why should this resolution pass? Why this unnecessary provocation? Why, Mr. Speaker, such a resolution as this, if adopted, would absolutely stop negotiations. When this resolution was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, as I have already stated, they were informed by the Department that negotiations were then pending, that there was every evidence of progress being made as rapidly as could be expected between the diplomates of the two countries upon the question, and the correspondence was submitted to the committee. Then why interrupt it? Why bring this matter in the House of Representatives now?

So far as those citizens are concerned there is nothing to be gained by it, and in a few days—four or five I think it was, I do not recollect the dates with accuracy—in proof of what the Department had communicated, two of the men mentioned in this resolution were released. To-day the British Government is saying to the other two exactly what the United States said to British citizens who were imprisoned here during the late war. They tell these men that notwithstanding all of the charges made against them, if they just make their appeal on the ground that they are willing to leave the country they are harmless in this matter. All that is asked of them is that they shall not remain and plot against the government that now holds them in custody. I ask that if that is not doing more for them than is done for British citizens in prison under the same law.

With reference to American citizens they are saying to them: "We respect the American Government, and out of deference to it we allow you to leave without responsibility. But this much we think we have a right to ask at your hands just as America did at the hands of our citizens who were under arrest there in 1861 to 1865, that you acquiesce in our judgment that your presence in the country is undesirable and dangerous, and your liberty will be accorded you on condition that you leave it." What more could we ask?

I take it, sir, that no gentleman who is disposed to deliberate on this matter could hope to obtain more than that. There are people in this country who are interested in peace, interested in law, interested in order, interested in all our great business enterprises, and in the rights of our own people. These are considerations it may be well for us to recognize. Let us then not ask too much. In my own opinion, without any such action as is now moved, we shall obtain all that is reasonable. But suppose we pass this resolution, and the President of the United States, taking us at our word, shall say to Mr. Lowell, "Let these negotiations stop. File your demand on the British Government for the unconditional release of these men. The American people have determined in the American House of Representatives, and the President has deferred to it, that they will not be trifled with any longer. They are going to have the absolute discharge of these men without further delay."

Mr. BLAND. I would like to ask the gentleman if the act which he has read does not say that the President shall make the demand, and that being the case, what is the difference between that law and the resolution now offered?

Mr. BLOUNT. I will answer the gentleman. The act, while it does say the President shall demand, expressly strips him of any power to execute it.

Mr. BLAND. But as I understand the resolution it simply follows the law that the President shall make the demand in conformity with the statute.

Mr. BLOUNT. I have this further to say in that connection, that the statute to which the gentleman refers, it is true, is a statute of the United States, and binds the American people only; and if we can discharge these people without putting ourselves in jeopardy of war with Great Britain, by adopting a different course, why do you prefer to use the language of the statute? Do you expect the statutes that you have adopted here will of themselves wipe out the understanding of the two governments as to the rights of their citizens?

Mr. BLAND. If I do not interrupt the gentleman——

Mr. BLOUNT. Certainly not.

Mr. BLAND. I supposed the whole object of this proceeding was to have the President make some demand or request on the British Government. Now, if the Committee on Foreign Affairs say that no demand is made, they do not want any to be made; that law is a dead letter. If I understand the resolution, it is to carry out the law, if it has not been carried out.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman has not been kind enough to pay attention to what I have been saying. If the executive department of the Government has been, as I have said before, in active communication, and making satisfactory progress with reference to this business——

Mr. SPRINGER. If it has——

Mr. BLOUNT. If it has been making satisfactory progress, why interfere? I do not mean by that what the gentleman from Illinois and myself would like to have done. We would like to have it done in a single moment, but I take it for granted that no country on this earth would do absolutely our bidding without some discussion and some negotiations in reference to it; and that is the only sense in which I have used the expression.

But, returning to my friend from Missouri, [Mr. BLAND,] I say if this progress is being made under present negotiations, why should the gentleman just then and there formulate a demand upon the British Government to release these prisoners?

Mr. BLAND. In answer to that I will say the whole argument against this resolution seems to have been an attempt to frighten us by the danger of an impending war. I do not apprehend any war as the consequence of passing a resolution and making this demand; the law itself makes it the duty of the President to do this. If he has already made the demand the law is carried out. I ask for information if he has done so. If he has not made the demand, let him do it according to law. I see no war in it.

Mr. BLOUNT. If this were part of the international law, regarded by the nations of the earth, we could appeal to that statute in vindication of our action; but I take it, when we shall approach a foreign power upon this question, and shall cite a statute of our own, it will be regarded as a most silly performance on the part of those doing it, or else it will be regarded as a great piece of recklessness and disregard of the rights of other people.

Mr. BLAND. Then I suppose the gentleman considers the law too silly to have been properly enacted, and that if we pass a resolution in conformity to it it will be too silly to be considered.

Mr. BLOUNT. I have already said I regard this act as amounting to very little. The power to enforce it after the demand is made has been actually taken away, and the whole matter comes back to Congress. Therefore I said that the plain practical view to take of it was that when this word "demand" was used it meant nothing more than a request on the part of the President; for the arm of the President is immediately tied. It is provided he shall commit no act of war but shall communicate the correspondence on the subject and the whole matter to Congress. I say I do not believe that that legislation was enacted in great sincerity. But even if it were, I do not know when the demand is made that it will be regarded in any other light than as offensive by the British Government. And more than that, sir, I doubt very much whether under the Constitution of the United States the Congress has any right to pass any such statute as this. I believe that the President, in spite of the statute, has acted in a perfectly constitutional, legitimate, and prudent manner in endeavoring to negotiate upon this subject.

But, Mr. Speaker, let the House act otherwise; let the President act otherwise; let the absolute demand be made when our prisoners are about to be released—and there is every reason to believe they are to be released—and let the British Government assert its own sovereignty and announce to the people of this country, "We have a right to pass the act suspending the writ of habeas corpus in this country; we have a right to make arrests of anybody on our soil disturbing our peace, and when you make an absolute demand you demand at our hands a concession of that sovereign power, and there is no course left for us but an absolute refusal." And then what, sir? My friend from Missouri says there is to be no war. Why not? Such an attitude on the part of Great Britain would not be an reasonable one. Such an attitude would be likely to be taken by ourselves with the sanction of every citizen of America under similar circumstances. Then why no war? When this announcement is made to us do you propose then to negotiate?

Are you going to humiliate yourselves by asking further diplomatic communications and negotiations? Is there any other thing to be done but an absolute declaration of war against Great Britain? I ask, gentlemen, if there is any other thing they can suggest; and if so, I would like to hear the suggestions. I pause for one. I take it that no man on the floor of this House, under such circumstances, would think of any other thing but a state of war with Great Britain in pursuance of that high demand made upon that government.

Mr. BLAND. I understand the statute uses the word "demand," and the President may go further, so that he does not proceed to any declaration or act of war. Hence I can see no harm in this resolution. I do not understand the reasoning of the gentleman. It does not provide the President shall go so far as to bring war upon this country. But if his carrying out an act of Congress and asserting the rights of American citizens brings on a war, I am in favor of that war.

Mr. ORTH. May I ask the gentleman from Missouri——

Mr. BLOUNT. I would like to answer the gentleman from Missouri right there. The gentleman contends—and what a poor plea it is—if you have authorized the President to make a demand, and you say he shall not declare war, there is no danger of war. You have tied his hands. Is that the attitude the gentleman desires this country to be placed in? If so, I take it no other gentleman on this floor will stand by him in that attitude. I am very sure the American people in no section of the country will seek that sort of an escape from war.

Sir, if this demand is made, if it is made in good faith; if it is made out of a desire to take this high ground in reference to American citizens abroad—and I think my friend from New York [Mr. ROBINSON] means it, and I am glad he does not higgle about it—on that question he and I have no controversy, although my friend from Missouri says otherwise; and I ask my friend from New York to take notice now that the gentleman from Missouri does not propose to follow him along that line. I say if this demand shall be made, if this House shall come to this determination, I trust there will be no retrocession from it afterward, and that we shall not make ourselves contemptible with empty boasting. And cruel and costly as war is, whenever we shall have invited it, I trust that no blush of shame shall mantle the cheek of our people in consequence of our retiring from a contest which we have invited.

I have already stated to the House the reasons actuating me in reference to this matter; and I now say to the House that there are things which might be said which I am not at liberty to say, and other gentlemen of the committee will confirm me in that statement, which it would not be proper to communicate on this floor, which came to that committee under the seal of secrecy. And that uncommunicated information has a great deal to do with my action now in reference to this matter. I beg the House at this time, if the attitude of the Committee on Foreign Affairs in reference to this question is correct, to let it stand for a short period. It will not be long before you will know all. It will not be long before a report will be made by that committee, and then you can take such action as you may see fit.

I indulge in these remarks simply in justification of my own course. I have no pride of opinion. I have no committee pride which I think should be consulted by any gentleman on this floor, and certainly it shall not be by myself. But I do ask if I have acted prudently, if the Committee on Foreign Affairs have acted prudently, if you do not feel a distrust of that action, that you will not at the present time take these resolutions from that committee. If, however, you shall determine otherwise, I shall be the last one to complain; and I will follow you in your demand, and to the utmost consequences to which that demand shall lead.

I will now yield to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HEWITT,] if he desires the floor. How much time have I left?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has seven minutes remaining.

Mr. BLOUNT. As I do not see the gentleman from New York here, I will yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from West Virginia, [Mr. WILSON.]

Mr. WILSON. I will occupy the time of this House but a very few moments, in an endeavor to rid this subject of the figures of speech and the poetry which have been thrown around it, and to ask the House to consider the real question before it.

Some months ago we were informed that four naturalized citizens of this country were imprisoned in Ireland. By means of correspondence between the two governments, two of those citizens have been discharged from imprisonment and are perhaps now on their way home. And we are informed that the Government of Great Britain has offered to open their prison doors and discharge the other two prisoners if they will leave that country.

Now, has this Congress the power to say that Great Britain shall discharge those two prisoners and allow them to remain in Great Britain? Or has the Government of Great Britain the power to compel them to leave that country? When we had British subjects in our jails during our late troubles, we imposed upon them the condition that they should leave this country in the event they were discharged. That condition was complied with, and the Government of Great Britain acquiesced.

To show that this Government has also acquiesced in the same policy I desire in this connection to read one paragraph of a letter from Mr. Seward, our Secretary of State, dated June 9, 1866, to our minister in Great Britain, Mr. Adams:

> Under these circumstances you will be expected to suggest to Lord Clarendon the expediency of the exercise of clemency to the extent, at least, of releasing all of the American citizens, native or naturalized, who are in confinement upon the condition of their returning to the United States.
> While such a proceeding on the part of the British Government would seem to be an entirely safe one, it cannot be denied that it would have a tranquilizing effect here.

Thus it will be seen that both governments have recognized and adopted that policy. Four of our citizens have been imprisoned by Great Britain; two have been unconditionally and absolutely released; the other two, it is said, can be released at any time if they will consent to leave the country.

Now, I ask will not this Congress put itself in the very ridiculous attitude of repudiating its own policy if it says to the Government of Great Britain that we are not content to have our citizens released upon the condition stated; that we are not willing that Great Britain shall treat our citizens as we treated her subjects?

If this House shall determine to adopt the pending proposition and discharge the Committee on Foreign Affairs from the further consideration of the resolution which has been referred to them I shall enter no protest. But I wish to add my testimony here to the earnest anxiety, and the research and thought which every member of that committee has given to this subject. We have recognized it as one of the most important questions that have been before us.

Ordinarily there is no necessity for Congressional legislation on such a subject as this. Our statutes require that when the President shall be informed that any of our citizens, native-born or naturalized, are in foreign prisons, he shall demand of the government imprisoning them the cause of their arrest. And he may go further, if in his opinion they are improperly held, and demand their release; but that he shall do nothing in this regard amounting to an act of war.

Now, the President did speak on this question, did correspond through the Secretary of State with the authorities of Great Britain, and no good came of it. After that correspondence the subject was brought before this House. And since Congress has had the subject under consideration two of the prisoners have been discharged, and the other two can be discharged upon the condition stated if they desire.

The Government of Great Britain presents to us the coercion act. She claims that under her constitution, under her form of government, under her laws, she has the right and the power to pass this act and apply its restrictions, terms, and conditions, harsh as they are, to her own citizens as well as to foreigners. I read the following brief extract from the speech of the distinguished gentleman from New York, [Mr. HEWITT:]

> Now, let me quote a recent letter of our minister in London in reply to an application from our consul at Cork asking his intervention in behalf of American citizens thus lying in jail in Ireland, and who have been lying there for months untried:
> "The 'coercion act,' so called, is an exceptional and arbitrary measure. Its chief object is to enable the authorities to arrest persons whom they suspect of illegal conduct without being obliged to produce any proof of their guilt. Its very substance and main purpose are to deprive suspected persons of the speedy trial they desire. This law is of course contrary to the spirit and foundation principles of both English and American jurisprudence. But it is the law of the land, and it controls all persons domiciled in the proclaimed districts of Ireland, whether they are British subjects or not; and it is manifestly futile to claim that naturalized citizens of the United States should be excepted from its operation.
> "Unless I am instructed to the contrary by the Department of State, I must take this view of my duties, and it is proper you should give this intimation to the parties interested.
> "J. R. LOWELL."

Now, that is a doctrine to which I cannot subscribe. I reassert that it is the duty of this Government to require of the British Government that these American citizens shall either be put to trial, convicted if they are guilty, and punished if convicted, or else that they shall be released. It is not reasonable that an American citizen who may be as innocent as any gentleman in this House, going to Ireland on lawful business or for his pleasure, shall be taken by the throat, carried to prison and kept there to rot, because the writ of habeas corpus happens to be suspended.

The Committee on Foreign Affairs have investigated this subject as fully and thoroughly as was possible for them to do. They have been in almost constant communication with the State Department, and it affords me pleasure to say that that Department has most ably and energetically pressed the matter upon the consideration of the Government of Great Britain, resulting in the unconditional release of two of the prisoners and the proffered conditional release of the other two.

There is no principle, Mr. Speaker, better settled than that each civilized government will interfere in behalf of its own citizens. My friend from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] has furnished both precedent and authority upon this subject. We are all familiar with the case of Martin Koszta, whom Captain Ingraham, of the United States Navy, took from an Austrian ship under the menace of his guns. Koszta was a naturalized citizen of the United States, who had been seized by the Austrian Government. This patriotic and daring act of Captain Ingraham was indorsed by his Government and applauded by his countrymen.

But I refer to another and still more remarkable case; not as a case of discharge from imprisonment, but as showing the manner in which the various governments protect their citizens in their rights of person and property. About six years ago a German consul in Nicaragua was assaulted and received personal injuries. I cannot better explain to the House the prompt and efficient action taken by his government than by reading the following version of it, which has been furnished to me by the State Department:

[Report No. 99.]

DIPLOMATIC BUREAU,
Washington, April 4, 1882.

Subject: Outrages committed upon German consular officers at Leon, Nicaragua, by armed forces, on October 23 and November 29, 1876, for which due reparation and an indemnity was demanded of and paid by that republic to the German Government.

The correspondence respecting the "Eisenstuck affair," as it was commonly called, is quite voluminous, and occurred during the years of 1876, '77, and '78. The facts briefly are:

On the night of October 23, 1876, while Mr. Paul Eisenstuck, who was then German consul ad interim at Leon, was returning home with his family, several pistol-shots were fired at him. Again, on the night of November 29, 1876, as Mr. Maurice Eisenstuck, the German consul there, was proceeding to his house, accompanied by a party of friends, he was assaulted by a body of armed men.

The assailants on both occasions were headed, it was claimed, by Francisco Leal, a Nicaraguan, married to a step-daughter of Mr. Paul Eisenstuck. During the first attack no one appears to have been injured. At the second, however, the consul, his wife and brother received cuts and bruises. In the mêlée Mr. Leal carried off his wife, who, having separated from him, had instituted proceedings for divorce, and who, at the time, was under the protection of her step-father and was one of the assaulted party. The consul, his wife, and brother were led off to prison, but through the intercession of a friend were released before being placed in confinement. Both attacks occurred in the public highways of Leon.

Due and prompt representations were made in these cases to the Nicaraguan authorities by the German Government through its charge d'affaires, Mr. Werner von Bergen, and satisfaction demanded as follows:

"First. Private persons convicted or suspected of the two attacks to be prosecuted and vigorously punished according to law;

"Second. All public functionaries who were in any manner connected with the attempt of the 23d of October to be similarly dealt with and due communication thereof made through the German chargé;

"Third. As a reparation due to the persons of the consular officers and party, for both assaults, Nicaragua to pay the sum of $30,000; and

"Fourth. To publicly manifest its regret at the two assaults and acknowledge its respect due to the official character of such consuls, the German consular flag to be solemnly saluted by a division of the armed forces of Nicaragua."

The Nicaraguan Government sought to show that the affair of the 23d of October had arisen from a family quarrel between Mr. Paul Eisenstuck and Mr. Francisco Leal; and, further, that neither that attack nor the one of the 29th of November was of sufficient importance to assume an international character nor justify the reclamation demanded by Germany, which was considered onerous and her threatened use of force deplored.

Germany, however, pressed her claim with earnestness, and much correspondence ensued to establish the pros and cons of the issues under consideration.

Finally, the intervention of the United States was sought and obtained; also the moral support and influence of the British Government in pressing the matter in behalf of Germany. These were accorded on the ground that the demands made were just and in view of the delay equivalent to a denial of justice as to the arrest and punishment of the guilty parties.

Accordingly, Mr. Williamson, our minister to the Central American States, was authorized to support, so far as he properly could, the German chargé in carrying out the instructions of his government, a copy of which had been communicated to the Department.

Next, Mr. Williamson and Mr. Von Bergen proceeded to Managua, the capital of Nicaragua, for the purpose of pressing the claim of the German Government. Not being treated by the authorities upon their arrival at Managua in a proper manner, as was claimed, and after having so informed the Nicaraguan minister for foreign affairs, they proceeded to leave that capital June 30, 1877, whereupon the Nicaraguan minister addressed them a note explaining the cause of their non-official reception and disclaiming any intentional slight to either of them or to their respective governments; he also took steps to restrain their immediate and hurried departure, but apparently without avail.

After this event, and on March 19, 1878, the German squadron entered the Bay of Corinto. The same day a captain of a corvette, second in command to the frigate Elizabeth, left for Managua, carrying with him the ultimatum of the German Government.

The four points of demand were as follows:

"1. The Government of Nicaragua will express its regret for what happened the 23d of October and the 29th of November, 1876.

"2. The Government of Nicaragua, within a fortnight, will commence a new process against all the persons implicated in the inferred outrage against Consul Eisenstuck.

"3. Fourteen days after the signing of the protocol the sum of $30,000 will be paid.

"4. A salute of twenty-one guns to the German flag at Corinto."

The above terms were finally complied with by the Nicaraguan Government upon the 31st of March, 1878, a protocol having been signed to that effect by Mr. Commissioner Medina on the part of Nicaragua, and by Mr. Von Bergen on the part of the German Government, on that date, and the Eisenstuck affair was thus settled.

The narration of a very considerable correspondence between Mr. Williamson and this Department, showing his active interest in the matter, has not been attempted; nor has that exchanged between the Department and Mr. Hollenbeck, special agent from Nicaragua to this country, been particularly referred to. The desire has been to give as briefly as possible, consistent with an intelligent understanding of the affair, the principal features of the assault and the practical solution thereof, which the presence of a German war vessel finally made comparatively easy.

Respectfully submitted,

ALVEY A. ADEE,
Chief of Diplomatic Bureau.

We all denounce and condemn the action of Great Britain in arresting and imprisoning without cause citizens of this country. Now that two of them have been released and the other two can be released upon the conditions proposed by that Government, is it wise, is it proper that the matter should be taken out of the hands of the Committee on Foreign Affairs and that Congress should exercise the supreme power in making the demand proposed by the resolution offered by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. ROBINSON?]

What do we demand? What is there left for us to demand but the unconditional release of those two unfortunate gentlemen yet in prison?

As I have stated, this Government has claimed the right to impose the condition upon British subjects which Great Britain now imposes upon those two American citizens.

One word, Mr. Speaker, and I am done. If it shall turn out that the Government of Great Britain shall not release these two prisoners upon such terms as this Government is committed to, or shall not give them the benefit of a speedy trial, I am in favor of making a peremptory demand in the broadest sense of that term. I am in favor of this Government exercising its supreme power in making that demand upon the clear and distinct understanding that if it shall not be complied with we shall follow it up with force, and if war be the result let the responsibility rest where it belongs, on the Government of Great Britain.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. Mr. Speaker, I rise to close the debate, and propose to occupy only a few minutes. I do not, however, wish to cut off any other gentlemen. I will first yield for a few minutes to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. TOWNSHEND,] and afterward to any other gentleman who may desire to speak.

Mr. KASSON. I want to ask the gentleman from New York whether he does not intend to call for a vote soon. I may perhaps occupy two or three minutes; but I do not wish to delay the vote.

Mr. MILLS. It is five o'clock, and I hope the gentleman from New York will give way for a motion to adjourn.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. The gentleman from New York has kindly yielded to me. I do not take the floor for the purpose of making a speech, but merely to have read at the Clerk's desk resolutions adopted on the 21st of the present month by the senate of the State of Illinois. These resolutions embody the sentiment of the home of Douglas and Lincoln, and the early home of that grand hero of two wars, the late General Shields. I ask that the resolutions be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the senate of the State of Illinois, the house of representatives concurring herein, That it is the duty of the General Government, through its Chief Executive, its Congress, and its foreign ministers, to demand a speedy trial or unconditional release of those American citizens now in prison, and declare in the most emphatic manner that the protection of the Republic shall be extended to all its citizens abroad who are not convicted of violation of law; and that the Department of Government or official who fails in the discharge of such duty deserves censure, and is unworthy of the confidence of the liberty-loving and law-governed American people.

Resolved, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress are hereby instructed to use their best efforts to secure as soon as possible such a recognition of the rights of American citizens abroad as will be consistent with our national dignity and avert future capricious, arbitrary, or unjust interference with them.

Resolved, That copies of the foregoing preamble and resolutions be forwarded to the President and our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I understand that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] wants to speak for two or three minutes. I yield to him.

Mr. KASSON. I thank the gentleman for his courtesy; but I had intended chiefly to inquire whether we cannot now by some disposition of the question bring this debate to an end, as it is now nearly time for the adjournment.

While on my feet I will simply ask the House to observe the unanimity of feeling on the part of the Committee on Foreign Affairs upon this entire subject. We have known no party lines. We have, with as careful discretion as I ever knew to be exercised in any committee, gone just so far as we thought would not prejudice the great object sought to be accomplished by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. ROBINSON,] by myself, and by all others—the release of American citizens whom we believe to be unjustly imprisoned. We are therefore, I think I may say for all the members of the committee, indifferent to any supposed censure, because we know that we have acted in the manner most wise to accomplish the end. I have desired no display of oratorical fireworks on this subject; and when we come to act I want such action that no party lines will be drawn here; that the unanimity of the action of the House shall be the most significant feature of the occasion; and in this I know the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROBINSON] will agree with me.

Now, sir, I simply wanted to say that much touching the entire action of the committee, that from whatever side of the House the member of the committee came they have been, so far as I know, unanimous. We desire no action which shall not be unanimous on this floor in behalf of the object we are all seeking.

Mr. COX, of New York. Does the gentleman favor the substitute for the resolution?

Mr. KASSON. I see no objection to the resolution offered by the gentleman, if he deems any is necessary at this particular juncture.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I am anxious that this debate should close, and we should agree to a unanimous vote in a few minutes; but I understood the gentleman from Texas wished to say something.

Mr. MILLS. I do not. I merely wish to ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROBINSON] to yield to a motion to adjourn, he still retaining the floor. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I have a few words to say, Mr. Speaker, in closing this debate. It would be very far from my wish, gratified as I am now with this good feeling prevailing and this unanimity; it would be far indeed from my heart, and it would be very ungenerous, to throw anything in the way of the successful conclusion of the effort which I have made in behalf of American citizens confined in British prisons. But allow me to say I take exception, honestly and courteously, to what has been said by some of my friends on this floor. I am not going to raise any new question which will engender any difference on either side of the House at this time. It has been suggested by several gentlemen that by urging this matter now we might endanger the safety and peace of the United States; if we insisted upon pushing too strenuously our claims, if we should insist on extreme measures, we might compromise the country. You will pardon me, Mr. Speaker, for saying that I trust I am a true Irishman; that I love Ireland, my native country, but my allegiance to the country of my adoption is stronger than to Ireland. I stand here to say if anything would endanger the glory of the Stars and Stripes or risk the honor of this country, even if it resulted in the liberation of my own beloved native land, I would pause and vote against it if I thought it would inflict one blot on the American flag. If you tell me that it is necessary for these American citizens of Irish birth to remain in jail twelve months longer; if you want me to say, although I am not authorized to say it, but I believe I can do so, in behalf of these Irish-American citizens, if it is necessary for the honor of the United States that they shall remain, and that one hundred thousand more of our naturalized citizens shall go over and lie in jail to save the American banner from disgrace and the American name from dishonor, we are ready for the sacrifice; or if war shall be proclaimed, and hundreds of thousands of men are needed to sustain our flag, we are ready for that, too. I wish to say that I would be the first volunteer to go at the head of these men to lie in jail for the honor of the American name. [Applause.]

I would be willing to resign my seat here and take my place with O'Mahoney and McEnery and others that are there now and should remain, however unwholesome the prison may be, and die there if it is necessary to preserve the glory of the Stars and Stripes. [Applause.]

I have said enough on that subject, but I now mean to protest most earnestly against the abominable doctrine advocated here to-day that we should put that disgrace and degradation on our people, that they should sneak out of a country with which we are at peace with the brand on them that they shall never return. Give me war and desolation, give me anything but that. That condition can be imposed only in time of open, flagrant war; and much as I esteem the memory of William H. Seward, if he ever countenanced such conditions except in time of war, I denounce it.

If an American citizen going over to England, no matter where born, has violated the law, let him be tried and punished to the fullest extent; but if he is innocent of any crime let him be liberated from unjust imprisonment and undisturbed so long as he behaves himself, without having him marked as a prohibited nuisance. If O'Mahoney has protested against this indignity he has proved himself a true American citizen.

Shall we punish Englishmen who have business here by saying that they shall leave this country and shall never return to it again? Shall we put such a stigma upon them as that? We have a Saint George's society in New York; we have thousands of Englishmen there, respectable merchants and others, who are pursuing their various lawful avocations, holding positions in benevolent societies, perhaps in some sense guardians of the poor. Shall we punish them by casting them into prison on suspicion that their presence is dangerous to republican ideas, and liberate them only on their pledge to sneak out of our sight, and abandon their business and property to flee from the country?

Therefore I say to you, Mr. Speaker, and through you to our friends on both sides of this House, give us contagion, disease, desolation, and death all over the world rather than ask honorable men to submit to this insult and to declare that American citizens violating no law shall be hunted like wolves out of any country in time of peace. I believe that there is now a common feeling on both sides of this House to secure our imprisoned citizens' rights, and to secure them without delay. But, Mr. Speaker, while I say this, I think it is also a disgraceful thing that an American citizen is to be told by the English Government "We will open the prison doors if you leave the country." I protest against that in the name of American manhood and honor. I think we have got a proper idea now of the condition of affairs.

I congratulate all sides of the House on the happy termination of this debate; and now, as it seems to be the unanimous desire of both sides of the House, I shall withdraw my resolution as suggested by my friends on all sides, with this explanation: under the lucid statement of the matter made a few minutes ago by the Speaker, "the resolution before the House is a resolution to discharge the Committee on Foreign Affairs from the further consideration of the resolution which was referred to them. The resolution of the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] is intended as a substitute for the resolution of inquiry (his own) now before the Committee on Foreign Affairs when it shall have been brought back before the House."

I congratulate the House on the happy termination of this debate, so acceptable to both sides of the House. Had I known before, the character of the speech of my friend from Wisconsin, [Mr. WILLIAMS,] the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, to which we have all listened with so much delight, so appropriate, so eloquent, and so comprehensive of the whole subject, I should have gladly allowed him to speak for me, and remained silent.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I understand the proposition agreed upon by all parties here to be that I withdraw my resolution to bring the matter before the House, and that the committee will consent that it be before the House by their consent. All I want is to have it before the House, and I do not care how we get it there, whether by consent or by resolution. With this understanding I shall withdraw my resolution, and then the original resolution of Mr. COX is by unanimous consent before the House, and he proposes a substitute for his own resolution, which he and my friend Mr. SPRINGER have drawn up, and which carries out all I have sought to accomplish. It provides that the President shall continue his efforts for the prompt release of our citizens. Now, those efforts, I understand by the discussion to-day, are in compliance with the law of 1868, which provides that the President shall make a demand for the release of any citizen unjustly imprisoned by any foreign government.

If any one will take the trouble to refer to my first speech, made on the 26th day of January, now just three months ago, and published in the RECORD of January 31, he will find my resolution as I then wanted it and as I now want it:

Resolved, That the President of the United States is hereby respectfully requested, if any American citizen be now detained in any British prison without any crime alleged in due legal form against him, forthwith to make the demand for his release, under the law of July 27, 1868, which passed both Houses of Congress by a nearly unanimous vote, including the late and present Secretary of State.

Now, while I consider the resolution which I had proposed to offer, which is simply requesting the President to act and act promptly according to law, as I at first proposed three months ago, better than that of my colleague now offered as a substitute, still as it is the desire of the House and of my friend I shall withdraw my resolution discharging the committee for the sake of producing the harmony desired. [Applause.]

Mr. LORD. I desire to print some remarks on this subject.

There was no objection. [See Appendix.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on the resolution, which will be again reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States, if not incompatible with the public interests, be requested to communicate to this House any additional correspondence with the British Government on file in the State Department with reference to the alleged imprisonment of citizens of the United States in Ireland, and that the President be requested to continue his efforts for the prompt release or trial of any of the citizens of the United States who may now remain unjustly imprisoned in that country by the British authorities.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. COX, of New York, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MILLS. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. Pending the motion to adjourn, the Chair desires consent to submit some personal requests of members, and also some Executive communications.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. HOUK, for one week;

To Mr. WEST, for one week;

To Mr. LE FEVRE, for ten days; and

To Mr. HUBBELL, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

EXPORTATION OF AMERICAN CATTLE.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Agriculture, and ordered to be printed:

To the House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a report of the Secretary of State, presented in compliance with the request of the House of Representatives in a resolution of the 16th instant, asking for information touching the existing restrictions on the importation of American neat cattle into Great Britain.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, April 25, 1882.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MILLS. I insist upon the regular order.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman object to the presentation at this time of Executive communications?

Mr. MILLS. I do; they can come in to-morrow.

Mr. REED. Will the gentleman from Texas allow me to present a matter in connection with the business of the House?

Mr. MILLS. I insist upon the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the motion of the gentleman from Texas, that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at five o'clock and seventeen minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BINGHAM: The petition of the Union Benevolent Association of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, founded in 1830, requesting the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 4198) establishing postal savings depositories—to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. BUTTERWORTH: The petition of Albert Schmill and 25 others, dealers in malt and barley, of Cincinnati, Ohio, praying for change in the duty on malt from 20 per cent. ad valorem to a specific duty of twenty-five cents per bushel—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, the petition of the Cincinnati Chamber of Commerce relative to the enactment of a bankrupt bill—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. MANNING: The petitions of T. L. Landreth, W. J. Cooper, and others, citizens of Marshall County, Mississippi, and of J. W. S. Tate, of the Moline Grange, No. 62, Union County, Mississippi, for the construction of a ship-railway across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec—severally to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. OATES: The petition of John T. Davis and 40 others, citizens of Henry County, Alabama, in favor of raising and distributing an educational fund among the several States according to the illiteracy of population—to the Committee on Education and Labor.

By Mr. O'NEILL: The petition of the Philadelphia Board of Trade, remonstrating against the passage of Hon. A. S. HEWITT's resolution as constituting the basis on which the proposed tariff commission should shape its action—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. PAGE: The petition of J. Gundlach & Co. and others, of San Francisco, California, relative to the bill (H. R. No. 920) which proposes a tax upon sparkling wines made under the carbonic-acid process—to the same committee.

By Mr. PAUL: The petition of John M. Dutrow, messenger in the House of Representatives, for increase of compensation—to the Committee on Accounts.

By Mr. PEIRCE: The petition of Lindsey Flemming and 28 others, citizens of Crawfordsville, Indiana, for the appointment of a commission of colored men to inquire into and report upon the general progress of the colored people of this country since the war—to the Committee on Education and Labor.

By Mr. RICH: The petition of 90 citizens of Smith's Creek, Saint Clair County, Michigan, asking Congress to make the Commissioner of Agriculture a member of the Cabinet—to the Committee on Agriculture.

Also, the petition of 90 citizens of Smith's Creek, Saint Clair County, Michigan, for the passage of the bill imposing a tax on incomes—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, the petition of 90 citizens of Smith's Creek, Saint Clair County, Michigan, for legislation for the protection of innocent purchasers of patent rights—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, the petition of 90 citizens of Smith's Creek, Saint Clair County, Michigan, for legislation to regulate charges for railway transportation—to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. ROSECRANS: The petition of Jacob Leindecker, of California, for compensation for losses incurred by shipwreck—to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. RUSSELL: The petition of Jesse S. Pendergrast, for increase of pension—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. SHACKELFORD: The petition of citizens of Onslow County, North Carolina, for survey of land from Beaufort to New River and White Oak River to Smith Mills, in said county—to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. STOCKSLAGER: The petition and papers of Elizabeth Whitesides, for a pension—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. VANCE: A bill to survey the Broad River, in the State of North Carolina—to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. WILSON: Papers relating to the claim of Major James L. Simpson—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. YOUNG: The petitions of George Cox and many other merchants of Indianapolis, Indiana, and of Ordway & McGuire and others, of Nashville, Tennessee, for the passage of the bill taxing the sugar adulterant known as glucose—severally to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of Cincinnati, Ohio, urging the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 5380) relating to the erection of bridges over the Ohio River—to the Committee on Commerce.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, April 26, 1882.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter of the Secretary of War, in response to a resolution of February 28 calling for an itemized statement of how, by whom, and under what exigency the $200,000 appropriated for mileage of officers of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, will be exhausted before the end of February, &c.; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting the petition of First Lieutenant Gilbert S. Jennings, United States Army, retired, for such legislation as will give him the rank and pay of colonel on the retired list from the date of his retirement from active service, June 28, 1878, together with a report from the Adjutant-General in the case; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a petition of citizens of Henry County, Georgia, praying for a present reduction and the early abolition of internal taxes; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SEWELL presented the petition of Brigadier-Generals R. Macfeely, S. V. Benét, D. G. Swaim, W. B. Rochester, Brevet Major-Generals Frank Wheaton, August V. Kautz, C. L. Kilburn, and 6 lieutenant-colonels, 11 majors, 24 captains, 26 first lieutenants, and 12 second lieutenants, making a total of 86 officers of the Army, praying for the passage of the bill for compulsory retirement; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. LAPHAM presented a memorial of citizens and firms in New York, Boston, Baltimore, and Providence, in favor of the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 2222) to amend section 2983 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, so that the duties paid upon sugars shall be levied upon the quantity delivered from instead of the quantity entered into bonded warehouses; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BLAIR. I present the petition of Hon. E. Spaulding, president of the board of education of the city of Nashua, New Hampshire, and many leading citizens, including those in control of the interests of education in that city, praying for national aid to common schools in the States and Territories, to be distributed upon the basis of illiteracy. I will merely say that this petition represents the evidently universal sentiment of those interested in education in one of the chief cities of our State, and is but an illustration of the universal sentiment, I think, throughout the State. As the petition is very short, I ask that it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will be read, if there be no objection.

The petition was read, as follows:

We, citizens of Nashua, county of Hillsborough, State of New Hampshire, impressed with the danger threatening our Republic, because of the appalling illiteracy of the voting population as revealed in the last census, for the enlightenment of which many of the States are unable to make adequate provision; and believing it to be the constitutional duty of Congress to provide for the safety of the Republic, no less in time of peace than in time of war; and that the enfranchisement of the freedmen imposes an obligation upon the Government to qualify them for a safe discharge of the duties with which they are charged, do earnestly pray that our Representatives in Congress assembled will take prompt and efficient measures to avert this danger; that moneys raised from such sources as Congress may in its wisdom deem best shall be distributed to the common schools of the States and Territories on the basis of illiteracy, in such manner as shall not supersede nor interfere with, but rather stimulate their efforts, and under such guarantees as shall secure its application to this object with equal justice to all classes of citizens.

Mr. BLAIR. I observe in reading the distinguished names which are appended to the petition that they are entirely without distinction of party. I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Education and Labor.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON presented resolutions adopted at a meeting of the Prisoners' Association of Shelby County, Ohio, in favor of the passage of a bill to pension ex-prisoners of war; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. FERRY presented a petition of Henry H. Ladd, of Detroit, and 2,000 others, citizens of the State of Michigan, praying for the passage of Senate bill No. 1012 on behalf of Union prisoners of war; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MILLER, of New York, presented a petition of citizens of Erie County, New York, asking for the repeal of internal taxes; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT FORT WAYNE.

Mr. VEST. I am instructed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 670) to provide for the construction of a public building at the city of Fort Wayne, in the State of Indiana, to report it without amendment.

Mr. VOORHEES. Inasmuch as a similar bill was reported unanimously two years ago and unanimously passed the Senate at that time, and inasmuch as there is a great public need growing out of one branch of the Federal court being located at Fort Wayne, I ask for the present consideration of the bill. I am quite sure there will be no objection to it.

Mr. SHERMAN. Is it reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds?

Mr. HARRISON. It is reported favorably by the committee, I understand.

Mr. VOORHEES. Unanimously so.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 670) to provide for the construction of a public building at the city of Fort Wayne, in the State of Indiana.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Will the Senator from Indiana allow me to make a suggestion to him? I now repeat what I have so often said in regard to the jurisdictional clause in such bills, that it is utterly inoperative for any purpose and ought not to be there. The practice has crept into our committee of inserting a jurisdictional clause requiring the State to cede jurisdiction over the land upon which it is proposed to erect public buildings. You will discover that a reservation there is made in favor of the State for the service of process. There can be but one kind of jurisdiction ceded by a State in cases of this kind, as will be seen from a glance at the Constitution. It is just precisely the jurisdiction that exists in this District, exclusive jurisdiction, constitutional jurisdiction. I am sure that the Senator from Indiana would not want exclusive jurisdiction in the Federal Government for all purposes over a lot of land purchased or obtained for the erection of a public building in his State.

The reason why I say this is because this same reservation clause was in a similar cession in my State, in which a murder was committed by a citizen on another, and the Federal courts held, and the Department of Justice here sustained them, that the offense was one within the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States and the man could not be tried in a State court; and they went so far that he was hung under that judgment. When these clauses have come up here I have always thought it was unwise to incorporate a cession of jurisdiction into them, for there is no necessity for it in the world.

Mr. VOORHEES. I think the better way would be to let the bill pass; and some general provision, perhaps, embodying the ideas of the Senator from Florida, and applying to the whole question, would be well as a matter of separate legislation.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. BUTLER asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1789) providing for a coaling dock and naval storehouse at Port Royal, South Carolina; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. COCKRELL asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1790) for the relief of Oscar Eastmond and James W. Atwill; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MILLER, of New York, asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1791) for the relief of Thomas C. Ellison; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also (by request) asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1792) to regulate prize-money and pensions in the Navy; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. McPHERSON asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1793) to pay the widow of William Bishop, late a surgeon United States Navy, for property burned at Pensacola, Florida, in 1862; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BUTLER asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1794) for the relief of the legal representative of L. R. Wortham; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. PLATT asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1795) for the relief of Jeremiah D. Plumley; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MILLER, of California, asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1796) for the relief of Elizabeth H. Spotts; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

AMENDMENT TO POST-ROUTE BILL.

Mr. HILL, of Colorado, submitted an amendment, intended to be proposed by him, to the bill (H. R. No. 5812) to establish post-routes; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

CERTIFICATION OF BANK CHECKS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no resolutions, the routine morning business is closed.

Mr. BECK. The bill (S. No. 976) to punish the unlawful certification of checks by officers of national banks, was passed over the other morning without prejudice. I desire to have that bill considered this morning.

Mr. MORGAN. I wish to inquire whether, if the bill suggested by the Senator from Kentucky is taken up, it will displace the Japanese indemnity bill, which was passed over yesterday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Was there not objection to the further consideration of the Japanese indemnity bill?

Mr. MORGAN. No, sir; it was passed over without prejudice. I wish to say——

Mr. BECK. Before the Senator from Alabama goes on, let me say to him that the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] has some papers which he desires to file. He is obliged to go away this morning. I do not propose to have the bill finally considered, but just as was done yesterday in some case reached on the Calendar, I desire to have the papers upon which the bill is based and the communications of the executive officers printed in the RECORD, so that Senators may see them, and then without consuming time I will let the bill go over until to-morrow morning, so that Senators may see the papers and be prepared to act upon the bill one way or the other.

Mr. MORGAN. Then I withdraw any objection to taking up the bill.

Mr. BECK. The only object I have is to have this done before the Senator from Rhode Island goes away.

The bill (S. No. 976) to punish the unlawful certification of checks by officers of national banks, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BECK. There is an amendment which I ask to have read.

The ACTING SECRETARY. In line 8, after the words "United States," the Committee on Finance propose to insert "or who shall resort to any device or receive any fictitious obligation, direct or pretended collateral, in order to evade the provisions thereof."

Mr. BECK. There is printed at the end of the bill an amendment, of which I gave notice, to the amendment of the Committee on Finance, to strike out of the amendment the word "fictitious," before the word "obligation," and the word "pretended," before the word "collateral."

Mr. BECK. I merely desire to have the position of the bill stated, and to put upon the record the laws and communications we have had on the subject. Then the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] desires to place something in the RECORD which he has from the Comptroller, and then the bill may go over until to-morrow morning, so that the Senate can see these papers in the RECORD.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think it would be better to print them all in document form.

Mr. BECK. I wish to call attention to the laws, reports, and other exhibits bearing upon the propriety of passing this bill merely to have them on the record now, so that Senators can look at and understand them before or when I call it up for final action, as I propose to do to-morrow. This bill is an exact copy, except the amendment proposed, of a bill which was passed unanimously, I believe, by the House of Representatives some ten or twelve years ago on a report made to the House by General Garfield, chairman of the Committee on the Gold Panic, after the Black Friday troubles in New York, a short sentence of which report will show the necessity for the passage of the law:

The committee find that the custom adopted by some of the national banks of certifying checks which do not represent cash deposits, and which if presented immediately cannot be paid, is a dangerous and pernicious practice, and that the use of such checks greatly aided the conspirators.

Alluding to the Black Friday troubles.

It is in evidence that one bank, the Tenth National, certified $39,000,000 of checks in the course of two days, and with all its cash reserve was unable to make settlement, and only by large loans was saved from breaking.

That bill failed to pass the Senate. I propose if I can to pass it now, believing that the abuses are greater now than they were then. Section 5208 and section 5234 are as follows:

SEC. 5208. It shall be unlawful for any officer, clerk, or agent of any national banking association to certify any check drawn upon the association unless the person or company drawing the check has on deposit with the association, at the time such check is certified, an amount of money equal to the amount specified in such check. Any check so certified by duly authorized officers shall be a good and valid obligation against the association; but the act of any officer, clerk, or agent of any association, in violation of this section, shall subject such bank to the liabilities and proceedings on the part of the Comptroller as provided for in section 5234.

That section reads as follows:

SEC. 5234. On becoming satisfied, as specified in sections 5226 and 5227, that any association has refused to pay its circulating notes as therein mentioned, and is in default, the Comptroller of the Currency may forthwith appoint a receiver, and require of him such bond and security as he deems proper. Such receiver, under the direction of the Comptroller, shall take possession of the books, records, and assets of every description of such association, collect all debts, dues, and claims belonging to it, and, upon the order of a court of record of competent jurisdiction, may sell or compound all bad or doubtful debts, and, on a like order, may sell all the real and personal property of such association, on such terms as the court shall direct; and may, if necessary to pay the debts of such association, enforce the individual liability of the stockholders. Such receiver shall pay over all money so made to the Treasurer of the United States, subject to the order of the Comptroller, and also make report to the Comptroller of all his acts and proceedings.

No step has ever been taken to enforce the penalties provided by these sections, though the violations of law have been flagrant and often repeated and well known to the Comptroller of the Currency, as his reports show. I propose next to show that the Comptroller of the Currency in 1879, in his annual report, page 25, developed many of the evils growing out of this system, and appended as a note to that report a portion of the Garfield report from which I have just read. He said:

On February 19 and March 3, 1869, two extraordinary acts in reference to the business of banking were passed by the Fortieth Congress, which enactments were subsequently embodied in sections 5207 and 5208 of the Revised Statutes. The first of these sections prohibits the loaning of money upon United States or national-bank notes as collateral security, with the purpose of withdrawing such notes from use, and the latter section prohibits the certification of checks drawn upon any national bank, unless the drawer has the money actually on deposit in such bank.

The violation of the first-named section is made a misdemeanor, and punished by a fine not exceeding $1,000 and a further penalty equal to one-third of the money loaned. The officer or officers of the bank who shall make such a loan are also liable for a further penalty, equal to one-fourth of the money loaned. The penalty for the violation of the last-named section is forfeiture of the charter of the bank and the appointment of a receiver to close its affairs. It seems scarcely credible that it should have been found necessary to prohibit by positive legislation the practice by national banks located in the principal commercial city of the country of methods of business so inconsistent with the principle of good banking. But it was soon found that even this legislative prohibition was not sufficient in times of extraordinary activity in the stock board to entirely prevent the illegal certification of checks. A few months later, therefore, the Committee on Banking and Currency of the House of Representatives, after an investigation which occupied some weeks,* was instructed to inquire if any further legislation was necessary to prevent the improper certification of checks by the national banks, and to report by bill or otherwise.

In compliance with these instructions a bill was reported, which on June 19, 1870, passed the House, and which provided that any officer, clerk, or agent of any national banking association who should violate the provisions of the act of March 3, 1869, relating to certified checks, should be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and be fined not more than $5,000, or imprisoned not more than five years, or both, in the discretion of the court. This bill, like similar acts which preceded it, passed the House almost unanimously and with but little discussion. A Representative from New York City, who was also a member of the Committee on Banking and Currency, seemed to reflect the sentiment of the House and also of his constituents when he said: "I concur with my colleagues in regard to reporting this bill, after careful examination of the facts ascertained by the gold-investigating committee and of the statements made by the substantial merchants of New York—not the speculators, either in produce or gold, but the men of solid parts, the men who look to the substantial interests of the people outside as well as inside their city, men of character and propriety."

The House bill of June 19, 1870, failed to pass the Senate, but the action of the House had the effect to largely diminish, although it did not entirely put an end to, this illegal practice.†

No complaints of its renewal reached the Comptroller until recently, when his attention was called to the large increase of certified checks among the clearing-house exchanges, their amount having risen from thirty-one millions on April 4 to forty-four millions on June 14, to sixty millions on October 2, and finally to more than ninety millions on October 30 last. He was also advised of an informal conference of the presidents of some of the prominent banks, with the object of devising some plan to avoid the risk and loss of such overcertifications. It had also, about the same time, been brought to the knowledge of the Comptroller that certified checks, drawn upon an institution which was known to be largely addicted to this practice, had been refused by banks in good standing; whereupon he considered it his duty to exercise whatever power belonged to his office for the arrest and prevention of the custom complained of. He therefore, on the 29th ultimo, directed the national-bank examiner for the city of New York to examine such banks as were believed to be certifying checks illegally, and to report the facts to this office; and a separate letter was transmitted to him on the same day requesting him to consult with the clearing-house committee and to take its advice in reference to the best course to be pursued. The examiner soon after reported that nine of the city banks had at various times certified checks contrary to the provisions of the law, but that only five of them were largely given to the practice; and he added his opinion that the amount of such illegal certifications had been very much overstated by the public press.

I received from a friend in New York a portion of the report made in 1873 by the bank officers spoken of in that note condemning in most emphatic terms this system of overcertification; it is signed by many of the presidents of the leading banks, such as George L. Coe, president of American Exchange National Bank; W. L. Jenkins, president Bank of America; J. M. Morrison, president Manhattan Bank; Moses Taylor, president National City Bank, and a number of others.

I will insert in the RECORD a letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, to whom the Finance Committee sent the original bill for his opinion, together with a statement of the condition of the banks for the years 1877, 1878, 1879, 1880, and 1881, showing to what extent this illegal practice, as I consider it, has been carried on.

The papers referred to are as follows:

Just after the panic of 1873 the Associated Banks of New York appointed a committee of nine bank presidents and cashiers to take into consideration the causes of that panic and to report what reforms were necessary to increase the security of bank business. Among the bank presidents on this committee was Mr. Frederick D. Tappan, of the Gallatin National, who is quoted by the Herald of yesterday as being particularly severe on your bill. This committee reported to a meeting of the Associated Banks on the 11th of November, 1873, and among sins of banking specifically condemned by the committee was this very one of overcertifying of checks. What the committee said was this:

"The practice of certifying checks upon banks as 'good' has proved a great public convenience, and has, for that reason, grown into extensive use. Your committee approach its consideration with some embarrassment. The custom originated in the natural inquiry of bank tellers respecting the standing and habits of their dealers, and for many years it had little significance otherwise than as giving clerical information. Checks so marked were not regarded as binding upon institutions in the nature of an official acceptance, and were, therefore, not entered upon their books. It was only since about the year 1850 that a new and influential institution deemed it expedient to define the character of an act then vague and uncertain by charging such checks to the accounts of their drawers, since when they have been legally regarded as formal obligations, and have become the medium of the most important transactions. If such writing certified a real fact, that the bank actually had in possession and due from it to the drawer of the check the stated sum, which it thus agreed to transfer to another party, no possible injury but great good will ensue. But when a bank binds itself to transfer what it has not, but only expects to have, it assumes for its dealers, without reason, all the contingencies incident to human transactions, and places its shareholders under perils which they never intended to assume.

"The power of certifying checks is necessarily intrusted to clerks or subordinate officers, who are employed to perform the ordinary and mere mechanical duties of the bank, and who are supposed to be strictly limited in giving to every dealer only what has before been received from him. And the power of bestowing credit is reserved for abler and more experienced men, themselves personally identified with the interests they administer, who gravely deliberate upon every transaction and decide with the light of their united wisdom. But the practice of certifying uncovered checks as pursued in some institutions entirely reverses this established order, and while the responsible council is carefully deliberating over smaller credits, a non-commissioned officer is freely bestowing them in larger volumes without security upon comparatively irresponsible men. So extensively has this practice been pursued by several institutions that the amount of such checks which have passed daily through the clearing-house has reached in some instances to twice and three times, and in one or two to four and five times, their capital stock, and this through long periods of time.

"Every bank in the association is directly involved in the risk attending this practice. It multiplies excessively the sums which such institutions pass through the clearing-house, and the consequent balances of the exchanges with their associates, which the capital of such banks can never adequately guarantee. * * *

"No sufficient reason, in the opinion of your committee, can be given why a corporation should place itself, without compensation and special security, between two parties dealing with each other, and become the guarantor of either in transactions entirely personal to themselves, simply because one or the other is a depositor in the institution.

"We have already stated that the safe custody of money payable on demand is full compensation for its legitimate use, and the risks attending such a business are all that properly pertain to the profession of a banker; and if the rule be invariably observed of certifying checks only when the drawer has the full amount to his credit in the bank, no one can be injured or offended when he is treated in all respects like every other of his fellow dealers. The restriction suggested will work favorably to every interest—to the banks, their shareholders, and their associates—by diminishing the risks now so widely incurred; and it also conforms to and confirms the law which Congress has established upon this subject in respect to national banks.

"Your committee therefore recommend that in no case shall a check or other obligation be certified by a bank unless the amount of it is first found regularly entered to the credit of the dealer upon the books of the institution."

This report was signed by George L. Coe, president American Exchange National; W. L. Jenkins, president Bank of America; J. M. Morrison, president Manhattan Bank; Moses Taylor, president National City Bank; F. D. Tappan, president Gallatin Bank; John E. Williams, president Metropolitan National; J. L. Everett, cashier Broadway National; Robert Buck, cashier Pacific Bank; and John Q. Jones, president Chemical National.

The letter of the Secretary of the Treasury is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY.
Washington, D. C., February 13, 1882.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of Senate bill No. 976. My opinion is asked as to the propriety and necessity of the passage of it. It proposes to punish as a misdemeanor the willful violation by certain persons designated therein of a statute of the United States named in the bill. There can be but one opinion, and that affirmative, that it should be declared an offense against the criminal law to willfully violate a public statute that prohibits the doing of an act held by the legislature to be reprehensible. I should have supposed that there existed a general statute making a misdemeanor of the willful violation of any prohibitory law, but an examination of the Revised Statutes, (cursory,) I confess, does not disclose one. Hence I readily state that the passage of the bill into a law is proper.

* Reports of Committees, H. R., Forty-first Congress, Second Session—Gold panic Investigation, page 23.

† The Clearing House Association of the City of New York, which is composed of forty-five national together with thirteen State banks, to which latter associations the legislation named did not apply, took action on this subject in November, 1873, by the appointment of a committee to consider and report upon "reforms in the banking business."

Whether there is a present necessity for the passage of the bill depends upon whether there are present violations of the statute named in the bill, and this depends upon facts which, though they are to some extent in the possession of this Department, present mixed questions of law and fact. That the certification of checks is done to a large extent by the persons designated in the bill there is no doubt. If that certification is a violation of the statute there is a necessity for the bill. It will be found, however, that it is done under such arrangements or agreements as are deemed by the banks and their counsel to bring the act of certification into harmony with the letter of the statute. If that be true, then the bare enactment by Congress that a willful violation of the statute shall be a misdemeanor would not bring about any practical result, and there is no present necessity for the passage of it. I apprehend that the bill submitted to me will not effect the object of the honorable Senator who framed and introduced it. The question will still remain after the passage of the bill, Are the practices of the banks willful violations of the statute? This will be a question for a jury, under the ruling of the trial court, and it is easy to foresee that not much will be effected. In my judgment there should be inquiry into the arrangements by and under which the certifications are effected, and if those arrangements and acts of certification under them are looked upon as reprehensible, a bill should be framed that will define what particular things shall be deemed violations of the law, and they, if willful, be declared misdemeanors.

I suppose that I am not asked or expected to say anything upon the general policy involved in the bill.

Very respectfully,

CHAS. J. FOLGER, Secretary.

Hon. JUSTIN S. MORRILL,
Chairman Committee of Finance, United States Senate.

The following is the table to which I called attention:

From quarterly reports of forty-nine New York City national banks, December 31, 1881.

	Capital.	Due depositors, (including banks,) net.	Outstanding certified checks.
Eleven of the principal stock-brokers' banks	$13,200,000	$60,000,000	$100,000,000
The thirty-eight other banks, some of which also have brokers' accounts	38,150,000	228,000,000	50,000,000
Twenty-five of same banks having few or no Wall street accounts	15,750,000	123,000,000	3,800,000

One-half of whole number, being now stock-brokers' banks. Average, $5,000,000 net deposits, $152,000 certifications.

Eleven stock-brokers' banks. Average, $5,500,000 net deposits, $9,000,000 certifications.

Outstanding certified checks of New York national banks by quarterly reports at various dates, showing growth of the practice during past few years.

December, 1877	$29,000,000
December, 1878	30,000,000
December, 1879	64,000,000
December, 1880	137,000,000
December, 1881	130,000,000

Mr. BECK. That is all I care to lay before the Senate at present. The Senator from Rhode Island also desires to furnish some papers, I give way to him, before the bill is laid over.

Mr. ALDRICH. I have no intention to discuss the bill, but I ask that there may be printed with the documents submitted by the Senator from Kentucky a letter addressed to the committee by the Comptroller of the Currency, inclosing a statement in relation to the certification of checks from Mr. Tappan, the president of the Gallatin National Bank.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The matter will be printed in the RECORD.

The papers referred to are as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF COMPTROLLER OF THE CURRENCY,
Washington, March 8, 1882.

SIR: In answer to your request of the 7th instant, I inclose herewith a copy of information in reference to certified checks, which has been furnished by this office in answer to inquiries for information as to this method of doing business. In reply to your inquiry as to the total amount of loss caused by overcertification of checks by national banks since their organization, and its percentage of the aggregate losses of such banks, you are advised that in the semi-annual reports of losses in their business, made by national banks to this office, the losses on account of certified checks are not separated, and it is impossible therefore to give the information you desire. From the reports of examiners of national banks made to this office, it is estimated that the losses arising from this source are very small, as may be seen from the following extract from the report of an examination of a bank with a capital of $1,200,000: "In the matter of overcertification of checks this bank is, from the character of its depositors, undoubtedly subjected to the largest demand in this line of any bank in New York, and the plan they have adopted, after getting the best legal advice on the subject, is this: all parties who may require this kind of accommodation, and to whom the bank may be willing to grant any credit on their personal responsibility, give the bank their note on demand for the amount that may be agreed upon as safe and reasonable, and the amount of this note is at once passed through the books of the bank to the credit of the party borrowing, and at three p. m. of the same day this note is charged to the account of the borrower, and the transaction is closed. These temporary credits vary from $10,000 up to $120,000 only in any one case, and in this way the letter of the law is fully complied with, as they understand it. Every dealer requiring such credit is 'scaled' by the officers at a figure which they deem safe, and no credit is for any thing under this line. From the character of the dealers and of the officers who grant such credits they have, in my opinion, systematized this branch of business upon as safe a basis as it is possible to place a Wall street business of the magnitude of that in which a few of our banks are engaged. The business has been done heretofore without the present limited and cautious scale of figures, and the losses made by the practice are very small and do not begin to compare in amount during a long period of years past to the losses incurred by banks in the regular transacting of what passes as A 1 commercial paper of 'single name.'"

Very respectfully,

JNO. JAY KNOX, Comptroller.

Hon. JUSTIN S. MORRILL,
Chairman of Senate Finance Committee, Washington, D. C.

CERTIFICATION OF CHECKS.

A certified check is in form the ordinary check used in business, and when certified has the signature of the paying teller written across its face, inside of a stamp bearing the date of the certification and the name of the bank.

They are always presented in the clearings of the following morning, (the banks in New York not clearing the same day,) except, as may sometimes occur, they are remitted in payment of obligations due at points out of the city, in lieu of bank drafts on banks at such points. A check on a New York bank certified is receivable all over the United States as current funds, but it is not of frequent occurrence that certified checks for large amounts are used for this purpose. They can in no case be treated as a floating currency any more than the ordinary check or draft.

The practice of certification is of very old date, and has been in use for more than fifty years, and therefore antedates the establishment of the clearing-house system. Neither, therefore, is the result of the other. It arose from the multiplicity of banks, all bills receivable, due on any given day, payable on their face at other city banks, whether discounted by the bank or lodged with it for collection, were presented at the banks where the bills were made payable and certified by the bank as good. If the drawers or acceptors are in good standing the bill is certified, whether the amount is to the credit of the account or not. Bills are usually presented at the bank early in business hours in consequence of the large number of banks and their great distance from each other, but the deposits, especially those of merchants, are not made until just before the bank-closing hour, (three o'clock p. m.,) so that they may include in their deposits all checks, &c., which may be remitted to them in the later daily mails. Where bills are not made payable at bank, the banks holding such bills claim and exact in payment either current cash funds or certified checks on banks in good standing. These bills and checks then pass through the clearing-house the following morning with the other business of the day.

"Certification," though not confined to cities where clearing-houses are established, is but seldom used (or necessary) except in localities where there are several banks, and, as has been shown, was originally, and is at present more than ever, an important factor in facilitating the relations of banks with each other and with the business community. It is by no means confined to transactions at the Stock Exchange, though largely used for such purposes. In some of the large cities (Philadelphia for example) it is the custom when a check is presented to a bank for certification for the bank to pay the check by issuing to the payee its own obligation in the form of a "due bill." The principle involved is the same as in the certification of the check. In both cases the bank guarantees the amount to the payee.

When certification may be required in excess of the amount which may at the time be to the credit of the dealer, it is customary for the bank to make a temporary credit to the account covering the amount of certification, which may be needed either by a demand note of the firm needing the accommodation or by a check on another bank in which the firm may have an account. These temporary credits are canceled at the close of business, when the account has been made good. The bank does not charge a commission for this accommodation, but finds its profit in the large balances which brokers leave to their credit in bank, and on which the bank pays no interest. The practice is justified by its immense convenience, not only to the banks but to the business community generally, as by this system the use of cash in all payments may be dispensed with, and though the largest proportion of certification is done for the accommodation of the business of the Stock Exchange, it can be proved that the losses sustained by the banks in this branch of their business is not one hundredth part of the amount lost by them in discounting bills.

Mr. BECK. I am now entirely content that the bill may go over without prejudice, and at some convenient time, after the Senate has examined the papers, we can pass upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over without prejudice.

JAPANESE INDEMNITY FUND.

Mr. MORGAN. Yesterday I gave notice that to-day I would submit to the Senate in the morning hour a motion to suspend so much of the Anthony rule as confines debate to five minutes and a Senator speaking once, for the consideration of the Japanese indemnity bill, my purpose being to meet the objection, which is a very valid one, made by the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. INGALLS,] that the consideration of a bill of this magnitude should not be had under a limitation of five minutes' debate. If any Senator objects to going on with the bill to-day, I will merely ask the Senate to pass it over again by consent; so that I shall not interfere with the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution submitted yesterday by the Senator from Alabama will be read.

The Acting Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That during the 26th day of April, 1882, while the Senate is proceeding with business under the Anthony rule, the provision limiting debate to five minutes, and that a Senator shall not speak more than once, shall be suspended.

Mr. GARLAND. I suggest to the Senator to limit the resolution to the pending measure.

Mr. MORGAN. I would prefer myself to have it limited to the pending measure.

Mr. GARLAND. I think there will be no objection to that.

Mr. MORGAN. I merely offered the resolution to give notice that I would ask to have the Anthony rule suspended to-day for this purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The words "during the pending measure" will be inserted in the resolution.

Mr. COCKRELL. It is modified simply to suspend the five-minute rule for this case only?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. For the pending measure only.

Mr. INGALLS. I hardly think it would be well for the Senate to change its settled policy in regard to the consideration of cases on the Calendar for the purpose of discussing the bill to which the Senator from Alabama refers. I agree with him in thinking that matter to be one of importance, but it is of no greater importance than many other bills upon the Calendar, and if we depart from the practice which we have established, and which has thus far operated so well, and under which so much business has been transacted, more, I think, than at any previous session since I have been here, we shall, I believe, do a thing that will not comport with the interests of the public service.

I will unite with the Senator from Alabama in an early effort to secure action upon the Japanese indemnity bill. It has passed the House and is now before the Senate, so that a few days more or less cannot be regarded as seriously imperiling final and definite action on the measure. I hope that we may go on with the Calendar; and I trust, upon the suggestion, the Senator from Alabama will see the propriety of that course.

Mr. MORGAN. As I stated, if the bill is objected to I shall not insist upon it. I merely ask that it be passed over again without prejudice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution is not insisted on, and the bill will be passed over without prejudice. The first bill on the Calendar in its order will be called.

GEORGE W. SAULPAW.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 1093) for the relief of George W. Saulpaw.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The bill and the report accompanying it were read yesterday. A similar bill was passed unanimously by the Senate at the last Congress.

Mr. INGALLS. I understand from a cursory reading of the report in the case that this is a bill to pay the claimant for a steamboat that it appears, so far as I can judge from the evidence, was captured while in the confederate service by a Union gunboat. Unless I listened to the reading of the report imperfectly or have failed to gather the true state of the case from a cursory reading this morning, I should think the Senate ought to hesitate before establishing the precedent that the owner of a steamboat which was in the service of the confederate States and was captured by a Union war vessel is a lawful subject of remuneration out of the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. HOAR. Will it disturb the Senator to have me state at this point that this boat was not captured? That is not the fact. The steamer had been regained by its owner from the confederate authorities and was in his possession when it was taken by the United States for the use of the Government.

Mr. INGALLS. The statement of the colonel in charge is as follows:

> You are respectfully informed that this boat was sold by the United States marshal under a decree of confiscation, having been captured while being used for insurrectionary purposes, and was purchased by the Navy Department, and placed under the charge of Captain George D. Wise, the then quartermaster in charge of the property and accounts of the flotilla, and by him transferred to the Navy Department, October 1, 1862.

The Senator from Massachusetts says that I am incorrectly advised as to the facts in this case. I reply that the facts have been found by a competent judicial tribunal to have been as I stated them; that it is a matter of record both in the judicial and military departments of this country that the transfer was legally made by a sale by a judicial officer of the Government, and that this boat was transferred to and legally held by the Navy Department of the United States. What evidence has been adduced to controvert or overthrow the findings of the court is what does not appear from the report.

Mr. HOAR. This case was examined by the Committee on Claims very thoroughly during the last Congress, and the report is a unanimous one. It has been re-examined at the present session, and the report is a unanimous one.

I will state the facts, and there has not been a case that I know of brought before the Committee on Claims where the facts were made so absolutely clear and strong, certainly not any stronger. This boat was taken possession of by the rebels. The owner left his pilot and clerk, who were loyal men, on it. When the rebels evacuated that portion of the Tennessee River and the surrounding territory where this boat was, they sent orders to have the boat burned and destroyed. The pilot and clerk thereupon, who had remained on board for that purpose, ran the vessel away from the confederate authorities, concealed her in a creek behind an island a number of miles off, and when the Union forces entered upon that territory these persons had their boat in their complete possession without a confederate officer being, I dare say, within a hundred miles. It is a case, as the committee say in their report, where the private owner had completely delivered his boat from rebel control. The circumstances were proved by the testimony of the pilot, whose character and trustworthiness were established by several United States officers with whom he served, and the date and circumstances of the capture fully appeared in the report of Lieutenant Gwin, commanding the gunboat Tyler, dated April 23, 1862, and forwarded and indorsed by Flag-Officer Foote. Then she was taken possession of by the United States Government. Months after—I think three months after; she was in the Mississippi River, and a part of the United States flotilla, being there used—the officers on board, for the sake of getting the informer's share, made a petition to the United States court somewhere in the State of Illinois, I think at Cairo, saying that they had captured this boat; that it had been seized by George D. Wise, and that it was in the confederate service. It had no more been seized by George D. Wise than it had been seized by me. When George D. Wise first saw it and came within a hundred miles of it, it was in the United States service, and had been for months.

The United States court issued its order. In order that the decree in admiralty should be valid there should have been notice to the owners of the boat. There was in fact no notice. The United States marshal was bound by the express terms of the law to take possession of the boat in behalf of the court. [The President pro tempore rapped with his gavel.] I ask the Senate to allow me three or four minutes to complete my statement, because it will save the time of the Senate eventually.

Mr. HARRIS and others. Unanimous consent will be granted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and the Senator from Massachusetts may proceed.

Mr. HOAR. It never was taken possession of by the marshal; it never could be taken possession of by the marshal, for it was a part of the United States fleet at the time; and the marshal received a certificate from a subordinate officer of that boat while it was in the United States service that he had taken it and received it as the agent or keeper. That certificate was as invalid as if it had been given by a cabin-boy or a cook; and it was as palpably a fraud on this process. If the Senator will look at the letters where the explanations are asked for of these officers he will see that that must be so. Here is a letter from one of the persons who took part in this proceeding to another. The decree was wholly erroneous and void, as is settled by half a dozen cases cited by the committee from the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States:

> The property must remain in the custody of the marshal, so that he can deliver it to the highest bidder, if it be purchased under the decree of sale. But the return itself sufficiently shows that no such seizure was or could have been made. The gunboat was in the actual service of the United States, in command of an officer who retained possession. The receipt of Captain Wise, made part of the return, declares that—

The court having declared that there must be a taking possession by the marshal in order to make the decree valid, the receipt of Captain Wise is this:

> the boat is now in the service of the United States as a gunboat on the Western waters, which I agree to deliver as hereafter may be decreed by the judge of the district court aforesaid, if in my power and consistent with my duty to the United States.

The committee go on to say:

> It clearly was not in his power or consistent with his duty to make such delivery. This consent or receipt no more transferred the possession of the gunboat from the United States to the marshal than would a like document executed by the cook or cabin-boy.
> We think, therefore, the owner's title to his boat has never been lawfully divested.

The boat remained with its use unchanged to the close of the war, then was sold at a general auction sale of the Mississippi flotilla when the war ended. It does not give the price at which it was sold at auction.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Yes, it was sold for over $9,000.

Mr. HOAR. But we only give $7,000. We say there may have been some repairs which increased the cash value of the boat, and the formal sale had been $4,000 and the actual sale $9,000. We propose to allow $7,000. That is the whole story.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I understood the Senator to say that the report did not state what the boat sold for.

Mr. HOAR. No; I say we have not given it to the claimant by the bill.

Mr. INGALLS. May I have consent to say a few words?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. INGALLS. I desire to suggest, in reply to the observations made by the Senator from Massachusetts, that if the facts are as he states, then there was ample grounds for vacating the proceedings of the court; and that having been done if the property was shown to have passed beyond the jurisdiction of the court, the claimant could then have come here with some reasonable ground for application for relief. But to come here by extraneous evidence and to attempt to controvert and to contradict a solemn declaration and findings of a court of justice which had decreed by due process of law the sale of this property, and say that without any hearing whatever the claimant shall be reimbursed from the Treasury of the United States is establishing a precedent that is vicious in theory and will be pernicious in practice. I protest against it.

Mr. HOAR. I move to strike out the last word of the bill, and on that motion I ask leave to be heard.

The committee carefully considered the suggestion which the honorable Senator from Kansas has just made. I am not sure whether he read the part of the report where we dealt with that. We were satisfied that this being a mere judgment in rem, without notice to the owner—for he never had been a party—it was wholly void and erroneous, and it did not require, therefore, from him that he should go to a court in a distant State and make formal application to set it aside.

I think that a clear proposition of law, and I took very great pains to examine and satisfy myself about it, consulting among others the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, who has some knowledge of the parties. We found that the decree was entirely erroneous and void on the authorities cited. But if it was not, then comes the question whether the United States by this evidence coming from the Departments on which we rest, not being the ex parte affidavit of the petitioner or affidavits made by persons in his interest, but official records in the possession of the Government communicated to us by the Navy Department, we thought it to be not proper to insist upon a mere technicality that the man should go first to the court and ask to have set aside the decree of a court of admiralty made years ago when he never was a party, and when the proceeds of the sale of the property by the United States are actually in the Treasury.

Mr. INGALLS. No, one-half went to the informer.

Mr. HOAR. That is partly true and partly not. There was a pretended claim by an informer; there never was any sale by the marshal, but there was nominally a sale for $1,000, so that the informer got his half, $2,000. The sale at the close of the war being for $9,000, that money went into the Treasury. That was an actual sale for which cash was received. We propose to pay the man $7,000, $2,000 less; so that the United States in reality does not lose a dollar, because it sold the vessel for $2,000 more than we give this man. That $2,000 was all the informer got. Candor requires me to say that the Government loses so much as went into that $9,000 of the improvements put on the boat in the mean time for its use by the United States; but against that the owner of the property gets neither interest nor any compensation whatever for the use of this boat for several years by the United States Government. Thus the United States Government is a gainer by this whole transaction.

Mr. INGALLS. What does the Government make out of it?

Mr. HOAR. It makes the use of a valuable gunboat for three or four years. That is what it makes.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CITADEL ACADEMY AT CHARLESTON.

The bill (S. No. 1477) to empower the Secretary of War to audit the claim of the State of South Carolina for rent alleged to be due for the use and occupation of the Citadal Academy at Charleston was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. INGALLS. Is there a report in that case?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes, sir.

Mr. INGALLS. Let it be read.

The Acting Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. HAMPTON March 15:

> The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the "memorial of T. J. Mackey, in behalf of the State of South Carolina, praying that the Court of Claims may be authorized to adjudicate the claim of said State for rent of the Citadel Academy," beg leave to submit the following report:
> After full consideration of the memorial, your committee came to the conclusion that the proper way to have this claim examined and reported on was by giving to the Secretary of War the necessary authority to do so. The committee therefore report by accompanying bill, recommending its passage.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. CONGER. The report gives no statement of the character of this claim. I do not understand what the proposition is in regard to it. I should like to hear some one state what the character of the claim is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill was reported by the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. HAMPTON.]

Mr. CONGER. I heard the report read, but the report gives no statement of the nature of the claim.

Mr. HAMPTON. The facts of this case are these: the Citadel Academy at Charleston was occupied as a barracks for some time by the United States troops. During the occupation one wing of the academy was burned down. Several years passed. The question is whether the Government should pay a rental for the occupation of that building. A memorial was presented from the State the other day asking that the case be referred to the Court of Claims. That memorial was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and we came to the conclusion that it was best to leave the whole matter with the Secretary of War, and in accordance with that a bill, which met the unanimous approval of the committee, was brought in here which simply leaves the whole power to liquidate the matter to the Secretary of War. I think that is the fairest disposition, the most proper and most expeditious, and I see no objection to it.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

ALBEMARLE AND CHESAPEAKE CANAL.

The bill (S. No. 1478) for the relief of the Albemarle and Chesapeake Canal Company was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Navy to investigate the claim of the Albemarle and Chesapeake Canal Company, for tolls on vessels transporting naval supplies, and to award such sum as he may find equitably due, not to exceed $3,742.20, in full payment of all claims of the company against the Government.

Mr. INGALLS. Let us hear the report read.

The Acting Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. MAHONE March 15:

> The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the memorial of the Albemarle and Chesapeake Canal Company, asking compensation for the use of said canal for the passage of naval vessels through the same from January 10, 1864, to July 27, 1866, report as follows:
>
> Your committee, after a full consideration of the subject, have agreed to report a bill for the relief of the Albemarle and Chesapeake Canal Company, and have adopted the following report made to the Senate on April 14, 1880:
> "The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 626) for the relief of the Albemarle and Chesapeake Canal Company, report the same for favorable consideration of the Senate. The committee have adopted the report made by the Committee on Naval Affairs February 6, 1878, as expressive of their views. The same is hereby submitted:
> "[Senate Report No. 74, Forty-fifth Congress, second session.]
>
> "The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom were referred the memorial and bill presented by the Albemarle and Chesapeake Canal Company, have had the same under consideration, and submit the following report:
> "This subject was duly considered by the Committee on Naval Affairs of the Senate at the first session of the Forty-fourth Congress, and a bill was favorably reported to and passed by the Senate, but failed to pass the House of Representatives. The reasons which governed that committee seem equally cogent now, and this committee adopts the reasoning of the former report, as follows:
>
> "'The Albemarle and Chesapeake Canal Company, as disclosed by the papers, was in process of construction when the war broke out. Much of its capital stock and all of its bonds were held by a Mr. Cartwright and other Northern capitalists. When the Government forces obtained possession of that country between Elizabeth River and Albemarle Sound, after many propositions for the United States to advance money to open the canal and keep it in order, all of which failed, the bondholders put it in condition for use and it was largely used by the War Department and tolls duly paid by agreement. In October, 1862, a specific contract was made, by which the United States was to allow the present rates on tonnage of vessels and boats in full, less 10 per cent. for all troops, &c.
> "'The canal company was paid on the Government vessels up to March, 1863. No payment was made by the War Department for tonnage after April, 1863. The use of the canal by vessels in the service of the Navy Department (upon which the present claim is founded) was not considered by the War Department. The canal company now claim as due from the Navy Department for tolls from January 10, 1864, to July 27, 1866, the sum of $4,158, less 10 per cent., making the net claim $3,742.20. The Navy Department refused to pay this claim on account of the act of July 4, 1864, the provisions of which authorized the Quartermaster-General and Commissary-General of Subsistence to examine similar claims, but which have conferred no such power on the Navy Department. While the passage of the act before cited did not, in the opinion of the committee, preclude the Navy Department from passing upon this claim and having it paid, (its correctness being easily verified by the records of that Department,) yet, for the purpose of relieving the case of all difficulty, the committee report the accompanying bill and recommend its passage.'"

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RAILWAY COMPANIES' ACCOUNTS.

The bill (S. No. 150) to provide for the settlement of accounts with certain railway companies was announced as next in order.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. That is an adverse report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] wish anything done with the bill?

Mr. HOAR. I know no reason why the bill should not be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. HARRIS. At whose request was it put on the Calendar?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Calendar does not state.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. It was not a unanimous report, and the majority have filed their views in regard to the matter, so that there are two sides to the question.

Mr. HARRIS. Let the bill remain, as we do not know what Senator asked to have it put on the Calendar, and he may not be in his seat.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. HOAR. This is a case in which the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. JACKSON] was one of the Senators who joined in the minority report; and he desires to discuss the bill. He is absent in Tennessee. Let it stand on the Calendar without prejudice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered.

THE GRAIN-SHOVEL PATENT.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 1057) for the relief of George Milsom, Henry Spendelow, and George V. Watson.

Mr. CONGER. Let the report in that case be read.

Mr. HAWLEY. I am requested by certain constituents to oppose that bill; and I beg that it may lie over.

Mr. PLATT. I hope my colleague will consent that it go over without prejudice.

Mr. HAWLEY. Certainly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over without prejudice.

WILLIAM ORNDORFF.

The bill (S. No. 1283) granting a pension to William Orndorff was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is reported adversely by the Committee on Pensions. The adverse report was reconsidered on motion of the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. GROOME,] who is not here. The bill will be passed over.

HYACINTHE ROBERT AGNEL.

The bill (S. No. 602) for the relief of the heirs and legal representatives of Hyacinthe Robert Agnel, deceased, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, in line 9, after the word "ascertained," to strike out "with legal interest thereon from the time of such payment by the said deceased;" so as to make the bill read:

> Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to examine into, ascertain, and determine the value of the construction of certain quarters at the United States Military Academy at West Point which was heretofore paid for by Hyacinthe Robert Agnel, deceased, late professor of the French language at said Military Academy; and the amount so ascertained shall be paid, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, to the heirs and legal representatives of the said Hyacinthe Robert Agnel, deceased: Provided, That the amount so to be paid shall not exceed the sum of $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report be read.

The Acting Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. SEWELL March 17:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 602) for the relief of the heirs and legal representatives of Hyacinthe Robert Agnel, deceased, have considered the same, and respectfully report:

That the late Hyacinthe Robert Agnel was a professor at the United States Military Academy at West Point; that he did, by permission of the Ordnance Department, construct certain additions to the permanent quarters at said post for the use of his family.

Under an appropriation subsequently made, similar additions to other quarters at that post were constructed at a much greater expense. The cost attending the construction of the additions made to his quarters by Professor Agnel was a saving to the Government of an amount equal to the difference of expenditure between his own and the additions made to the other quarters at that post.

The following communications fully explain the case, and are herewith made a part of this report:

"WAR DEPARTMENT, ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
"Washington, February 4, 1882.

"SIR: The communication of Hon. WILLIAM J. SEWELL, of Committee on Military Affairs, United States Senate, of the 30th ultimo, submitting for your opinion Senate bill 602, for relief of heirs of Professor H. R. Agnel (deceased) for construction of certain quarters at West Point, is herewith returned, with copies of the following papers, on file in this office, relating to the subject:

"1. The Superintendent to the Chief of Engineers, dated September 24, 1848.
"2. The Chief of Engineers to the Superintendent, dated October 20, 1848.
"3. Professor Agnel to Lieutenant Q. A. Gillmore, dated May 28, 1856.
"4. Lieutenant Q. A. Gillmore to the Superintendent, dated August 29, 1856.
"5. The Superintendent to the Chief of Engineers, dated August 30, 1856.
"6. The Chief of Engineers (indorsement) to Superintendent, dated October 8, 1856.

"Subsequent to the return of the papers to the Superintendent by indorsement of the Chief of Engineers, dated October 8, 1856, there does not appear to have been any further correspondence in relation to the claim until February 20, 1871, when the Superintendent forwarded for the action of the inspector of the Military Academy a petition in behalf of the widow of Professor Agnel for reimbursement of the amount expended by him in the construction of the addition to his quarters. The petition was returned to the Superintendent by the inspector, February 23, 1871, 'the case appearing beyond the reach of any other than Congressional relief.'

"I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
"R. C. DRUM, Adjutant-General.

"The honorable the SECRETARY OF WAR.

"UNITED STATES MILITARY ACADEMY,
"West Point, New York, September 24, 1848.

"SIR: Professor Agnel wishes to put up an addition to the house he occupies at the post. This he proposes to do at his own expense, provided he can be furnished with the stone for the basement or cellar, and have the materials for the whole structure hauled from the public wharf to the ground on which the building is to be erected.

"The addition proposed by Professor Agnel is a tenement of two stories above the cellar, 21 by 26 feet, to be constructed of bricks or wood, and to join on to the main building in a similar manner as Professor Weir's studio is connected with his house.

"As the contemplated structure would become the property of the Government and add to the value of the present building, besides affording more ample accommodations to Professor Agnel, whose family is large, I beg to recommend that permission be granted to put up the addition upon the terms proposed by the professor.

"I have the honor to be, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
"HENRY BREWERTON,
"Captain Corps of Engineers,
"Superintendent Military Academy.

"As Professor Agnel desires to put up the building immediately, an early answer to this communication is requested.

"HENRY BREWERTON.

"Brigadier-General JOSEPH G. TOTTEN,
"Chief Engineer, Washington, D. C.

"ENGINEER DEPARTMENT,
"Washington, October 20, 1848.

"SIR: I have the honor to inform you that the recommendation contained in your letter of the 24th ultimo, that Professor Agnel be allowed to put up an addition to the house he now occupies at West Point, has been approved, subject to the conditions and restrictions mentioned by you.

"I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
JOS. G. TOTTEN,
Brt. Brig. Gen. and Chief of Engineers.

"Captain H. BREWERTON,
"Corps of Engineers, Supt. Mil. Academy, West Point, N. Y.

"UNITED STATES MILITARY ACADEMY,
"West Point, May 28, 1856.

"SIR: In compliance with a request of the Superintendent I take the liberty to submit to you a statement of the cost of an addition to my quarters, put up at private expense in 1848. You will please observe that the original contract specifies 'no interior finish to basement.' This basement now consists of a large dining room and convenient pantry, which I subsequently had finished at an expense of $179.59, as per receipts inclosed.

"Cost of addition, at private expense, to the quarters of Professor H. R. Agnel:

For building addition, carpenter's and mason's work, with the exception of finishing basement, as per contract with J. Nixon, of Fallsville (contract and receipt annexed)	$600 00
Deduction for non fulfillment of certain specifications of original contract	100 00
	500 00
To Daniel Sweezy, carpenter, for finishing basement, as per receipts annexed	109 10
To Joseph Coar, mason, for mason's work in basement, as per receipts annexed	70 49
Blinds for addition	40 00
	719 59

"Upon comparison of dimensions it will be found that the wing I have built gives me much more room than would be afforded by the additions now in progress, and this independently of a large basement and adjoining pantry.

"In consideration of these facts I would respectfully request that action be taken upon the statement and vouchers I herewith inclose, with a view to reimbursement from the recent appropriation for additions to professors' quarters.

"I remain, your obedient servant,
"H. R. AGNEL,
"Professor of French and German, United States Military Academy.

"Lieutenant Q. A. GILLMORE,
"Quartermaster, U. S. M. A.

"WEST POINT, NEW YORK, August 29, 1856.

"DEAR SIR: I would like to see the subject of reimbursing Professor Agnel for the expenses of his addition attended to before I leave, as his receipts, &c., have been some time in my hands.

"I think $650 would be a fair and liberal allowance.

"To save time and avoid trouble, I recommend the following method of procedure:

"Estimate for all the materials in the building and purchase them of Professor Agnel at the highest market price. They will probably amount to about $400.

"The balance to be paid out of the post fund, transferring an equal amount from the 'appropriation' for the additions to that for 'repairs and improvements.'

"By this means the price of the addition will be paid from the proper funds.

"The transaction is equivalent to a transfer of about $250 from the 'post fund' to repairs and improvements.

"But as the repairs of the Canterbury road and the improvements at the cemetery might with propriety have been charged to the post fund, I would charge them both to 'repairs and improvements,' and thus keep matters even.

"As a new house is commenced, funds under the latter head should be used with a sparing hand.

"Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
"Q. A. GILLMORE.

"Major J. G. BARNARD,
"Superintendent Military Academy.

"UNITED STATES MILITARY ACADEMY,
"West Point, August 30, 1856.

"Several years ago Professor Agnel, finding his quarters insufficient for the accommodation of his family, built, with the approbation of the superintendent and War Department, and by the assistance of a friend in New York, who, as he says, advanced him the money, an addition to his quarters, of about the same magnitude as those we have built for Professors Mahan, Bartlett, &c. It is, however, a frame construction, instead of brick, and is therefore less costly than those mentioned.

"Professor Agnel would be entitled to an enlargement of his original quarters from the appropriation recently made for this object. It seems equitable, therefore, that according to his desire the enlargement actually made by him should be assumed and made public property.

"By the papers herewith it will be seen that the original cost of the addition was $719.59. Lieutenant Gillmore, quartermaster, has examined the construction and estimates $656 as a 'fair and liberal allowance.'

"This sum is much less than those we are expending on the quarters of the other professors, and as Professor Agnel will be entirely satisfied with this arrangement instead of another construction, I would recommend that it be adopted.

"If approved, please state in what manner the payment can be effected, so as to cause no difficulty at the Treasury in passing the accounts.

"I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
"J. G. BARNARD,
"Superintendent Military Academy.

"P. S.—Please return Professor Agnel's papers.

"Respectfully returned to the Adjutant-General of the Army.

"The addition referred to was attached to one of the three double sets of stone quarters, occupied by professors, and located at the north end of the post.

"The set formerly occupied by Professor Agnel has been since occupied—first, by his successor, Professor G. L. Andrews; second, in 1874, by Major A. B. Gardner, judge-advocate, then professor of laws, until he was relieved in 1878; and since that time by Professor G. N. Lieber, judge-advocate, professor of law. The addition built by Professor Agnel has been in use by these officers until destroyed by fire on the 30th March, 1881. It has since been rebuilt of brick.

"All the other points of information asked for are contained in the inclosed papers.

"Corresponding additions have existed upon the other stone quarters for many years.

"O. O. HOWARD,
"Brt. Maj. Gen. U. S. A., Superintendent, Commanding."

The committee recommend the passage of the bill with an amendment striking out all allowance for interest on the claim.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AMSTERDAM EXHIBITION.

The joint resolution (S. R. No. 52) authorizing the Government of the United States to accept the invitation of the Government of the Netherlands to take part in a general colonial and export-trade exhibition to be held in Amsterdam in the year 1883 was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The preamble recites that the Government of the Netherlands has extended to the Government of the United States an invitation to take part in a general colonial and export-trade exhibition to be held in Amsterdam in the year 1883. The resolution to provide for the acceptance of the invitation and the representation of the United States in the exhibition proposes to appropriate $7,000 to effect the purpose.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

SAINT CROIX RIVER.

The bill (H. R. No. 813) to amend section 5254, title 63, Revised Statutes of the United States, concerning the use of piers and cribs in the Mississippi River, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to amend section 5254 of the Revised Statutes by adding, after the words "Mississippi River," in the first line of the section, the words "and the Saint Croix River in the States of Wisconsin and Minnesota."

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CHAPLAIN M. J. KELLY AND OTHERS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 1712) for the relief of Chaplain M. J. Kelly and others. It proposes to direct the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to settle with M. J. Kelly, late a chaplain in the United States Army, and with all commissioned and non-commissioned officers and privates of Company B, Twentieth Infantry Regiment of the United States Army, who lost their personal effects by fire at Fort Ripley, Minnesota, on the 14th of January, 1877, at a sum not to exceed in the aggregate $709.34.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HEIRS OF WILLIAM R. DOWNING.

The bill (S. No. 1340) for the relief of the heirs-at-law of William R. Downing, deceased, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, in line 3, after the word "Treasury," to strike out "in settling and adjusting" and insert "be, and they are hereby, authorized to audit and adjust;" in line 7, before "and," to strike out "be;" in line 9, after "volunteers," to strike out "with" and insert "such amount, not exceeding;" and in line 10, after the word "dollars," to insert "that may be shown he is justly entitled to of;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, &c., That the proper accounting officers of the Treasury be, and they are hereby, authorized to audit and adjust the accounts of William R. Downing, deceased, late a captain and assistant quartermaster of United States volunteers, and are hereby authorized and directed to credit said William R. Downing, deceased, late a captain and assistant quartermaster of United States volunteers, such amount, not exceeding $10,000, that may be shown he is justly entitled to of Government funds received by him from Major R. E. Clarey, chief quartermaster of the Mountain Department, on July 3, 1862, and paid out by him, on the same day, to H. W. Gwinner, collecting agent of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, for transportation, the proper vouchers for said payment having been lost or destroyed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended; and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HOMESTEAD SETTLEMENTS.

The bill (S. No. 1515) to shorten the time required to acquire homesteads on the public domain was announced as next in order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let that go over.

Mr. PLUMB. I should be glad to have the Senator from Vermont state his objection if he has any, and, at all events, let the bill go over without prejudice. It is a matter of a good deal of importance to people living on the frontier.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not think five years any too long. There are more frauds committed under this homestead business, I understand, than almost any other department of the public lands, people making locations, as they call them, then pushing out and making another. I would not require of the actual homestead people five minutes, if I knew they were going to stay and really build up a homestead. This is one of those general questions of public policy that I do not think fall within the proper provision of the Anthony rule.

Mr. PLUMB. The Senator is mistaken as to one feature of the frauds there are under the law. It is not possible for a man to take two homesteads under the law as it now is. A man who has once taken a homestead has exhausted his right, and cannot take another one at all——

Mr. EDMUNDS. Unless he changes his name.

Mr. PLUMB. Unless, as the Senator from Vermont says, he changes his name, and commits perjury as well. If the Senator insists on his objection, I ask that the bill remain on the Calendar, subject to be called up at any time. I think it is a very important measure and ought to be passed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It may be passed over without prejudice, if that does not mean that it is to come up to-morrow morning before I get here.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It may be called up at any time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. As of right?

Mr. INGALLS. Of right.

Mr. PLUMB. I will say simply so far as I am concerned that I have no objection to the Senator from Vermont being here to state his objection, and I will not call it up in his absence unless he should take a notion to be absent longer than he ought to be.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I never take that notion. With that understanding I have no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over without prejudice.

DES MOINES RIVER LANDS.

The bill (S. No. 680) to quiet title of settlers on the Des Moines River lands, in the State of Iowa, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. LAPHAM. I object to the consideration of that bill.

Mr. McDILL. I hope, then, it will be passed over without prejudice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the Senator from New York willing that it shall go over without prejudice?

Mr. LAPHAM. I am not. It is impossible to consider this bill under this rule.

Mr. INGALLS. I should like to have the bill acted on. It will not only give peace of mind to settlers on the Des Moines River lands, but to many Senators.

Mr. LAPHAM. I will state one fact which it seems to me ought to control. The Judiciary Committee of the Senate reported unanimously against this bill at the last session, and that is enough of itself to show that it is a measure which cannot be considered under this rule.

Mr. McDILL. I ask that it be passed over without prejudice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York objects to that.

Mr. LAPHAM. This bill cannot be discussed under this rule. It will require hours to discuss it.

Mr. ALLISON. This is a very important bill and it ought to be disposed of one way or the other at an early day. Here are four thousand or five thousand people hanging upon a bill pending in the Senate. If this bill is to be decided adversely to them they ought to know it. Therefore I trust, if it is to be taken out of the Anthony rule, that an early day will be agreed upon by the Senate for its consideration. It will not take a great while. I shall be glad to hear the Senator from New York on this question at length, and other Senators who wish to speak about it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is for the pleasure of the Senate to decide what shall be the order of business. The next case will be called. This is passed over generally on objection.

Mr. McDILL. I want to ask a question about the effect of passing it over in this way. Does it go to the foot of the Calendar?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No, it retains its place on the Calendar, but it is taken out of the operation of the Anthony rule. It must be called up like any other matter.

Mr. McDILL. By a majority vote?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes, sir.

DR. A. SIDNEY TEBBS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 296) for the relief of Dr. A. Sidney Tebbs.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think that involves one of those general questions about the restoration of people engaged in the rebellion to the Army.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the amendment be read, and the Senate will understand it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment reported by the Committee on Military Affairs will be read.

The ACTING SECRETARY. The committee report to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That section 1218 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will some Senator read section 1218? I think I remember that section. I object to the present consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill goes over.

Mr. GARLAND. Can it not go over without prejudice?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It can unless there is objection.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That bill involves a very broad general question in respect to which one committee of this body is now charged with four or five bills to do something that will generalize the whole question; and until that committee reports or is discharged, I do not think we ought to do it piecemeal. Therefore I object simply.

Mr. GARLAND. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of this bill.

At the last session of Congress a bill came in here to the same purport to remove the disability of a young man in Maryland whose name I do not now remember, under section 1218. When that came up for consideration the Senator from Vermont said we had better do the thing as an entirety. I then moved on that suggestion a substitute to repeal section 1218. It was recommitted and came back here in the shape this bill comes, but at the solicitation of the Senator from Maryland I withdrew that amendment and the Senate passed the bill for the relief of that young man, Heiskell I believe.

At this session the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. HAMPTON] reported in favor of Dr. Tebbs, and the Senator from Kansas [Mr.

INGALLS] I think made the same suggestion, that if we were going to do this we had better do it as a whole, and not by piecemeal. I then offered an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert a clause repealing section 1218. Now the question is presented before the Senate as broadly as it can be, and I think we might just as well act on it now as at any other time. I move to proceed with the consideration of the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. On that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. McMILLAN. May I inquire of the Senator from Arkansas whether the subject is not now referred to a committee to pass on the question?

Mr. GARLAND. It has been referred there regularly, I think, for about four months and twenty-six days by a proposition of the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] who makes it his business, I believe, to introduce it the first thing at every session of Congress.

Mr. McMILLAN. The committee have not reported?

Mr. GARLAND. And I do not know that they will report. I have no assurance that they will. The question is here now; let us dispose of it.

Mr. BECK. I have endeavored for four years to get a hearing on this subject, and I think we had better have it now.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, as I have asked for the yeas and nays on the question of setting aside the rule to proceed to the consideration of this bill, I will simply read the section which the bill proposes to repeal:

SEC. 1218. No person who has served in any capacity in the military, naval, or civil service of the so-called Confederate States, or of either of the States in insurrection during the late rebellion, shall be appointed to any position in the Army of the United States.

That was the act of July 28, 1866. As this bill proposes to repeal that section, I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion to proceed to consider it.

Mr. BECK. That means this: that no boy who was a page in the Tennessee Legislature can now offer to join the Army of the United States.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not propose to discuss the merits of this question on this motion, as it is not in order.

Mr. BECK. That is the case. A Senator can serve here, though he may have been in the confederate army; but a boy who had to work as a page in the legislature is barred by this section from an appointment in the Army.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Discussion of the merits is not in order on this motion. The motion is, that notwithstanding the objection of the Senator from Vermont, the Senate proceed to the consideration of this bill.

Mr. INGALLS. If that motion prevails, the bill will then be under consideration under the Anthony rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No sir, not at all.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from Vermont says "No, sir." I think yes, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Under the Anthony rule one objection carries a bill over. Then it is in the power of the Senate, notwithstanding the Anthony rule, and outside of it, to take up any bill it pleases, because the rule says "unless, upon motion, the Senate shall otherwise order." Having, therefore, without the Anthony rule, taken up this bill, it is the business before the Senate, and it is open to discussion and debate in the regular way. That has always been the construction of the Anthony rule down to within a week or two, so far as I know.

Mr. HOAR. This is a very important question, and I desire to say that I never consented, for one, to the Anthony rule, for which I voted, on any other understanding than that stated by the Senator from Vermont. As I understand it, the Senate has from the beginning of the Government insisted upon it that it should not be in the power of a majority to establish a previous question, or a limitation of debate, like an hour rule; that the representatives of the States here were entitled, and that it was for the public interest that they should continue to be entitled, to present their views upon all public questions at such length as the duty of the individual Senator should seem to him to require; that no measure should be passed by this body without that opportunity. When it was proposed by Mr. Clay, in the year 1842, to establish the hour rule, and afterwards to establish the previous question, the Democratic minority threatened to resist by force and unto death, if need be, rather than to submit to that; and the proposition was abandoned.

Now, the Anthony rule is only consistent with that theory so long as the right of every individual Senator to interpose his single objection to the consideration of a case under it is preserved undiminished. If, under the Anthony rule, a measure may be taken up, and in spite of an individual objection the Senate be compelled to proceed under the five-minute limitation of debate, as I understand is the judgment of the Senator from Kansas, then not an hour rule but a five-minute rule is established in this body at the pleasure of a majority.

Mr. INGALLS. There are two aspects of the Anthony rule in connection with which the question of objection arises:

Resolved, That at the conclusion of the morning business for each day, unless, upon motion, the Senate shall at any time otherwise order, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the Calendar of Bills and Resolutions, and continue such consideration until two o'clock.—

I understand that at the expiration of the morning business, unless there is an expression of a contrary opinion by a majority of the Senate, we proceed to the consideration of the Calendar under the Anthony rule, limiting debate to five minutes, and the objection must be entered at the expiration of the morning business. If it is not interposed then we proceed until two o'clock. Then—

and the objection may be interposed at any stage of the proceedings, unless, upon motion, the Senate shall otherwise order.

That is to say, if any Senator objects to the consideration of a bill upon the Calendar under the Anthony rule the question upon the motion, for instance of the Senator from Arkansas, is, Will the Senate proceed to consider this bill under the Anthony rule, notwithstanding the objection of the Senator from Vermont? That is obviously the only sensible and reasonable interpretation.

Mr. FERRY. But the Senator from Kansas cannot contend that if the Senate otherwise order, it shall be confined to the Anthony rule. The very object of the rule in providing that the Senate may otherwise order is that when the Senate otherwise orders the bill shall be considered outside of the Anthony rule.

Mr. INGALLS. At the expiration of morning business this morning, at half-past twelve, or whatever time it was, there was no objection to the consideration of the cases on the Calendar under the Anthony rule. Therefore the rule became operative, and must by the operation of the previous action of the Senate continue until two o'clock. Then all the rights that any individual Senator had under that rule are by virtue of an objection to the consideration of a particular case, and the rule provides that the Senate may, notwithstanding an objection of an individual Senator, proceed to consider a case that has been reached on the Calendar; but how? Certainly under the provisions of the Anthony rule, because that continues from the expiration of morning business until two o'clock unless otherwise ordered at the expiration of morning business.

Mr. FERRY. The theory of the rules of the Senate is to give the Senate entire latitude in the proceedings of the body. Now, if the position taken by the Senator from Kansas is correct, during the two hours the Senate can be tied up to the Anthony rule. The President will see and the Senate will see that the rule provides that at any stage whatever an objection not only can be made but a motion to consider a bill outside of the Anthony rule. If that be the case, if such a motion has been made, it goes outside of the Anthony rule because it is the order of the Senate. The Senate are satisfied that they are not willing to consider it under the five-minute rule, and therefore order that it shall be considered otherwise. If that is not the case, we are tied up here for two hours, and that is not the object. The very illustration of the Senator from Kansas proves that it is not the object.

Mr. ALLISON. I know, Mr. President, as little perhaps of the rules of this body as any Senator in it; but if the construction put upon this rule by the Senator from Kansas is the true construction, then I shall vote to annihilate this rule at the earliest opportunity.

Mr. MORRILL. It places every bill on the Calendar under the five-minute rule.

Mr. ALLISON. I thank the Senator from Vermont for telling me what I was about to say. Every single bill will be decided under this Anthony rule, if that be true. The Senator from New York [Mr. LAPHAM] a moment ago rose in his place and said he objected to the consideration of a bill which is of great importance to the people of my State. Why? He said it could not be debated under the Anthony rule. I sat down, as did my colleague, quietly after the statement of the Senator from New York, and made no motion with reference to that bill, because I regard it as an injustice to a Senator to force upon the Senate the consideration of a bill under the five-minute rule when longer debate is required. But if we are to have now every question decided under a five-minute debate, I give notice that as soon as the Senator from Arkansas finishes his bill I shall move myself to take up the bill which was just objected to by the Senator from New York and have it considered under this five-minute rule. If we are to have a gag in reference to debate in this Chamber let us have it upon important bills as well as upon bills having no importance in principle.

Mr. FERRY. If the Senator from Iowa will allow me, if this view is to obtain does it not put it in the power of a single Senator to arrest legislation here within the two hours by his objection?

Mr. ALLISON. I only wish to say, in response to the suggestions made by the Senator from Kansas, that when I agreed to this Anthony rule I agreed to it with the understanding in my own mind that it was only to apply to such business before this body as received the unanimous consent of the Senate for its consideration; and if that is not the Anthony rule, then I give notice that I shall move its repeal to-morrow.

Mr. BECK. I know perhaps even less than the Senator from Iowa about the rules; but I know this much, that if the position taken by the Senator from Kansas is not correct I can get up in my seat and dispose of this Calendar in twenty minutes by just saying every time a bill is called "I object; go on." We can call every case on the Calendar before two o'clock and have it disposed of in that way, so that one man can be as great an obstructionist on the other side and a good deal more than he would be if the Senator from Kansas is correct.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If my friend from Kentucky will allow me, I submit to him that he is mistaken. If one man objects to a bill it only takes it out of the Anthony rule, but then the Senate by a majority vote can take it up under the general rules of the Senate. That does not gag debate, but it enables a majority to stick to that bill until they have disposed of it.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, what is the office of an objection under the Anthony rule? Its whole object and purpose is to stop the consideration of the bill objected to for the time being; but the rule provides that when the objection is interposed, and by that method further consideration is stopped, any Senator may move to proceed to the consideration notwithstanding the objection. If a majority of the Senate shall order that we proceed, I think the construction of the Senator from Kansas is precisely right, to proceed under the rule. The only necessity for the motion is to relieve the Senate from the objection of a Senator, and the only office of that objection is to stop consideration under the Anthony rule. Now, when a majority of the Senate say "notwithstanding the objection we will proceed," I submit that we are proceeding under the general provisions of the rule, subject to each Senator's right to speak once and for five minutes only.

That was the construction of the Chair; for I remember to have raised the question of order myself, and the President of the Senate decided that the Anthony rule prevailed as to the number of times a Senator might speak and the length of time he should speak; and on a very careful examination of the rule afterward I became satisfied that the Chair was right, and I am still so satisfied.

Mr. FERRY. I hope the Senator from Tennessee will not commit the Chair in advance by embarrassing him on the decision of a point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is not embarrassed.

Mr. FERRY. I see the Chair is not.

Mr. HARRIS. I am quite sure that the Chair will decide the question according to the convictions of the Chair, regardless of what may be said on the floor.

Mr. FERRY. The Anthony rule is either complete of itself or it is of no force whatever. The Senator from Kentucky has properly stated the force of the rule. It is simply to go to the Calendar and proceed to all cases where there is no objection. If that is not the meaning it puts it in the power of any Senator to prevent the consideration of any question on the Calendar, and, as the Senator from Kentucky has stated, he can clear the Calendar by successive objections to every bill that may be called up. Now, the rule provides that we can consider every case on the Calendar unless otherwise ordered, and the object of that is to leave it to the Senate—not to the judgment of any one single objector, but the judgment of the Senate—to say whether they will, outside of the Anthony rule, consider under the general rules of the Senate a measure to which objection has been raised by one Senator.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to inquire if the Senator from Michigan claims that there is any method by which a majority of the Senate can under this rule pass a measure limiting every Senator to speak but once and that for five minutes? Does he understand that we have made that revolution in the constitution of this body?

Mr. FERRY. I answer the Senator from Massachusetts by saying that simply within the two hours we have, by agreement to the Anthony rule, stipulated that on all measures where no objection is raised discussion shall be limited to five minutes for each Senator.

Mr. HOAR. I agree to that exactly.

Mr. FERRY. Outside of that there is no rule, but it is left to the body of the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. I see that I misunderstood the Senator and that he and I exactly agree. The Senator used the phrase, in imputing to the Senator from Kentucky a certain opinion, that an objection could prevent the consideration of any case on the Calendar. I see now that he must have intended to say, would prevent the preference being given to any case on the Calendar in its consideration at this particular time. That is all. The bill which is objected to stands with the same right which every other measure before the Senate has, to be taken up by the order of a majority of the Senate and discussed at length and considered under the ordinary rules. The objection, therefore, does not make a bill any worse off than the average of the measures before the Senate. It only prevents its being any better off. That is all.

Mr. FERRY. But, as I understand, the Senator from Kansas has made the point that if the Senate "otherwise orders" the Senate shall be confined to the five-minute rule. That cannot be. The Anthony rule is of itself complete; it provides for itself, and that was the intention of the Senator from Rhode Island when he introduced it and made it a part of the rules of the Senate; but when the majority of the Senate "order otherwise," you are then controlled by the general rules of the Senate.

Mr. INGALLS. If the interpretation claimed by the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Michigan is correct, we have no Anthony rule at all; it is a humbug and a pretense and a fraud. The practical operation of it is simply this: when the first case is called on the Calendar after the expiration of morning business any Senator says "I object," no matter whether he has any objection as a matter of fact or not; he says "I object." What is the question then, under the interpretation claimed by the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. FERRY. I can tell the Senator.

Mr. INGALLS. The question is, Shall this bill be taken up? If it is affirmatively decided that it shall be, then the whole rule is abrogated, and upon every bill to which any Senator objects debate becomes unlimited. Therefore, if that interpretation is claimed, it is an interpretation that kills the rule and destroys it and makes it as absolutely ineffectual as blank paper.

Mr. FERRY. Now, as the Senator from Kansas has taken his seat, I will state to him that the object of the Anthony rule was to dispose of cases on the Calendar to which there was no objection, simply to facilitate the proceedings of the Senate and dispose of matter on the Calendar, giving two hours each day for the consideration of it aside from the morning business. Yet at the same time it was not to deprive the right of the Senate which the Senate always retains. There has been an attempt heretofore to curtail the time of debate, and the Senate in every case has rejected the proposition, holding that there should be a body in the United States having freedom of debate. Now, if the Anthony rule applies with its five minutes' restriction, then there is a limitation. I say that when the Senate "otherwise orders," the bill comes under the general rules of the Senate. There cannot be any question in that regard.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Probably it is for the Chair to decide the point of order.

Mr. MORGAN. No point of order has been made, I understand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Was it a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. ALLISON. There is no question before the body with reference to this rule, as I understand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If it is the duty of the Chair to give his construction of this rule, the Chair is ready to do it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think, if the Chair please, that it might be well for the Chair to withhold his opinion until we get the bill actually up out of the Anthony rule and the question is raised in such a way that the judgment of the Senate can be taken upon it. Certainly the motion of the Senator from Arkansas to proceed to the consideration of this bill is in order. There is no doubt of that, and on that I have asked for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. But the Chair would suggest that the point ought to be settled before the vote is taken. Many gentlemen might vote differently if the effect of the vote is to take the bill out of the Anthony rule. The Chair as a Senator would rarely ever vote to take up a bill that was really objected to by a person, although he might be in favor of the passage of the bill. So the Chair is ready to decide the question now or after the bill is taken up, if it shall be taken up, just as the Senate wish.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Perhaps it will not be taken up.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I suggest that for the information of the Senate we had better have the opinion of the Chair at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has been a little amazed at the positions taken to-day about this rule, for in the view the Chair has taken it has seemed to him that the true interpretation could be easily reached. This rule provides that at the expiration of the morning business the Senate may proceed to consider, under the Anthony rule, cases on the Calendar, may take up any bill and dispose of it as they please; but if they do not choose to consider any special case, then they proceed under the Anthony rule with the Calendar in regular order. What does it mean?

The Senate will proceed to the consideration of the Calendar of Bills and Resolutions, and continue such consideration until two o'clock; and bills and resolutions that are not objected to shall be taken up in their order, and each Senator shall be entitled to speak once and for five minutes only upon any question; and the objection may be interposed at any stage of the proceedings unless upon motion the Senate shall otherwise order.

The understanding of the Chair has been that when an objection was made and no motion was interposed to take the case up, it was taken from without the Anthony rule entirely; but if when the objection was made any Senator moved to consider the case, and the Senate agreed to consider it, it was to be considered under the Anthony rule.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And still subject to objection?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No, sir.

And the objection may be interposed at any stage of the proceedings, unless upon motion the Senate shall otherwise order.

That is the understanding the Chair has had about it, that if there was an objection the case was taken from without the Anthony rule. Then a Senator moves that notwithstanding the objection the case be considered. How is it to be considered? The majority of the Senate can determine whether they will consider it or not. Objection is allowed; but if the majority decide that they are to consider it, it is to be considered under the Anthony rule. That is, with deference to other gentlemen, the view of the Chair.

Mr. FERRY. How does the Chair accept the objection and yet apply the force of the five-minute rule?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The objection is made. If there is no motion, then the case is taken without the rule; it goes to the foot of the docket; there is objection; that is the end of it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I understand the Chair, then, to decide that this bill—and I take this merely to illustrate the general question—being taken up by a majority of the Senate, it is still subject to the limit of five minutes debate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. EDMUNDS. From that decision, with great respect I appeal, and on that appeal I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HARRIS. I do not think any question of order has been made. The Senator from Kansas made a parliamentary inquiry; the Chair has answered that inquiry; but is that the character of case from which an appeal can be taken? If the Senate shall take up the bill, then the question of order can be raised.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would rather have it considered now. The Senator from Vermont takes an appeal from the decision of the Chair, and asks for the yeas and nays upon the appeal.

Mr. SHERMAN. As I understand the decision of the Chair, it is this: that if the objection is not made when a bill is called up, it must then be considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It can be made at any stage.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the objection is made after the bill is taken up and is being considered, then it is subject to the five-minute rule?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The objection can be made when the bill is called up, or at any stage of the proceedings; but when the objection is made, if there is no motion to proceed to the consideration of that objected bill at that time, then that case goes over. But if——

Mr. HOAR. May I put an inquiry to the Chair, in order to understand perfectly his very important ruling? Suppose, when a case is reached an objection be interposed, and then a motion is made to proceed to consider the matter, notwithstanding the objection, does the Chair understand that that motion would be in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes, sir. The Chair understands that that motion to proceed to the consideration of a bill, notwithstanding the objection, is in order.

Mr. HOAR. And after that, if that motion prevails, what then?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The case must be considered under the Anthony rule.

Mr. HOAR. Then it is my duty to give notice that I shall object to the consideration of every case on the Calendar, because I cannot submit to the Anthony rule so interpreted, if I can help it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate may think otherwise on the appeal, and of course the Chair will be governed by the judgment of the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. I do not conceive that it is in the power of the Senate, of a majority of the Senate, to declare that measures shall be considered here without debate. I consider it a violation of the constitution of the Senate, and the Senate in the most solemn and exciting condition, at the time of the great contest between Mr. Clay and Mr. Benton, so held. That has been its rule from the foundation of the Government.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not decide any such question. He decides the interpretation of a rule that the Senate has adopted.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Inasmuch as we are to have a vote on this matter we ought to understand ourselves. So far as I understand what is called the Anthony rule, it applies as much to the time of the day or the hour as it does to anything besides. The understanding that I have had of it is that after the morning business has been disposed of, the regular routine business, we then have until two o'clock to transact business under a five-minute rule, and after that the Senate is open for any business that is brought up and may be spoken on as long as the individual sees fit to speak upon it. Then I must agree with the decision that has been made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of two has arrived, and the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is the bill (S. No. 420) to establish a court of appeals.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I move to postpone that bill until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California moves to postpone the bill.

Mr. INGALLS. I respectfully suggest to the Chair that under the rules of the Senate the bill to establish a court of appeals is not the unfinished business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was so decided yesterday by the occupant of the chair.

Mr. INGALLS. I think not. If that decision was made it was obviously a wrong one, because the mere postponement of a bill until the following day does not make it a special order. That requires a two thirds vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chinese bill is the unfinished business. The Chair had no particular thought about it, and the Chair will lay before the Senate as the unfinished business the bill (H. R. No. 5804) to execute certain treaty stipulations relating to Chinese.

THE ANTHONY RULE.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask consent to offer a resolution in order that it may be printed and lie over until to-morrow. It is a resolution on the subject of the Anthony rule, and I will read it in order that the Chair may see whether any Senator objects:

Resolved, That the special rule of the Senate for the consideration of matters on the Calendar under limited debate be, and the same is hereby, abolished.

I ask leave to offer it now, and have it lie over until to-morrow and be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had yesterday approved and signed the act (S. No. 1290) to amend sections 2586 and 2587 of the Revised Statutes of the United States by creating the collection district of Yaquina, in the State of Oregon, and authorizing the appointment of a collector therein.

MARIA B. CRAIG.

Mr. PLATT. Upon a report made by myself, from the Committee on Pensions, the bill (H. R. No. 3833) for the relief of Mrs. Maria B. Craig was indefinitely postponed. I have been requested to ask that that vote be reconsidered and the case recommitted to the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That will be done, if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

BOSTON AND PORTSMOUTH NAVY-YARDS.

Mr. HOAR. I was detained accidentally from the Chamber during the morning business; I ask the present consideration of the following resolution calling for information, which I now offer:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to communicate to the Senate the histories of the Boston and Portsmouth navy-yards by Rear Admiral George H. Preble, now in the Bureau of Yards and Docks.

Mr. INGALLS. What is that, to forward a history of these navy-yards?

Mr. HOAR. Yes, sir.

Mr. INGALLS. That implies, I suppose, a few hundred thousand dollars more of printing. We have been complaining for the last few months about extravagant printing, and here is another attempt, I suppose, to have the history of some navy-yards printed.

Mr. HOAR. The question was somewhat discussed yesterday as to the title and the value for public defense of the Boston navy-yard. Since that discussion I have received from an officer in the navy-yard a statement that he had compiled, at the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, the facts showing the history of these titles. I do not propose to have the document printed unless when it comes here it appears that it is a document which can be properly and cheaply printed. It is now in the possession of the Bureau of Yards and Docks, and I simply ask that it shall be forwarded to the Senate.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

TAX ON RAW COTTON.

Mr. VOORHEES submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be instructed to furnish to the Senate a statement showing the total amount of the tax collected from unmanufactured or raw cotton since the year 1861, the amount collected in each year, and the amount collected from the cotton raised in each of the several States.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 2627) for the relief of Ann Stuchell; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had non-concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 4466) making appropriations for the Agricultural Department of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bill and joint resolutions; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. No. 1014) for the relief of Joseph L. Stevens;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 161) making an appropriation to enable the Light-House Board to meet the extraordinary expenses consequent upon the flood in the Mississippi River; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 185) granting the use of tents at the soldiers' reunion to be held at Belle Plaine, Iowa, in the month of September or October, 1882.

CHINESE IMMIGRATION.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 5804) to execute certain treaty stipulations relating to Chinese, the pending question being on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole striking out the fifteenth section of the bill, in the following words:

SEC. 15. That the words "Chinese laborers," wherever used in this act, shall be construed to mean both skilled and unskilled laborers and Chinese employed in mining.

Mr. SLATER. Mr. President, I do not propose to detain the Senate at any length, but before the final vote is taken on the present bill I wish to offer a few remarks in relation not only to the bill itself but also to some political aspects which the debate has disclosed in the discussion of this question. The particular proposition now pending before the Senate is the amendment of the committee striking out that clause of the bill which defines the word "laborer" in the body of the bill. To strike out that clause of the bill will be in effect to destroy all its efficacy as a measure of restriction. It will be practically, for all the purposes which it is intended to accomplish, a worthless piece of legislation. I desire to call the attention of Senators to the definition of the word "laborer" as given by Webster and Worcester. Webster defines it as "one who labors in a toilsome occupation; a man who does work that requires little skill, as distinguished from an artisan." Worcester defines it as "one who labors; one regularly employed at some hard work; a workman; an operative; often used of one who gets a livelihood at coarse manual labor as distinguished from an artisan or a professional man." Strike this clause from the bill, and all who desire to come from China to the United States will profess and claim to come as artisans. Not only that, but the principal agitation, I may say, which has arisen in regard to the admission of this class of people to the United States has arisen quite as much out of the fact that they are entering into all the lines of employment in direct competition with our artisans. If Senators had informed themselves upon this question and paid close attention to the very able speech of the Senator from California [Mr. MILLER] they would have seen from the statistics which he gave that this is the case and that a bill without this provision in it would be of little use in bringing relief to our people.

Besides, sir, if we examine the history of these treaty stipulations we shall find that our commissioners insisted upon the clause being retained in the treaty itself, or rather they refused to yield to a contrary definition of the word "laborer." Let me call the attention of the Senate to the Chinese proposition and to what was said by our commissioners in that respect. The propositions submitted by the Chinese commissioners were as follows:

ART. II. Chinese who may be desirous of proceeding to any other part of the United States for purposes of labor, excepting only the State of California, shall be allowed to go of their own free will and accord. Persons of all other classes, with the exception of actual Chinese laborers, whose immigration into California will be temporarily regulated and limited by the United States, whether proceeding to California as teachers, students, travelers, traders, or artisans—

This was the proposition of the Chinese commission, in which they directly and in terms asked that artisans should not be included in the excluded classes.

Now turning to the memorandum of what passed between the American commissioners and the Chinese commissioners, we shall find in paragraphs 2 and 3 the following:

2. The United States commissioners feel it their duty to insist upon their definition of Chinese laborers, namely: "The words 'Chinese laborers' are herein used to signify all immigration other than that for teaching, trade, travel, study, and curiosity hereinbefore referred to and provided for in existing treaties." They cannot consent that artisans shall be excluded from the class of Chinese laborers, for it is this very competition of skilled labor in the cities where the Chinese labor immigration concentrates which has caused the embarrassment and popular discontent they wish to avoid. But they are willing to adopt an article providing that the classes who are authorized to come and reside in the United States shall bring the servants who are necessary to their convenience.

3. The United States commissioners cannot consent to the limitation that Chinese laborers excluded shall be those only who are employed by American citizens. This, so far from being a check upon such immigration, would be simply a prohibition of the use of cheap labor by the American citizens. Every other person, that is, any and every resident, French, English, German, Chinese, would have the right to bring into the country and use such labor in direct competition with the American citizen. The United States commissioners can scarcely think that this proposition was fully considered by the Chinese commissioners.

We see from this that it must have been understood that the word "laborer" was to be interpreted, and should be interpreted, when carried into legislative enactment, as including artisans. And, sir, unless we give it legislative construction in the form and manner proposed we shall find when this law goes into operation that we have a drag-net and nothing in it. We shall be again deceived in regard to the limitations we supposed we were placing upon this immigration. It will prove to be ineffective and worthless in execution.

Mr. President, no event in the past twenty years has so surprised and profoundly stirred the people of the Pacific States as the debate, the votes, and the final veto of the late Chinese bill. They had been led to believe that this question had passed beyond the realm of political agitation. They had been led to believe that parties were substantially in accord upon the proposition of limiting or prohibiting Chinese immigration. But now we see from the debates, from the votes which are given here, and from the veto message, that it is a proposition of discord between the two great parties in this country.

Sir, the history of this agitation may be well considered for a few moments. It may be well to look back at the early days when this question was first mooted in the Pacific States and Territories and find there the political aspect of the first agitation. During the debate on the previous bill one of the Senators from Massachusetts, I do not now remember which, referring to the time when the Burlingame treaty was announced and the embassy which Mr. Burlingame headed reached our Pacific shores, made some statement, I do not remember the precise language used, but it indicated that there was a universality of sentiment greeting that embassy and according to it great ovations, which indicated that our people on that coast were entirely satisfied and in accord with the principles of the Burlingame treaty. This, sir, is a serious mistake. It is true capital accorded them great ovations; it is true that capital extended them wonderful receptions and made great demonstrations of satisfaction; but the people did not by any manner of means sympathize with or approve them. To show you how the people regarded this I desire to call your attention to the first and perhaps the most distinct announcement of opposition to Chinese immigration that has been heard from that coast from that day to the present time. I will read from the Democratic platform of the State of Oregon in 1870, promulgated very soon after the passage of this embassy through California. That convention resolved as follows:

That they urge and entreat a repeal of the recent treaty concluded between the United States and China, which guarantees to the latter nation such extensive privileges and immunities without corresponding benefits to American citizens, and offers to its hordes of semi-barbarians such favorable inducements to swarm in upon us, occupying our mineral and agricultural districts, create competition with our laboring masses, establish immoral pursuits, disgusting rites, ceremonies, and practices; discourage and repel the immigration of our own race, decrease the white population, retard thrift, impede the advancement of education and enlightenment, abstract from our resources and send away our valuable mineral wealth, and disorganize and apostatize our community." And they resolve that a party who will sustain a policy so unwise and ruthless as that which upholds such an infamous bargain is unworthy the support of white men.

This was scarcely met on a square issue by the Republicans of Oregon in that campaign. In fact, so far from meeting the question of immigration, of receiving Chinese upon the coast as laborers, their platform was silent; but in order to have some question to partly meet the issue tendered to them they did resolve that they were opposed to the naturalization of Chinese.

The year before that the Democrats in California had made a strong issue upon the introduction of Chinese into that State. If I understand the history of that campaign correctly the Republican party of that State in that campaign evaded the issue, and only resolved against admitting Chinese to citizenship, taking refuge behind the Federal Government and the treaty power in regard to this matter. Two years later, however, they realized their mistake, and put themselves in full accord with the Democratic party upon this question, and from that day to the present time I believe in no State or Territory on the Pacific slope has there been any disagreement between the parties in regard to Chinese immigration; and we had hoped, after the last national conventions of the two great parties of the country, that we had reached a similar condition as to national politics. We had hoped when we saw the pledges given in the platforms of the two parties that we should receive some attention and consideration at the hands of Congress. Just preceding the meeting of those conventions a bill had been passed through the two Houses of Congress by large majorities, and it may be well to refer to that vote. It was there disclosed that that measure in both branches of Congress was substantially carried by the votes of Democrats. On the passage of the recent bill a similar alignment of parties was disclosed. The facts clearly show that the opposition to the restricting of Chinese immigration now and in the past is and has been mainly confined to the Republican ranks. Why, sir, during the late campaign no language was strong enough to portray the feelings of abhorrence with which Republican speakers all over the United States assumed to hold as respected the sentiments of the Morey letter, which had been attributed to Mr. Garfield. Yet, sir, strange to say, in less than eighteen months from that time, the only source from whence we hear any voice in accordance with the sentiments of that letter comes from the Republican side in this body and from the same side in the other branch of Congress.

These facts deserve attention, and they signify that from the commencement of this agitation to the present hour the Democratic party has made and led the contest against Chinese immigration, and is to-day the only party substantially and honestly making resistance and warfare against this Mongolian invasion.

But, sir, if there were any doubt as to the attitude of the Republican party in this respect, it was set at rest yesterday by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR.] In his remarks he said:

I wish, however, to refer in a single word to one charge which has been frequently made, and that is that those members of the Republican party who have resisted the passage of this measure have violated the pledges with which they asked the support of the American people at the recent Presidential election. I was in a condition, I think, to know something of the opinion and purposes of the men who composed the great Republican national convention of 1880. I was also in a condition to know something of the opinion of the great statesman and soldier and martyr and lover of liberty who was the standard bearer of my political associates in that memorable campaign. It is a dishonor to both to charge that they asked the support of the American people by pledging themselves to the principles upon which this legislation is based.

I ask attention to this particular sentence:

It is a dishonor to both to charge that they asked the support of the American people by pledging themselves to the principles upon which this legislation is based.

The president of the Republican convention which nominated and put into the field the late Republican Presidential ticket, from his seat in the Senate of the United States, tells the people that this legislation is not of the character that they, the Republican party in their platform, promised the people of the Pacific States. Then, sir, I affirm that the promises of the Republican party were deceptions and could have been intended for nothing else than to beguile the Pacific States into the support of the Republican ticket. But he continues:

General Garfield, I believe, would have gone to the stake, he would have put his right hand into the flames like Cranmer, before he would have accepted the Presidency or have subscribed his name to a declaration involving such a blow to the dignity of labor and the dignity of American humanity as is involved in this bill.

This is what the Republican national convention declared. I stand, and am ready to stand in the future, by every word and letter and syllable of the declaration:

"Since the authority to regulate immigration and intercourse between the United States and foreign nations rests with the Congress of the United States and the treaty-making power, the Republican party, regarding the unrestricted immigration of the Chinese as a matter of grave concernment, under the exercise of both these powers, would limit and restrict that immigration by the enactment of such just, humane, and reasonable laws and treaties as will produce that result."

The assurances of the Senator that he is "ready to stand in the future by every word and letter" of the Republican platform will hardly reassure the people of the Pacific States in the good faith of Republican promises after what has transpired here and at the other end of the Avenue. The debate here and in the other branch of Congress and the votes given for and against this and the former bill, in connection with the veto message, has so completely unmasked the Republican opposition to any effective legislation looking to a proper restriction of Chinese immigration that such promises now given will hardly serve to restore the confidence of our people in Republican good faith.

And here stopping for the moment, let us see what was accomplished by the Chinese commission. The fifteen-passenger bill, as it is commonly known, had a clause in it which repealed the fifth and sixth articles of what was known as the Burlingame treaty, the articles under which this immigration was made lawful. I say the fifteen-passenger act repealed or proposed to repeal or abrogate those two articles. It was a legislative declaration that the relations between the United States and the Chinese Empire as established by those articles should no longer exist. A Republican President vetoed the bill because of that provision. A national election was approaching, and something had to be done to quiet the apprehension of the people of the Pacific States. A commission was appointed after this legislative declaration, with the pledge of the Republican party, through the executive branch of the Government, which it controlled, that this legislative declaration should be respected, the commission, all Republican, was sent to China to negotiate a new treaty touching Chinese immigration, and what was the result? Instead of our commissioners insisting upon what we had a right to expect, and which had been distinctly formulated and declared by legislative expression, both Houses of Congress concurring, one of which is a part of the treaty-making power of the country, instead of the executive department under the control of the Republican party insisting that the legislative will of the country should be carried out and executed, they fell short of the main and principal point and accepted from the Chinese Government a treaty in which the Chinese Government concedes to us, not as a right belonging to us as an independent sovereign people, but as a concession from the Chinese Empire, that we may restrict the coming of Chinese laborers. And now, when we come to put upon the statute-book a statute under the supposed terms of this treaty, we are again met by these same Republicans who quibble about the meaning of a word, a word used too intelligently by that commission—a word which they seem to have understood and which they said in their memorandum to the Chinese commissioners they could not suffer to be construed in a certain way as the Chinese desired to construe it—and yet such a word not having a technical signification unless it receives legislative construction in the bill under which the courts must have jurisdiction, the courts will be bound by the ordinary and usual signification. If such a definition be bestowed upon it, then the principal objects of this bill will be wholly defeated and the measure will be as deceptive as Republican promises have proved to be.

But I will read a little further from the remarks of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, in order to show fully the grounds of Republican opposition to any measure looking to effective restriction upon this immigration. After quoting the paragraph of the Republican platform, he proceeds to say:

> That is, the regulation of immigration and intercourse. Then General Garfield in his letter of acceptance stated the doctrine to which he understands he is committed by accepting the nomination of that party upon that platform. He said:
> "The material interests of this country, the traditions of its settlement, and the sentiment of our people have led the Government to offer the widest hospitality to emigrants who seek our shores for new and happier homes, willing to share the burdens as well as the benefits of our society, and intending that their posterity shall become an undistinguishable part of our population."

Then the Senator proceeds to say, or rather to ask this most significant question:

> Is that like an enactment that no Chinese shall ever be naturalized in the American Republic?

It is the naturalization clause which seems to trouble him as well as restricting Chinese labor; but he proceeds with the letter of acceptance:

> The recent movement of the Chinese to our Pacific coast partakes but little of the qualities of such an immigration, either in its purposes or its result. It is too much like an importation to be welcomed without restrictions, too much like an invasion to be looked upon without solicitude. We cannot consent to allow any form of servile labor to be introduced among us under the guise of immigration. Recognizing the gravity of this subject, the present Administration, supported by Congress, has sent to China a commission of distinguished citizens for the purpose of securing such a modification of the existing treaty as will prevent the evils likely to arise from the present situation. It is confidently believed that these diplomatic negotiations will be successful without the loss of commercial intercourse between the two powers, which promises a great increase of reciprocal trade and the enlargement of our markets. Should these efforts fail, it will be the duty of Congress to mitigate the evils already felt and prevent their increase by such restrictions as, without violence or injustice, will place upon a sure foundation the peace of our communities and the freedom and dignity of labor.

Then the Senator proceeds to say:

> Mr. President, I reaffirm for myself, and for the people whom I immediately represent, every syllable of that eloquent declaration. I am willing to join my friends from the Pacific coast in regulating immigration so as to extirpate, root and branch, every form of coolie labor.

Does not the Senator know that we have experimented in the statutes against coolie labor? Does not he know that our statutes are powerless to effect any restriction in that respect? The history of this coolie legislation has simply been putting statutes formally upon the statute-book. So far as I have ever heard or known, there has not been a single instance where the Chinese immigrant—be that immigrant a coolie, criminal, or prostitute—has ever been refused permission to come upon a vessel bound for the United States, or refused the papers necessary to bring him to California or to Oregon. It is idle to talk of such legislation. It cannot in the nature of things reach the case or prevent the evils complained of.

The term "coolie laborer" is an indefinite term imported into our language and into our literature. It has no practical meaning that can be applied or enforced in statutory provisions.

The Senator from whom I have just quoted seems to be very much concerned about the bill, regarding it as a strike at labor. I do not know that I comprehend the position of the honorable Senator. We who are pressing this bill understand it to be a bill in the interest of labor. We understand it to be a measure to protect the laborer, to keep him from being ground down by the capitalists by employing Chinese labor so cheaply that the white man, or the American citizen, if you prefer the term, is unable to live at the prices for which these immigrants will work, and by reason of this Chinese labor are being oppressed and degraded.

Some time ago in another debate this Senator, in referring to the condition of laborers in the Eastern States, made a statement to which I wish to call attention now as a means by which I may be able to enlighten him and those who think with him on this matter and give him and them some understanding of what the agitation of the Chinese question upon the Pacific coast means, how extensive it is, and how far-reaching in its effects it must become in the future. On the 21st of December last, in responding to some remarks by the honorable Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] touching the tariff commission bill, the honorable Senator said:

> I understand that the great question of tariff or no tariff, and of comparison between the tariff policies of other countries and this, depends upon the question whether the American rate of wages can be maintained.

Precisely what we desire in California and Oregon. We desire to maintain the rate of American wages against Chinese paupers. The Senator proceeded to say:

> The people of this country are its rulers. In the manufacturing States, like the one which I have the honor in part to represent, the operatives in their mills are their rulers. Whatever policy of State government or of national government, whatever policy as to schools, as to churches, as to the construction of railroads, as to finance, as to currency, as to banking, as to the prosperity of commerce, as to the rights of capital and the protection of those rights, prevails, is first argued beforeand then reasoned out by the understandings of the men who do the work in the manufacturing and mechanical establishments of those communities; and some of us mean that whatever else happens, this shall happen, that from the product of their labor there shall be awarded to those operatives a share which will give them an opportunity to put their children to school, to have their wives attend church and lectures decently clad, free to enjoy the luxury of knowledge and the luxuries of social life; and to do that the American rate of wages must be paid and maintained.

The agitation of this question in the Pacific States means that the people of those States have determined that whatever else shall happen it shall not happen that our laboring classes shall be ground down between the upper and nether millstones of capital and Chinese labor. It means that our laboring classes shall have such wages, such compensation for their toil as will enable them to receive and enjoy what the Massachusetts Senator demands his laboring people shall be able to receive and enjoy. Then, I ask him to join with us. He seeks to protect the laborer in the mills and factories of New England. Why not help us to protect the laborer upon the Pacific coast? He appeals to the people of the United States and to Congress to retain protective legislation on the statute-book in order that the wages of the operative class may remain high, yet at the same time he does not favor a measure to prevent an incursion of a class of foreign pauper labor from China, by the side of which the pauper labor of Europe, about which he and those who think with him have so much to say, has no comparison and no relation whatever.

If the Senator does not now know and understand the length and breadth of this question, I assure him that the working classes everywhere upon this side of the Rocky Mountains begin to comprehend it. And they will not fail to see and to understand that the substitution of Chinese as common laborers, and in the trades and arts, for American laborers on the Pacific coast, means also their substitution for and to the detriment and degradation of American and other laborers in the mills and factories of New England, and upon the cotton, rice, and sugar plantations of the South. This agitation will not and cannot be confined to the Pacific States.

Mr. President, it has now been a little over a century since the people of Boston took very strong steps to evade and prevent the execution of certain laws of the mother country in regard to taxation. They resolved that they would drink no more tea, and to be sure that they should keep their resolution they dumped all the tea into Boston Harbor. The people upon the Pacific coast have resolved that this Chinese immigration must cease. I will not say that in order to keep that resolution we will drive the Chinese into the Pacific Ocean, but I will say to the Massachusetts Senators that the people who live on the Pacific coast, like those who settled on the New England shore, are Caucasians, and in the veins of many of them flows the blood of New England men. They have carried your institutions, the school-house and the church, and planted them upon the Pacific slope. They have reclaimed from a wilderness and from savage control that section of our country—a grand empire of itself, and they will not surrender that beautiful land to become the home of the Asiatic nor to the blight of Asiatic labor. More, sir, they have not only carried the institutions of New England and the older States and the love of liberty to that far distant country, where they have taken permanent root, but they have carried with them that which is better and more important, that which has given Massachusetts the proud record and name which she has always maintained, a quality known only to the Caucasian, an unchanging purpose, born of the race, never to submit to tyranny and oppression.

We have appealed to Congress for lo! these many years. Our appeals have been scouted and derided. Measures for our relief have been twice defeated by Presidential veto. We are here again asking nothing but a small measure of justice, and we appeal to you to give us the little relief this measure will bring, in order that we may stay for the present the scourge that is now upon us until better judgment and better knowledge here shall prevail respecting the evils of this tide of Mongolian immigration.

Mr. HAWLEY addressed the Senate. [See Appendix.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. All the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole have been concurred in in the Senate except the last one, which was reserved. The amendment will be read.

The ACTING SECRETARY. The Senate as in Committee of the Whole struck out section 15 of the bill in the following words:

SEC. 15. That the words "Chinese laborers," wherever used in this act, shall be construed to mean both skilled and unskilled laborers and Chinese employed in mining.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to amend the clause now under consideration by striking out all after the word "that," and inserting these words:

The words "Chinese laborers," wherever used in this act, shall be construed to include persons who are usually engaged in manual labor.

Mr. FARLEY. The President of the United States in his veto of the other bill, sent with that message to the Senate a memorandum said to have been furnished the Executive Department by the then Chinese minister, in which that minister objects to the words "skilled labor" in the bill. He uses the language which I shall read; it is part of the President's message, and I refer to it because it purports to be a memorandum from the Chinese minister. He says:

II. The inclusion of "skilled labor" in the bill is an addition to the words and intent of the treaty. It will operate with harshness upon a class of Chinese merchants entitled to admission to the United States under the terms of the treaty. The shoe merchants and cigar merchants of China manufacture the goods they sell at their places of business, and to shut out the "skilled labor" they need would practically shut them out as well, since it would prevent them from carrying on their business in this country. The laundryman who keeps his shop and has a small capital with which to prosecute his trade cannot in any just sense be included in the class of "laborers," and the merchant tailor comes in the same category.

I call the attention of the Senate to the class of persons who are mentioned in this memorandum as not coming within the definition of laborers. The shoemaker, the tailor, the laundryman, and the cigar-maker are, in the strictest sense of the word, laborers, and are so considered by all the communities that I know anything about. Tell me where a man engaged in the business of shoemaking, in the business of keeping a laundry—washing, sending, and taking clothes to various localities to carry on his trade—is not a laborer. Tell me that the man engaged in the tailoring business is not a laborer. These are the classes that our people complain mostly of in California. Tailors have been driven from employment. Why? Because the Chinese work at a much lower rate than they can possibly carry on their business and support their families. The laundry business is one that is taken from those who have heretofore been engaged in that business. The white men and white women of our race have been driven from their employment by reason of the general occupation of that business by the Chinese laundrymen.

Mr. INGALLS. Why do the people hire them if they are so objectionable?

Mr. FARLEY. The people, I suppose, in California are like the people in Kansas or any other portion of the country. They hire those from whom they can get the most work at the least price.

Mr. INGALLS. The people of Kansas do not hire a leprous, diseased, immoral, degraded brute to come into their houses and do work because he will labor for ten cents a day less than an upright, cleanly, moral man.

Mr. FARLEY. I was not aware that the people of Kansas had any lepers and brutes in their State.

Mr. INGALLS. I understood that the people of California allege as one great reason why they wanted this immigration restrained that it is because the Chinese laborers who came to that country were lepers and diseased and immoral and totally unfitted either for employment or citizenship.

Mr. FARLEY. I can only say to the honorable Senator that the people of California have had Chinese in their midst for twenty-five years and upward, and that the universal sentiment there is not that these Chinamen are all of the class that the honorable Senator from Kansas refers to, but that there are those among them of that class. I apprehend that in the State my honorable friend represents there are classes of people, as is the case in all other communities, that perhaps the Senator would not invite to his house to dinner.

Mr. INGALLS. There are some that I would not have in my house to wash my clothes.

Mr. FARLEY. Our people do not invite the Chinamen to their houses to wash their clothes. The Chinamen put up Chinese signs on their buildings throughout the city.

Mr. INGALLS. Are they not employed as servants?

Mr. FARLEY. Sometimes as servants and as cooks.

Mr. INGALLS. And as hostlers and gardeners?

Mr. FARLEY. Yes, and as hostlers and gardeners. I simply stated this proposition to show that that class of men would not be considered skilled laborers under the provisions of this bill as it now stands.

Mr. INGALLS. Why are these people employed? Because they do better work for less money than anybody else?

Mr. FARLEY. The Senator asks me why those people are employed. I cannot answer that. I suppose it is generally understood by every person——

Mr. INGALLS. They are employed because they do better work for less money than anybody else.

Mr. FARLEY. I do not say any such thing. The Senator undertakes to put in my mouth what I never said.

Mr. INGALLS. Why do they employ the Chinese in preference to other people?

Mr. FARLEY. I can only say because they work for less money. As I apprehend, if the Senator were to select as between parties and he wanted labor performed, if he could get a man to do certain work for fifty cents and another for a dollar, he would take the man at fifty cents.

Mr. INGALLS. Does not the Senator believe that if the people of California would abstain from hiring these Chinese they would leave?

Mr. FARLEY. I believe they would.

Mr. INGALLS. Why do you not do it, then?

Mr. FARLEY. That is bringing in a point that cannot be answered, because it is one of those questions which nobody can answer. Why do they not do it?

Mr. INGALLS. You have the matter in your own hands.

Mr. FARLEY. No, we have not the matter in our own hands. When we undertake to exclude the vilest class of people brought there by the vessels and landed upon our wharves, in steps the Federal court and says: "You, by your State authority, by your municipal authority, cannot exercise this right." That is what the Federal courts have said.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator has admitted that if the people of California would cease to hire these Chinese they would go away.

Mr. FARLEY. I suppose they would.

Mr. INGALLS. If the people would cease to purchase their products they would not manufacture any more. Therefore, I say the people of California have the matter in their own hands absolutely.

Mr. FARLEY. The people of other States have had as difficult problems in their hands as we of California have in regard to the Chinese question. A number of these Chinese were induced to find their way over to New England, they being favorite citizens there. A number of them voted for my distinguished friend from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] as a member of Congress, and he says that they naturalize them in Connecticut. They naturalize them in Massachusetts, as my honorable friend [Mr. DAWES] has said in a debate heretofore carried on upon this subject. A number of them were taken to a place called North Adams for the purpose of engaging in the manufacture of shoes. I asked my friend how it happened that those people did not remain in Massachusetts, did not remain in North Adams and carry on the manufacture of shoes in that city or town? The answer was that they were asking as high a rate of wages as the white people were getting after they had worked themselves up to understand the business, and the reason they were not retained there was that they were asking and getting as much as the white people were, and the manufacturers who were carrying on the business then did not want them and would not employ them, and they left.

Mr. DAWES. I did dot say they left for that reason. I said they left because they could do better elsewhere.

Mr. FARLEY. In other words, when the people of North Adams found that in the manufacture of shoes the Chinamen, becoming skilled laborers I suppose, were asking as much as the white people themselves were getting, the Chinamen did not get employment. They did go away, did they not?

Mr. DAWES. They went away to different places in different employments where they could get more than they or any others could get at making shoes in North Adams; they thought they could improve their condition, and their condition was precisely the same as any other man's condition in the same kind of employment in North Adams; but they believed they could improve their condition by going into other business. Some of them are there at this moment.

Mr. FARLEY. How many?

Mr. DAWES. Three or four. There never was this alarming number.

Mr. FARLEY. How many went there first?

Mr. DAWES. I believe about fifty went there first.

Mr. FARLEY. Did they not have as many as three hundred in North Adams?

Mr. DAWES. No, sir.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask the Senator if there had been 100,000 Chinese laborers introduced into Massachusetts does he think it would have been a benefit to that State?

Mr. DAWES. I think if 100,000 might have been introduced into Massachusetts it would have been for the mutual benefit of that hundred thousand and the industrious people of Massachusetts, who seek the employment of men that they can employ for the most profit both to themselves and the men they employ.

Mr. BUTLER. I should like to ask the honorable Senator directly whether he thinks the introduction of 100,000 laborers into the State of Massachusetts would benefit the laboring class of that State? I should like him to answer that question.

Mr. DAWES. More than 100,000 come there year after year; a million a year are landing at Castle Garden, in New York, within one hundred miles of Massachusetts.

Mr. BUTLER. Chinamen?

Mr. FARLEY. Not Asiatics?

Mr. DAWES. Not Asiatics. I do not know any particular difference between Asiatic labor and European labor; it is labor, and it never occurred to me that the difference between men was the difference in the places where they were born. I always supposed it was a difference in the character of the men.

Mr. BUTLER. Then I should like to ask the honorable Senator if he thinks it would be a good thing to introduce into any community a large number of very cheap laborers; if he thinks cheap labor is a benefit to any country?

Mr. DAWES. I do not think it would be a good thing to introduce into any country a larger amount of cheap labor than can profitably employ itself or profitably be employed in that community. Beyond that they would not come, any more than there would be a greater supply of skilled labor than there would be a possible demand for, and it would not be cheaper than the rest of the labor, because every man who comes within the borders of this Union will find the best place for himself and will work out his own future if he be left alone by the United States.

Mr. BUTLER. The experience of the people of California and the Pacific coast appears to be very different from that, and so would it be in Massachusetts.

Mr. DAWES. It is just as impossible for the people of California to undertake to put a law against the laws of trade and the laws of right and wrong upon immigration into this country at their ports as it is for any other State.

Mr. FARLEY. I should like to understand who has the floor. I seem to have yielded for a general debate.

Mr. BUTLER. I beg pardon.

Mr. FARLEY. The Senator from South Carolina and the two Senators from Massachusetts are now embarking in this discussion.

Mr. DAWES. I am embarked into this discussion. The Senator from California appealed to me. I had not troubled the Senate in this debate upon this bill until the Senator seemed anxious to get something out of me.

Mr. FARLEY. I simply referred to the Senator for a fact in reference to a statement I had made.

Mr. DAWES. I am very sorry the Senator did not understand that colony which came to Massachusetts better. This is the second time the Senator has demonstrated to the Senate his utter ignorance of the reason why they came, the manner in which they continued there, or the reason why they went away. I tried to make it perfectly clear to him two or three weeks ago, but it does not seem to be possible for the Senator to understand the real state of facts. I regret it exceedingly.

Mr. FARLEY. I am very thankful to the Senator from Massachusetts for attempting now to instruct me as to why those people went there and why they left. Of course I am not well acquainted in that locality and perhaps was somewhat ignorant as to what was the cause that took those people there. I understood that they were employed by manufacturers to go there and engage as employés in the manufacture of shoes.

Mr. DAWES. They were.

Mr. FARLEY. On that point I am not ignorant. The next point I understood was that when these people were asking as high wages as that manufacturing establishment was paying for white labor, then they left; they were not continued in the employment of that manufactory.

Mr. INGALLS. The people of Massachusetts did not ask for the passage of an act of Congress to get rid of them.

Mr. FARLEY. Because the Chinamen did not remain there. That was it. They did not employ the Chinamen, and they went away.

Mr. DAWES. They followed the same law which governs every employé in his relations to his employer in Massachusetts, and everywhere else where the law does not undertake to regulate it. They on their part seek to find that employment which is most profitable to them, and so does the employer; and every man who comes to Massachusetts, whether from Asia or from Europe, is likely to come there and offer his wages at first at a lower rate than the native-born citizen, but he very soon elevates himself by his industry and by his acquaintance and aptitude in the business in which he is employed to a position where he can command as much as any other man, and he does command it; and the foreigner, whether he come from Asia or from Europe, from the Atlantic side or the Pacific side, commands the same wages that the native-born does, and he receives it if he can accomplish as much for his employer. No man in Massachusetts stops to inquire where a man was born before he employs him, or appeals to the Government for a law to protect him against a man because he happens to have been born in one place rather than another, or because the color of his skin is different from that of his own.

Mr. FARLEY. Mr. President——

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator yield for a motion for an executive session?

Mr. FARLEY. We shall not be able then to conclude this bill today.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let it be finished to morrow. I cannot stay very long. With the permission of the Senator from California, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. FARLEY. Allow me one moment, and then I will yield to the Senator's motion on account of the condition of his health. I had not intended making any extended remarks upon this matter; but certain statements have been made here which I wished to reply to, especially some made by the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY,] and also some made by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] in a speech on the veto message. I shall ask leave to continue this debate to-morrow.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly, the Senator from California is entitled to the floor.

ROBERT PELKEY.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator from Vermont yield to me to get an order? I ask the consent of the Senate to reconsider the vote on the report of the Committee on Pensions on the bill (H. R. No. 2290) for the relief of Robert Pelkey. That bill was reported adversely by the Committee on Pensions on Thursday. It is in the RECORD of Friday. I ask that the vote by which it was indefinitely postponed be reconsidered, and the bill placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That will be done, if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 2627) for the relief of Ann Stuchell was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives non-concurring in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 4466) making appropriations for the Agricultural Department of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes.

On motion of Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia, it was

Resolved, That the Senate insist on its amendments to the said bill disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and ask a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

By unanimous consent, it was Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia, Mr. PLUMB, and Mr. HALE as the conferees.

THE ANTHONY RULE.

Mr. HOAR. I move the following resolution, to lie over until to-morrow under the rule:

Resolved, That the resolve known as the Anthony rule shall not hereafter be so construed as to authorize the consideration of any measure under a limitation of debate to five minutes or to speaking but once by each Senator after objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will go over and be printed.

JAPANESE INDEMNITY CORRESPONDENCE.

Mr. VAN WYCK submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be directed to furnish to the Senate copy of a letter of George S. Fisher when consul at Yokohama, relating to the services of the steamer Wyoming and the value of the vessels destroyed by her; also the correspondence of Secretary Seward and minister Pruyn relating to the destruction of property which led to the indemnity made by Japan.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After twenty-three minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at four o'clock and twenty minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, April 26, 1882.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. F. D. POWER.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PUBLIC BUILDING, LANCASTER, PENNSYLVANIA.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4702) for the erection of a public building at Lancaster, Pennsylvania, and that the same be put upon its passage.

Mr. MILLS. I object.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection and permit me to make a brief explanation.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that objection is made to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

ANN STUCHELL.

Mr. MOSGROVE. I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2627) for the relief of Ann Stuchell, and that the same be put upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, subject to objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas Christopher Stuchell, late a private in Company A, Sixty-first Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, in his lifetime established his right, under the several acts of Congress granting pensions to soldiers of the war of the rebellion, to invalid pension for total blindness contracted in said service, and had issued to him certificate numbered 122751, dated April 22, 1873, directing the pension agent at Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, to pay to him $8 per month from July 17, 1862, to August 8, 1866, and from that time until April 22, 1873, $25 per month; and

Whereas said soldier, after the issuing of said certificate and the execution of the necessary vouchers to draw said sum of money then due, but before the receipt of the check of the said pension agent, took sick and died, unmarried and intestate, leaving surviving him his father, Francis Stuchell, and his mother, Ann Stuchell, who were at the time of his death, under the intestate laws of Pennsylvania, his lawful heirs; and

Whereas the said Francis and Ann Stuchell had maintained and cared for their said son from the time of his discharge until his death, and had expended considerable money for his treatment, and so forth, for which he could have reimbursed them had he received said money due him; and

Whereas letters of administration upon the estate of said soldier were duly granted said Francis Stuchell, and demand made by him as such of the pension agent at Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, for the sum due on said certificate on the day of the death of said soldier, payment of which was refused under section 25 of the act of Congress approved March 3, 1873; and

Whereas the said Francis Stuchell has since died intestate, leaving surviving him as his widow the said Ann Stuchell, now in indigent circumstances: Therefore,

Be it enacted, &c., That the Commissioner of Pensions be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay or cause to be paid to Ann Stuchell, widow of Francis and mother of Christopher Stuchell, the sum of $2,381.22, the amount of pension due said Christopher Stuchell in his lifetime, from the date of his discharge to March 4, 1873, and for which check was issued him payable to his order, but not indorsed by him or paid to him or any other person by reason of his death and the act of Congress aforesaid.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MOSGROVE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CIVIL OFFICES IN THE TERRITORIES.

Mr. BRENTS. I ask unanimous consent to take from the House Calendar for present consideration the bill (H. R. No. 1926) to amend section 1860 of the Revised Statutes so as not to exclude retired Army officers from holding civil office in the Territories.

The bill was read.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I object.

Mr. BRENTS. I hope the gentleman will not object till the report is read. It is the unanimous report of the Committee on Military Affairs.

The SPEAKER. The objection is not withdrawn.

AGREEMENT WITH CROW INDIANS.

Mr. AINSLIE. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table for present consideration the bill (S. No. 1045) to accept and ratify an agreement with the Crow Indians for the sale of a portion of their reservation in the Territory of Montana required for the use of the Northern Pacific Railroad, and to make the necessary appropriations for carrying out the same.

Mr. RANDALL. I reserve the right to object until the bill is read.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. ROBESON, (interrupting the reading.) I understand that that bill is being read subject to objection. It is too long a bill to go through without examination on unanimous consent.

Mr. MAGINNIS. There is nothing in the world in it except the ratification of an agreement made with the Crow Indians.

Mr. ROBESON. I do not believe any bill interfering with the rights of Indians, recommended I do not care by whom, that comes here and takes half an hour to read, should go through by unanimous consent.

Mr. MAGINNIS. Let me make a brief statement of its provisions.

Mr. ROBESON. We cannot tell anything about it from merely hearing it read.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I ask that the bill may be printed in the RECORD, giving notice that it will be called up again to-morrow morning.

Mr. ROBESON. I have no objection to that.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD. It is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That a certain agreement made between the United States of America, represented by Llewellyn A. Luce, William H. Walker, and Charles A. Maxwell, special agents duly appointed in that behalf by the Secretary of the Interior, of the one part, and the Crow tribe of Indians resident on the Crow reservation, in the Territory of Montana, acting under the supervision and with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, of the other part, be, and the same is hereby, ratified and confirmed. Said agreement is executed by a majority of the adult male Indians of the Crow tribe occupying or interested in the lands therein more particularly described, in conformity with the provisions contained in article 11 of the treaty with the Crow Indians of May 7, 1868, and is in the words following, namely:

"Whereas by section 1 of an act of Congress approved July 2, 1864, entitled 'an act granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from Lake Superior to Puget Sound, on the Pacific coast, by the northern route' (13 Statutes at Large, page 365,) the Northern Pacific Railroad Company was authorized and empowered to lay out, locate, construct, furnish, maintain, and enjoy a continuous railroad and telegraph line, with the appurtenances, namely: Beginning at a point on Lake Superior, in the State of Minnesota or Wisconsin, thence westerly by the most eligible railroad route, as shall be determined by said company, within the territory of the United States, on a line north of the forty-fifth degree of latitude, to some point on Puget Sound; and

"Whereas by section 2 of said act Congress granted to said company the right of way for the construction of said railroad and telegraph line to the extent of two hundred feet in width on each side of said railroad where it may pass through the public domain, including all necessary ground for station-buildings, workshops, depots, machine-shops, switches, side-tracks, turn-tables, and water-stations; and

"Whereas by said section 2 Congress provided that the United States should extinguish as rapidly as may be consistent with public policy and the welfare of the Indians the Indian titles to all lands falling under the operation of this act and acquired in the donation to the road named in the act; and

"Whereas by treaty between the United States and the Crow Indians concluded at Fort Laramie, May 7, 1868, and duly ratified and proclaimed, (15 Statutes at Large, page 649,) a district of country in the Territory of Montana was set apart as a reservation for the absolute and undisturbed use and occupation of said Indians; and

"Whereas there is no provision or stipulation in said treaty authorizing said company or recognizing its right to construct its road through said reservation; and

"Whereas the said company did, on the 25th day of June, 1881, file in the Department of the Interior a map showing the definite location of its line of railroad from the one hundred and seventh degree of longitude west from Greenwich westwardly through said reservation and adjacent territory to the western boundary of the said reserve, as provided by said act of 1864, the company having first obtained the permission of the Secretary of the Interior to survey its line in said reservation; and

"Whereas the said company desires to construct its line of railroad upon such designated route, and claims the right by virtue of said act so to do:

"Now, therefore, in order to fulfill the obligations of the Government in the premises, this agreement, made this 22d day of August, A. D. 1881, between the Crow tribe of Indians resident on the Crow reservation, in the Territory of Montana, represented by their chiefs, headmen, and heads of a majority of families, and being a majority of all the adult male Indians occupying or interested in the lands hereinafter described, the said Indians acting under the supervision and with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior of the United States, of the one part, and the United States of America, represented by Llewellyn A. Luce, William H. Walker, and Charles A. Maxwell, special agents duly appointed in this behalf by the Secretary of the Interior, of the other part, witnesseth: that for the consideration hereinafter mentioned the Crow tribe of Indians do hereby surrender and relinquish to the United States all their right, title, and interest in and to all that part of the Crow Reservation situate in the Territory of Montana and described as follows, namely:

"A strip of land not exceeding four hundred feet in width, that is to say, two hundred feet on each side of the line laid down on the map of definite location hereinbefore mentioned, wherever said line runs through said reservation between the one hundred and seventh degree of longitude west of Greenwich on the east and the mid-channel of the Big Boulder River on the west, containing 5.384 acres, more or less. An official copy of said map of definite location was, on this 22d day of August, A. D. 1881, produced before said special agents and the Indians in council, was fully explained to said Indians, and is hereunto attached, marked A, and made a part of this agreement. Also the several parcels of land situate along and adjoining the said strip of land hereinbefore mentioned between the one hundred and seventh degree of longitude west of Greenwich on the east and the mid-channel of the Big Boulder River on the west, as defined and described on a map produced before said special agents and the Indians in council on the day and date above mentioned, and fully explained to and understood by said Indians; said tracts being designated on the aforesaid map by the letters A, B, C, D, E, F, G, H, I, J, and K, and containing, respectively, the following area, that is to say: Tract A, 26.23 acres; tract B, 28.54 acres; tract C, 26.23 acres; tract E, 26.23 acres; tract F, 26.23 acres; tract G, 26.23 acres; tract H, 26.23 acres; tract I, 26.23 acres; tract J, 28.32 acres; tract K, 26.23 acres, aggregating 266 acres, more or less, said map being hereunto attached, marked B, and made a part of this agreement; which last-mentioned tracts are intended for the use of said Northern Pacific Railroad Company for station-houses, depots, switches, &c. It is further stipulated and agreed that the United States will not permit the said railroad company, its employés or agents, to trespass upon any part of the lands of the Crow Indian reservation not hereby relinquished, nor permit said company, its employés or agents, to cut any timber, wood, or hay from the lands embraced in said reservation.

"And it is further stipulated and agreed that the Secretary of the Interior, upon such terms as he may see fit to impose, may permit to be constructed, maintained, and used within said Crow Indian reservation wagon-roads not exceeding three in number, in addition to any established wagon roads which may be now in use therein; the said three roads to connect with the line of said railroad at such points as the Secretary of the Interior may designate; all of which wagon-roads shall be under the control of the Government of the United States.

"In consideration for the lands hereby relinquished, amounting in the aggregate to 5,650 acres, more or less, and for the privileges herein granted, the United States stipulates and agrees to pay to the Crow tribe of Indians the sum of $25,000, to be deposited in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the said tribe of Indians upon the ratification of this agreement by Congress and the necessary appropriation made therefor, the sum aforesaid to be expended for the benefit of said Indians in such manner as the Secretary of the Interior may direct; the same to be in addition to any and all moneys to which the said Indians are entitled under the provisions of the treaty of May 7, 1868, hereinbefore mentioned.

"All provisions of existing treaties with the Crow Indians not affected by this agreement are to remain in full force and effect, and this agreement is to be subject to ratification by Congress.

"Executed at Crow agency, in the Territory of Montana, this 27th day of August, A. D. 1881, as witness the following signatures."

SEC. 2. That for the purpose of carrying the provisions of this act into effect the sum of $25,000 is hereby set aside, out of any moneys in the United States Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be deposited in the United States Treasury to the credit of the Crow tribe of Indians, and to be expended for the benefit of the said Indians in such manner as the Secretary of the Interior may direct.

SEC. 3. That the right of way over the land relinquished by said agreement to the United States for the construction of said Northern Pacific Railroad, and the use of the several parcels of land so relinquished intended to be used for depots, stations, sidings, &c., for said railroad, are hereby granted to said Northern Pacific Railroad Company, its successors and assigns, for the uses and purposes in said agreement set forth; but the land, or any part thereof, relinquished to the United States by said agreement shall not be used for railroad purposes by or for the said Northern Pacific Railroad Company, its successors or assigns, except upon the condition precedent that the said company, its successors or assigns, shall, within sixty days from the taking effect of this act, pay to the Treasurer of the United States said sum of $25,000 hereby appropriated to be paid by the United States for the lands relinquished to the United States by said agreement, and shall within the same time file with the Secretary of the Interior its written acceptance of the conditions of this section; nor shall said land, or any part thereof, be continued to be used for railroad purposes by or for said Northern Pacific Railroad Company, its successors or assigns, except upon the further condition that said company, its successors or assigns, will pay any and all damages which the United States or said Indians, individually or in their tribal capacity, or any other Indians lawfully occupying said reservation, may sustain by reason or on account of the act or acts of said company, its successors or assigns, its agents or employés, or on account of fires originating by or in the construction or operation of said railroad, the damages in all cases to be recovered in any court of the Territory of Montana having jurisdiction of the amount claimed, upon suit or action instituted by the proper United States attorney in the name of the United States: Provided, That the said United States attorney may accept such sum of money in satisfaction of any such injury or damages as in his discretion may be just; and if so accepted before suit or action is commenced, no suit or action shall be instituted, and if accepted after commencement of suit or action the same shall be dismissed at the cost of said company, its successors or assigns.

SEC. 4. That all moneys accepted or recovered under the provisions of section 3 of this act shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States, and if accepted or recovered on account of damages sustained by said Indians as aforesaid, they shall be placed to the credit of said Indians in their tribal names, to be expended by the Secretary of the Interior for the benefit of said Indians in such manner as he may deem for their best interest, except in the case of an individual Indian, when the amount covered into the Treasury shall be expended for his sole benefit.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT PENSACOLA, FLORIDA.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4669) for the erection of a public building at Pensacola, Florida, and that the same be brought before the House for present consideration.

I wish to say that the State of Florida has not had the benefit of unanimous consent during the present session of Congress.

Objection was made.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CRAPO. I desire to bring before the House for present consideration a bill in relation to danger signals at sea. It is of very great practical importance to our merchant marine.

Mr. RANDALL. I insist on the regular order.

INTERNATIONAL FISHERIES EXHIBITION.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed:

To the House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith for the consideration of the House of Representatives a report from the Secretary of State in relation to the international fisheries exhibition which is to be held at London in May, 1883. Fully approving of the suggestions contained in the report, I would earnestly recommend that favorable action be taken upon the subject at the present session of Congress in order that there may be ample time for making the appropriations necessary to enable this country to participate in the exhibition.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, April 25, 1882.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HOOKER. I ask unanimous consent to bring a bill before the House for present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded.

Mr. HOOKER. If this is objected to, I will object to the consideration of any bill by unanimous consent.

Mr. VALENTINE. The objection is made on your own side.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Mississippi that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] has called for the regular order and insists on it.

Mr. HOOKER. All right; I give notice I will object to the consideration of every bill by consent.

Mr. RANDALL. Somebody ought to do that.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. VALENTINE. I am directed by the Committee on Agriculture to report back the bill (H. R. No. 4466) making appropriations for the Agricultural Department of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes, with amendments by the Senate, and to move that the House non-concur in the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. The amendments will be read.

Mr. HATCH. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HATCH. Is it necessary that the amendments, where it is recommended that they be non-concurred in as a whole, shall be read?

The SPEAKER. It is not necessary if the reading be dispensed with. But the better practice is to have all matters read on which the House is called to act.

Mr. RANDALL. I call for the reading of the amendments.

Mr. HOOKER. Is this the regular order?

The SPEAKER. It is.

The Clerk proceeded to read the amendments, as follows:

In line 12 add "five hundred;" so that it will read: "For compensation of Commissioner of Agriculture, $4,500."

In line 13, after the words "chief clerk in said Department," insert "who shall be superintendent of the Department building."

In line 14 add the words "two hundred;" so that it will read: "Chief clerk in said Department, etc., $2,200."

In line 16, after the word "accounts," insert the word "and."

In lines 16 and 17 strike out the words "and superintendent of the Department building."

In line 33 change the total from $59,280 to $59,980.

In line 35 add the words "five hundred;" so that it will read: "For compensation of chief chemist, $2,500."

In line 41 change the total from $9,000 to $9,500.

In line 43 add the words "four hundred;" so that it will read: "For compensation of entomologist, $2,500."

In line 45 strike out "two" and insert "four;" so that it will read: "One assistant entomologist, $1,400."

In line 47 change the total from $7,200 to $7,900.

Strike out from line 49 to 55, inclusive, the following:

"Statistical division:

"For compensation of one statistician, $2,000; one clerk of class 4, $1,800; two clerks of class 3, $3,200; one clerk of class 2, $1,400; four clerks of class 1, $4,800; in all, $13,200."

Strike out from line 78 to 86, inclusive, the following:

"And it is hereby enacted that, in addition to the proper vouchers and accounts for the sums herein appropriated to the accounting officers of the Treasury, the Commissioner of Agriculture shall present a detailed statement of the manner of the expenditure of the amounts hereby appropriated, to accompany his estimates to be presented at the next regular session of Congress: Provided, That no part of these sums shall be paid to any person receiving at the same time other compensation as an officer or employé of the Government."

At line 87 insert "division of agricultural statistics."

At line 88 insert the following:

"For compensation of one statistician, $2,500; one clerk of class 4, $1,800; two clerks of class 3, $3,200; one clerk of class 2, $1,400; four clerks of class 1, $4,800; in all, $13,700."

Mr. HOLMAN. I suggest that this reading conveys no intelligent idea to the House. These amendments provide a large increase of salary. I would like the gentleman from Nebraska to explain what salaries are to be increased.

Mr. ATKINS. I desire to hear the amendments read.

Mr. VALENTINE. The motion is to non-concur.

Mr. HOLMAN. To non-concur in all the amendments?

Mr. VALENTINE. Yes, sir.

Mr. ATKINS. I want to hear the bill read.

The SPEAKER. These are amendments of the Senate which the Committee on Agriculture recommend shall be non-concurred in.

Mr. ATKINS. We do not seem to be in a very great hurry to transact public business. I am not in a great hurry, and I want to hear the bill read.

Mr. VALENTINE. I hope the gentleman from Tennessee will not insist upon that.

Mr. ATKINS. I insist on my rights.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska asks the action of the House upon the amendments of the Senate. The Clerk will continue the reading of the amendments. They will be read in their connection with the bill; and if gentlemen insist, they will be voted upon separately.

The Clerk continued and concluded the reading of the amendments, as follows:

In line 98 strike out "$75,000" and insert "$80,000;" so that it will read: "For collecting agricultural statistics, &c., $80,000."

In line 98 strike out "to" and insert "of which sum $10,000 shall be;" so that it will read, "$80,000, of which sum $10,000 shall be immediately available."

Strike out, in line 103 to line 106, inclusive, these words:

"Provided, That no part of this sum shall be paid to any person receiving at the same time other compensation as an officer or employé of the Government."

In line 140 strike out the words "expenses of machinery and apparatus, labor, &c., to continue."

In line 142, after "sorghum," insert "beets."

In line 143 strike out "$25,000" and insert "$10,000."

Strike out, in line 143 to 147, the following:

"To be available immediately; and out of the above sum the Commissioner of Agriculture is hereby authorized to pay the chief chemist $1,000 as additional compensation for the next fiscal year."

Strike out, in line 147 to line 149, the following:

"For the continuation of experiments in connection with the manufacture of sugar from beets and for the cultivation of beets; for that purpose, $10,000."

As amended by the last five amendments, the paragraph would read:

For experiments in the manufacture of sugar from sorghum, beets, and other producing plants, $10,000.

In line 178, under the head "library," add the words "five hundred;" so as to make the amount $1,500.

In line 183, after the words "for investigating the history and habits of insects injurious to agriculture" add the following: "And for the orange and lemon and plants of the citrus family, including the Rocky Mountain locust and the cotton-worm."

At the end of the paragraph strike out the words "to be immediately available."

Strike out from line 190 to line 195, as follows:

"Rocky Mountain locust:

"For continuing the exploration of those portions of the country where the Rocky Mountain locust permanently breeds, with a view to ascertaining and reporting upon the prospects of the locust injury in the Mississippi and Missouri Valleys, $5,000, to be immediately available."

In line 202, in the appropriation for examination of wools and animal fibers, strike out "which shall be available immediately."

In lines 204 and 205 strike out the words "swine, sheep, and other;" so that it will read: "Investigating the diseases of domesticated animals."

In lines 206 and 207 strike out the words "diseases of swine and sheep, and."

In line 208 strike out the word "other."

Strike out, from line 210 to line 216, the following:

"Data respecting the agricultural needs of the country west of the Rocky Mountains:

"For the purpose of enabling the Commissioner of Agriculture to procure and publish data touching the agricultural needs of that portion of the United States lying west of the Rocky Mountains, $5,000, to be immediately available."

In line 218 to line 220, under the head of "reclamation of arid and waste lands," strike out "the reclamation of arid and waste lands lying in certain Western States and Territories, $20,000, to be immediately available," and insert "locating and sinking one artesian well on the plains east of the Rocky Mountains, with a view to reclaiming arid and waste public lands, $10,000."

In line 227, under the same head, strike out the words "to be immediately available."

In line 232, under the head "forestry," strike out the words "to experiment and."

In line 233, under the same head, change the amount of the appropriation from $7,000 to $10,000.

In line 247, under the head "contingent expenses," add the words "$2,000 of which sum shall be immediately available,"

After line 252 add the following:

"For repairing and resurfacing concrete roads and walks on the grounds, $5,000."

Add at the end of the bill the following new section:

"SEC. 2. That no part of the sums herein or hereafter appropriated for the Department of Agriculture shall be paid to any person, as additional salary or compensation, receiving at the same time other compensation as an officer or employé of the Government; and in addition to the proper vouchers and accounts for the sums appropriated for the said Department to be furnished to the accounting officers of the Treasury, the Commissioner of Agriculture shall, at the commencement of each regular session, present to Congress a detailed statement of the expenditures of all appropriations for said Department for the last preceding fiscal year."

Mr. DUNNELL. What motion is now pending?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. VALENTINE] reports back this bill with the Senate amendments, and is directed by the Committee on Agriculture to ask that the House non-concur in all the amendments.

Mr. DUNNELL. Let the amendments be printed. I am unwilling to have them passed upon except in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. VALENTINE. The bill has been reprinted with the Senate amendments.

Mr. DUNNELL. I desire that they shall be considered in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. VALENTINE. I claim that it is too late to make that point now.

Mr. DUNNELL. I insist that I am in time. I am not willing that all these amendments shall go to a committee of conference without being considered in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ATKINS. Is there a detailed statement showing what these amendments are?

The SPEAKER. There is none that the Chair knows of. This is not a conference report, but a report from the Committee on Agriculture of the House bill with the Senate amendments. The Chair thinks the point of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] is too late, the House having entered upon the consideration of these amendments.

Mr. DUNNELL. We have not entered upon the consideration of the amendments at all. We have simply heard read the report of the Committee on Agriculture.

The SPEAKER. There is no report from the Committee on Agriculture other than the bill and the amendments.

Mr. DUNNELL. The amendments are very many and very important.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has the right to insist upon separate votes on these amendments; but the Chair thinks it is too late for him to make the point that the amendments must receive their first consideration in the Committee of the Whole House. The question is upon non-concurring in the amendments of the Senate to this bill.

The question was taken; and the amendments of the Senate were not concurred in.

Mr. VALENTINE moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments of the Senate were not concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BOWMAN. I call for the regular order.

Mr. CALKINS. I rise to a question of the highest privilege, and call up the contested election case of Lynch vs. Chalmers.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask the gentleman to yield to me to submit a resolution for reference to the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. CALKINS. I will yield for that purpose.

CLERK OF JOINT COMMITTEE ON PRINTING.

Mr. SPRINGER, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read and referred to the Committee on Accounts:

Resolved, That the Committee on Appropriations be, and are hereby, respectfully requested to make provision in the legislative, executive, and judicial bill for the ensuing fiscal year for the clerk of the Joint Committee on Printing as one of the annual clerks provided for in that bill, at the same compensation as is now allowed to the clerk of printing records of the Senate.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BOWMAN. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BOWMAN. I desire to call up the special order for this day, being the Court of Claims bill, and would ask the Chair if that does not take precedence of the business called up by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. CALKINS.] It is not only unfinished business, but I call to the attention of the Speaker the fact that it is a special order and comes up in that form, which under the ruling of the Chair it seems to me entitles it to precedence until finished.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the bill, which was a special order and is unfinished business, is not in order at this time, and would be in order only after the morning hour; and it would not then be in order as against the question of high privilege called up by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. CALKINS,] being the contested-election case of Lynch vs. Chalmers.

Mr. BOWMAN. I would ask whether because it is unfinished business it therefore loses its right as a special order, as an unfinished assignment?

The SPEAKER. It does not lose any rights.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. What has become of the morning hour?

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has not yet been reached.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Is not that in order now?

The SPEAKER. It would be in order if nothing of higher privilege intervened. The Chair holds that the contested-election case takes precedence of the morning hour.

Mr. BOWMAN. I will raise the question of consideration against the contested-election case, giving notice to the House that I desire to obtain a vote on the Court of Claims bill, which is all that remains to be done with it.

Mr. ROBESON. Can the gentleman raise a question of consideration now in favor of something that is not in order until after the morning hour?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] calls up the contested-election case of Lynch vs. Chalmers. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOWMAN] indicates his purpose to raise the question of consideration.

Mr. BOWMAN. I will withdraw that.

Mr. CALKINS. I will yield to my colleague on the Committee on Elections, the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. PETTIBONE,] who will open the case.

Mr. BINGHAM. On the 17th instant the House set apart to-day for the consideration of bills from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, subject to the qualification that House bill No. 4668 should be excluded from consideration. That order was to take effect after the morning hour of to-day. By the recognition of the Chair the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] calls up a case of higher privilege, which if considered by the House at this time I presume will preclude any morning hour for to-day. I therefore ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] to yield to me to submit a resolution indicating another day for the consideration of the business of the Post-Office Committee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. I object.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I desire to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means [Mr. KELLEY] or of some one having charge of the tariff-commission bill, whether that bill has been abandoned or whether it is the intention to call it up to-day?

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to ask what the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] in charge of the bills from the Post-Office Committee proposes to do; whether he will raise the question of consideration on the contested-election case so as to proceed with that business to-day?

The SPEAKER. That is not a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. RANDALL. I am putting the question to my colleague [Mr. BINGHAM] through the Chair.

Mr. BINGHAM. The business of the Post-Office Committee was made a special order for to-day after the morning hour, and it cannot come up unless we have a morning hour.

Mr. RANDALL. Then I raise the question of consideration against the contested-election case.

Mr. KELLEY. I ask the gentleman in charge of the election case whether an arrangement cannot be made by which the business of the House may proceed, and the discussion of the tariff-commission bill be brought to a conclusion without the consumption of time daily by the antagonism between the Committee on Elections and the Committee on Ways and Means?

Mr. RANDALL. We cannot hear the statement of my colleague, [Mr. KELLEY.]

Mr. KELLEY. I say, Mr. Speaker, that I have no desire to antagonize the Committee on Elections, but I most earnestly desire that the tariff-commission bill may be considered—considered fully, and the debate terminated. In order to arrive at an arrangement, I ask the gentleman representing the Committee on Elections to say what he proposes to do, and I shall then ask the House to sanction an arrangement by which we may know whether the tariff-commission bill is ever to be further considered, and if so, when and how fully.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. That is right.

Mr. CALKINS. Before I answer the question of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. ATHERTON,] my colleague on the Committee on Elections, who has charge of the report of the minority, how much time is deemed necessary on their side for discussion. I wish an answer so that I may be able to reply to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee.

Mr. ATHERTON. I am inclined to think that four or five hours on our side would be in the neighborhood of what we shall want.

Mr. CALKINS. Then I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that perhaps in two days we can dispose of this case; and I shall then feel at liberty to let the tariff-commission bill proceed without further antagonism. This is all I can say.

Mr. ATHERTON. Why would it not be well to have an understanding with members of the Committee on Ways and Means as to how much time they may desire to finish the discussion of the tariff-commission bill, and then have it understood that without any further effort at delay we shall take up this case and go through with it? Let them finish their business and then let us finish ours.

Mr. KELLEY. I cannot tell what amount of time we may require; for I do not know how many gentlemen desire to speak. I do know that three members of the Committee on Ways and Means, the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. MORRISON,] the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. TUCKER,] and my distinguished colleague, [Mr. RANDALL,] have prepared themselves to speak and desire to do so. I hear that other gentlemen are also prepared. This I am ready to say: I shall be grateful to the House if it will agree that when this election case is disposed of in any way—if it be not taken up, or if it should come up and be disposed of—we shall then immediately proceed with the discussion of the tariff-commission bill until it shall be terminated. The House can terminate it at any time. I would ask further that the discussion proceed daily until five o'clock, and that the House take a recess to continue the discussion in the evening, so as to bring the debate to a conclusion as soon as possible.

Mr. HOOKER. I rise to a point of order. I hope that we shall proceed in the regular way, and that we shall not discuss the question as to what time is to be occupied upon any particular measure until we know whether that measure is up for consideration.

Mr. CALKINS. The suggestion is a good one; and as the question of consideration is raised, I ask a vote upon it at once, without further discussion.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania insist on the question of consideration?

Mr. RANDALL. If we go on with the contested-election case, it shuts out both the tariff-commission bill and the business of the Post Office Committee, which was assigned for to-day. I insist on the question of consideration.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Will the House proceed to the consideration of the contested election case of Lynch vs. Chalmers?

The question was taken; and there were—ayes 99, noes 84.

Mr. RANDALL. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 115, nays 98, not voting 78; as follows:

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, with Mr. WILSON.

Mr. WEST with Mr. HARRIS, of New Jersey.

Mr. FARWELL, of Illinois, with Mr. MARTIN.

Mr. HISCOCK with Mr. BLACKBURN.

Mr. WAIT with Mr. HOGE.

Mr. WILLITS with Mr. KNOTT.

Mr. MULDROW with Mr. MILES.

Mr. LEEDOM with Mr. SHULTZ.

Mr. GEDDES with Mr. RICE of Ohio.

Mr. MOREY with Mr. FROST.

Mr. CROWLEY with Mr. NOLAN.

Mr. FISHER with Mr. COBB.

Mr. WALTER A. WOOD with Mr. BENJAMIN WOOD.

Mr. HENDERSON with Mr. SINGLETON of Illinois.

Mr. MARSH with Mr. MCKENZIE.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS with Mr. BEACH.

Mr. RYAN with Mr. LE FEVRE.

Mr. HOUK with Mr. DIBRELL.

Mr. HUBBELL with Mr. STEPHENS.

Mr. HOBLITZELL with Mr. URNER.

Mr. MCLANE with Mr. MCKINLEY.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. I move, Mr. Speaker, to dispense with the reading of the names.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. I object.

Mr. CALKINS. Do I understand there is objection to dispensing with the reading of the names?

The SPEAKER. Yes, the gentleman from Georgia objects.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. CALKINS moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE OF LYNCH VS. CHALMERS.

The SPEAKER. The House has resolved to proceed with the consideration of the contested-election case of Lynch vs. Chalmers.

Mr. ATHERTON. I ask for the reading both of the majority and minority reports.

The SPEAKER. The majority report of the Committee on Elections is up for consideration. The other paper contains the mere views of the minority.

Mr. ATHERTON. I ask to have the views of the minority read, and in all fairness I hope it will not be objected to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman is entitled to the reading of the report of the majority, but not to the reading of the views of the minority.

Mr. ATHERTON. Can we not have universal consent to have both reports read.

Mr. CALKINS. It is so unusual in these contested-election cases that I cannot consent. I should like to consent, in order to accommodate the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. ATHERTON. I am appealing to the generosity of the other side of this House to permit the reading of the views of the minority, as they are a statement of our case.

Mr. CALKINS. I am willing to agree to granting anything that is usual.

Mr. ATHERTON. After the reading of the majority report I give notice I shall ask for the reading of the minority report, and I hope in all fairness it will be granted to me, as I never have asked anything since I have been a member of the House.

Mr. CALKINS. Whatever right the gentleman has I know he will take care of, but whatever is not his right and is unusual I must object to.

Mr. ATHERTON. I am throwing myself upon the generosity of my friends on the other side.

Mr. CALKINS. I am willing to compromise by having neither read.

Mr. ATHERTON. Very well; let us have the report of the majority read now.

The SPEAKER. There is no rule which gives the gentleman that right except when the House comes to vote on the proposition; and then it is a mere matter of practice, and the Chair thinks it is a good practice.

Mr. CALKINS. That question does not arise now.

Mr. MOULTON. I would inquire whether the minority report is not entitled to as much consideration as the majority report so far as the reading is concerned.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman speaks of the views of the minority as a minority report. It is not a report in the proper parliamentary sense of the word, but simply the views of the minority which are usually submitted and ordered to be printed with the majority report. But it is not a report according to the strict use of the term, nor a report presented for consideration which entitles it to be read at any time on the demand of any member. How far the House may consider the views of the minority when the question of voting arises the Chair is of course unable to indicate.

Mr. REED. Does the Chair decide that the report of the majority must be read at the request of a member?

The SPEAKER. The Chair states that the practice has been to permit the reading of a report on the demand of any member. The Chair does not recall any rule, however, which requires it; although the Chair believes it to be the right of a member to have a report read on which he is called to vote.

Mr. REED. Would an objection be good against the reading of the report?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. REED. It seems to be a sheer waste of time.

The SPEAKER. That is a matter with the members themselves.

Mr. REED. Every member is presumed to have read the report.

Mr. HASKELL. If the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. PETTIBONE,] who was on the floor, asserts his right to the time I do not see how he could be taken off the floor upon a request to have the report read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee was not on the floor at the time the request was made.

Mr. PAGE. Is that the right of a member to have a report read?

The SPEAKER. It is the practice of the House at the request of any member to allow the report to be read in any case on which the House is called to vote.

Mr. DUNNELL. Does the gentleman from Ohio insist upon the reading of the report?

Mr. ATHERTON. I do.

Mr. REED. Has he the right under the rules of the House to have it read? This is a long report; and if he has not the right, inasmuch as the reading will simply occupy a great deal of unnecessary time, I object to it.

The SPEAKER. As the Chair has already stated, the practice has been to allow the reading of a report upon the request of a member. It is held to be the right of any member to have the report read upon any question on which he is called to vote.

Mr. REED. Well, when he gets so much information from the speeches it does seem to be really superfluous to take up so much time as this report will take up.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will proceed to read the report.

The report was read, as follows:

Your committee, to whom was referred the above-entitled contested-election case, having had the same under consideration, beg leave to report:

That the contest in this case was commenced by contestant, and the following facts were set out by him in his notice as the grounds on which he relied to maintain it:

First. He alleges, as a fact, that he received the highest number of legal votes cast in the sixth Congressional district in Mississippi for Representative in the Forty-seventh Congress.

Second. That the true result and return was suppressed and made to appear the other way by reason of frauds and violation of law, more particularly set forth as follows:

a. In Adams County, city of Natchez, Jefferson Hotel and Washington precincts, Republican voters were purposely and fraudulently hindered and delayed in voting until the time arrived for the closing of the polls, leaving several hundred voters standing around the polls, anxiously waiting to vote, of which privilege they were deprived by a systematic course of delay set on foot and carried out by prominent Democrats and the election officers.

b. That in Washington, Kingston, Pine Ridge, and Beverly precincts the ballot-boxes were tampered with and stuffed, and the further violations of the law in refusing to allow the United States supervisors to be present and witness the counting of the votes after the election closed; and at Palestine and Dead Man's Bend precincts, in said county, the election officers fraudulently and unlawfully refused to count the votes polled, whereby 214 votes majority in those precincts were lost to contestant.

c. Jefferson County.—At Rodney precinct, where the contestant received 145 majority, the officer in charge of the returns on his way to the county seat with the papers declaring the result of the election was intercepted, the returns forcibly taken from him and destroyed, whereby that result was lost to the contestant.

d. Claiborne County.—At the precinct of Grand Gulf the United States supervisor of elections was refused the right to be present to witness the count, and the ballot-box was stuffed.

e. Warren County.—That the commissioners of election threw out 2,029 lawful votes cast for the contestant, and refused to count them.

f. Issaquena County.—That the commissioners of election threw out 785 lawful votes cast for the contestant, and refused to count them.

g. Washington County.—At the voting precincts of Stoneville, Refuge, and Lake Washington, 170 votes for the contestant were thrown out. At Greenville, Robb, and Stone precincts the ballot-boxes were taken away and counted in the absence of the United States supervisor of election, and without his consent and against his protest. At the Court-House precinct, as well as at the said precincts of Robb and Stone, ballot-boxes were corruptly stuffed.

h. Bolivar County.—At the precincts of Australia, Holmes Lake, Bolivar Landing, and Glencoe, 678 legal votes for the contestant were excluded by the officers of election without cause.

i. Coahoma County.—That the officers of election excluded and refused to count any of the votes polled in any of the various precincts of that county, except Friar's Point, whereby 700 votes were lost to the contestant.

To this notice the contestee, answering, denied the allegations of fraud in Adams County, and denied specially the other allegations of contestant's notice relative to the various precincts therein, except Palestine and Dead Man's Bend. In those two precincts the contestee alleged that the ballots were rejected strictly in accordance with the laws of Mississippi.

Second. As to Rodney precinct, the contestee admits that there were 247 votes cast for the contestant and 92 for the contestee, and that they were destroyed, but that they ought not to be counted unless it is shown they were in accordance with section 137 of the Revised Code of Mississippi of 1880.

Third. As to Claiborne County, it is denied that the boxes were stuffed, or that the United States supervisor was refused permission to be present at the counting of the ballots.

Fourth. As to the votes in Warren County, the contestee alleges, in answer specially, that 628 of the 2,029 ballots were not counted for the following reasons: (a) that at Bovenia precinct 174 ballots were too wide; (b) that at the fourth ward precinct, city of Vicksburgh, 214 ballots had marks upon them; (c) that at Pryor's Church precinct 240 ballots had marks upon them; (d) that at the other precincts in said county there were 1,821 ballots marked in violation of law and were not counted, which makes a total of 2,049, of which 2,029 had on them the name of contestant and 20 the name of contestee.

Fifth. As to Issaquena County, the contestee alleges that the officers of election rejected the returns made from Skipworth, Ben Lomond, Ingomar, and Hays's Landing precincts, because the officers of election did not comply with the law, and that the ballots and tally-list did not correspond by from 40 to 60 votes, and that at Hays's Landing precinct, in addition to the above grounds, the whole crew of a steamboat landed there that day and voted without being registered.

Sixth. As to Washington County, a general denial is put in, and in addition contestee alleges that the Stoneville box was rejected because the officers did not comply with section 139 of the Code of Mississippi, and that the box had been taken out of the sight and control of the officers by one Johnson, a partisan of contestant. The Lake Washington box was not counted because the ballots were not sent up to the commissioners of election, but the statement signed by the clerks and sent up showed a majority of 116 for contestee.

Seventh. As to Bolivar County, contestee makes a certificate signed by the commissioners of election of that county a part of his answer, and affirms, as we understand it, the legality of their action. They report that they threw out the Australia precinct box—59 Democratic and 192 Republican votes—

"Because the returns were not certified to by the inspectors or the clerks. We have thrown out the Holmes Lake precinct because the box was not opened nor the ballots counted by the inspectors and numbered by the clerks, and no returns or tally-sheet made.

"We have thrown out the Bolivar precinct—45 Democratic and 311 Republican votes—because there was no certified return from the inspectors and clerks. The tally-sheets sent in the box show the names of the electors of the Democratic and Republican parties, of James R. Chalmers, John R. Lynch, G. B. Lancaster, M. Rolons, James Winters, ——— Fleming, and James White, but does not show for what office they were voted for. The tally is kept on four different sheets of paper. The total can only be guessed at, but not ascertained correctly.

"We have rejected the Glencoe precinct vote—27 Democratic and 233 Republican votes—because the vote was counted out in part by all the inspectors and clerks and then discontinued until next day, when the count was finished by one inspector and one clerk, and a very imperfect tally-sheet and return sent in by these two not certified to.

"W. A. YERGER,
"Commissioners of Election."

Eighth. As to Coahoma County the contestee denies the allegations of contestant and affirms that the acts of the election officers were strictly in accordance with the laws of Mississippi. Appended to contestee's answer the following notice is addressed to the contestant:

"NOTICE TO HON. J. R. LYNCH.

"And now, having answered all of your specifications, you will take notice that I will insist and endeavor to prove and maintain:

"1. That you did not receive a single legal vote in the sixth Congressional district of Mississippi for member to the Forty-seventh Congress of the United States; that all your tickets were marked so that they could be, and were, easily distinguished by persons who could not read from the Democratic ticket and also from the regular Republican ticket printed at Jackson, Mississippi, under the supervision of the executive committee of the Republican party, and that your tickets were illegal because not such as is prescribed by section 137 of the Revised Statutes of Mississippi, 1880.

"2. That these marked tickets were examined and approved by you before they were circulated, and that you paid four dollars per thousand for these marked tickets when you could have procured from the Republican executive committee legal tickets for your district for one dollar per thousand.

"3. That you made false representation to the secretary of state of Mississippi about the printing of your tickets when attempting to prevent him from issuing to me a certificate of election.

"4. That your friends and partisans, in violation of law and contrary to the very essence of voting by ballot, stood at the polls and kept a list of the voters and how each voted as the ballots were handed in.

"5. That at Stoneville and Refuge precinct in Washington County, your friends and partisans, some of whom were United States supervisors of election, browbeat, bullied, and intimidated a number of colored voters who desired to vote for me, and prevented them from so voting.

"I will insist and maintain that you were unpopular with your own party for many reasons, and especially because you opposed the nomination of General Grant for President, and that a large number of leading colored Republicans supported me on the stump and at the polls; that I was elected, and that you were not.

"JAS. R. CHALMERS."

LEGAL PROCEEDINGS.

It appears from the record that on the 16th day of November, 1880, the contestant went before Hon. J. A. P. Campbell, one of the supreme judges of the court of Mississippi, and acting as chancellor of the chancery court of Hinds County, Mississippi, and tendered his sworn bill of complaint, in and by which he sought to enjoin Hon. Henry C. Meyers, secretary of state, from declaring the contestee duly elected a Representative in the Forty-seventh Congress from the sixth Congressional district of Mississippi. Among other things in his bill of complaint the contestant alleges that the returns filed in the secretary of state's office from the several counties showed that he received the votes following:

Adams County	1,194
Bolivar County	1,715
Claiborne County	288
Coahoma County	1,112
Issaquena County	1,118
Jefferson County	386
Quitman County	83
Sharkey County	175
Tunica County	506
Warren County	2,086
Washington County	1,298
Wilkinson County	814
Total number of votes	10,775

And that the contestee received the following votes:

Adams County	1,419
Bolivar County	403
Claiborne County	1,061
Coahoma County	553
Issaquena County	173
Jefferson County	1,043
Quitman County	153
Sharkey County	484
Tunica County	239
Warren County	1,034
Washington County	1,963
Wilkinson County	1,691
Total number of votes	10,216

He also alleges that there was deducted from the votes thus returned for him in the counties of—

Adams	316
Bolivar	736
Coahoma	760
Issaquena	785
Jefferson	250
Warren	2,029
Washington	526
Total votes rejected	5,402

And from the vote of said Chalmers in the counties of—

Adams	32
Bolivar	102
Coahoma	328
Issaquena	114
Jefferson	92
Warren	20
Washington	356
Total votes rejected	1,044

And he claimed that the deductions made from his vote were unauthorized and unlawful, and he asked the intervention of the court to prevent the issuing of a certificate of election to the contestee.

Judge Campbell made the following indorsement on the bill of complaint:

"I decline to grant the injunction prayed for in the annexed bill, because the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States is the exclusive judge 'of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members,' (made so by the Constitution of the United States,) and a decision of the question as to the election of a member of Congress by any other tribunal would not be authoritative or final. Besides this, the chancery court is not authorized to decide contested elections, and whatever its right, if any, to enjoin in aid of a contest inaugurated in a court of the State, which such court could lawfully determine, it appears to be clear that interference by injunction to prevent an executive officer from performing a duty prescribed by law, in reference to an election as to which no court can decide, so as to conclude any body or thing, would be without the semblance of right.

"J. A. P. CAMPBELL,
"One of the Judges of the Supreme Court of Mississippi.

"JACKSON, MISS., November 17, 1880."

By the Revised Code (1880) of Mississippi, the following provision is made relative to the writ of mandamus:

"SEC. 2542. On the petition of the State by its attorney-general, or a district attorney, in any matter affecting the public interest, or on petition of any private person who is interested, the writ of mandamus shall be issued by a circuit court commanding any inferior tribunal, corporation, board, officer, or person to do or not to do an act, the performance or omission of which the law especially enjoins as a duty resulting from an office, trust, or station, and where there is not a plain, adequate, and speedy remedy in the ordinary course of law."

Under this section the district attorney of Tunica County filed his petition in the circuit court of that county against the election commissioners to compel them to reassemble and reject 506 ballots which had been counted for the contestant, Mr. Lynch, and which were claimed to be illegal because they contained marks and devices in violation of the election laws. The petition was denied, and an appeal was taken to the supreme court of the State. The case is reported in 58 Mississippi, 502, and is as follows:

"IRA D. OGLESBY, DISTRICT ATTORNEY, "vs.
"J. I. SIGIMAN ET AL., COMMISSIONERS OF ELECTION.

"Appeal from circuit court, Tunica County, Hon. Samuel Powell, judge.

"On the 9th of December, 1880, Ira D. Oglesby, district attorney for the third judicial district, filed a petition in the circuit court of Tunica County for a mandamus to compel the commissioners of election in that county to reassemble and recanvass the returns made to them by the inspectors of election of the votes cast at the election on the 2d of November, 1880, for a member of Congress from the sixth Congressional district, and to make a statement of the result of such recanvass to the secretary of state within a time to be prescribed by the court. The petition alleged that the commissioners of election had counted 506 ballots which were illegal, because bearing certain marks and devices prohibited by the statute on elections, and prayed that in the recanvass they be required to reject such illegal ballots. The petition was filed under section 2542 of the Code of 1880, and stated as jurisdictional facts that the public is deeply interested in getting a construction of the election law of this State as to the duties of the inspectors and commissioners, concerning which conflicting views are entertained; that these officers are liable to criminal prosecutions, under the laws of the State and of the United States, for any omission or violation of their duties; and that the commissioners of Warren County have already been indicted and arrested for their acts under the election law. A fac-simile of the ballots alleged to have been illegally counted was attached to the petition, and is as follows:

REPUBLICAN NATIONAL TICKET.

For President,
JAMES A. GARFIELD.

For Vice-President,
CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

For Electors for President and Vice-President.
Hon. WILLIAM R. SPEARS,
Hon. R. W. FLOURNOY,
Dr. J. M. BYNUM,
Hon. J. T. SIETTLE,
Captain M. K. MISTER, jr.,
Dr. R. H. MONTGOMERY,
Judge R. H. CUNY,
Hon. CHARLES W. CLARKE,

For Member of the House of Representatives from the 6th Congressional District,
JOHN R. LYNCH.

"The writ of mandamus was issued, and the commissioners of election appeared and demurred to the petition on the following grounds:

"First. That they are merely ministerial officers, and have no power to reject ballots that have been counted by the inspectors.

"Second. That the marks on the ballots for which it is claimed they should be rejected are mere printers' dashes, and are not such distinguishing marks as were contemplated by the statute.

"The court sustained the demurrer and dismissed the petition, and the petitioners appealed to this court. The provisions of the election law, code 1880, bearing directly upon the questions involved in this case, are these:

"SEC. 137. All ballots shall be written or printed in black ink, with a space not less than one-fifth of an inch between each name, on plain, white printing newspaper, not more than two and one-half, nor less than two and one-fourth inches wide, without any device or mark by which one ticket may be known or distinguished from another, except the words at the head of the ticket; but this shall not prohibit the erasure, correction, or insertion of any name by pencil-mark or ink upon the face of the ballot; and a ticket different from that herein prescribed shall not be received or counted.

"SEC. 138. When the results shall have been ascertained by the inspectors, they, or one of them, or some fit person designated by them, shall by twelve o'clock noon of the second day after the election, deliver to the commissioners of election, at the court-house of the county, a statement of the whole number of votes given for each person and for what office, and the said commissioners of election shall canvass the returns so made to them, and shall ascertain and disclose the results, and shall, within ten days after the day of said election, deliver a certificate of his election to the person having the greatest number of votes for any office, &c.

"SEC. 139. The statement of the result of the election at their precincts shall be certified and signed by the inspectors and clerks, and the poll-book, tally-list, list of voters, ballot-boxes, and ballots shall be delivered as above required to the commissioners of election.

"SEC. 140. The commissioners of election shall, within ten days after the election, transmit to the secretary of state, to be filed in his office, a statement of the whole number of votes given in their county for each candidate voted for, for any office at such election, &c.

"The case was submitted by counsel without brief or oral argument.

"Campbell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

"This case presents for adjudication three questions, namely:

"1. Whether the commissioners of election have the right to reject illegal ballots cast and counted by the inspectors of election and returned to them with the statement of the result at the precincts.

"2. Whether the ballots which the commissioners of election for Tunica County refused to reject should have been rejected by them as being illegal for having on them a device or mark by which one may be known or distinguished from another.

"3. Whether the action of the commissioners was final, or whether they may be required by mandamus to meet and act in the matter again, as the court may order.

"We think it clear that the commissioners of election have the right, which they should exercise, to reject ballots returned to them by the inspectors of the election as having been cast at any of the precincts of their county which show themselves on inspection to be illegal. The law devolves on the commissioners of election the duty to prepare for the election by revising the register of electors and the poll-books of the several precincts, so that they may show who are qualified electors, and by appointing inspectors and an officer to keep the peace at each voting-place and by distributing ballot-boxes and poll-books. The inspectors are to judge of the qualification of electors so as to receive or reject ballots offered by them, and when the polls are closed the ballots are to be counted and a statement of the whole number of votes given for each person and for what office is to be made, and this statement, certified and signed by inspectors and clerks, and the poll-book, tally-lists, list of voters, ballot-boxes, and ballots are to be promptly delivered to the commissioners of election at the court-house of the county, to the end that they may canvass the returns so made to them, and see that the result of the election at each precinct, as certified to them by the inspectors and clerks, is correct according to the returns. They are to canvass the returns, that is, they are to scrutinize the acts of those engaged in holding the election at the different places of voting, as shown by the returns made to them in pursuance of law, and determine from such returns who received the greatest number of legal votes, and who is entitled to receive their certificate of election in cases in which they give such certificate, and what return they shall make to the secretary of state.

"It is true that commissioners of election are not judicial officers in the sense of trying causes, hearing evidence, and pronouncing final judgment between parties seeking office, but they are charged with the duty of canvassing returns, which includes the list of voters and list made in counting, and the ballots; and they must examine such returns, and declare the legal result, and certify it. If they find an error in computation, they must correct it. If they ascertain from the lists of voters that persons not registered, and therefore not legal voters, have cast ballots, they cannot correct that, because of inability to ascertain which ballots are legal and which not; but if they find in the ballot-boxes ballots declared by law to be illegal, and such as shall not be counted, it is their plain duty to reject them; and if in canvassing the returns they ascertain that the inspectors in disregard of law have counted ballots it says shall n. be counted, that error should be corrected by the canvassers as certainly as an error of arithmetic should be. The law makes the inspectors judges of the qualifications of electors from necessity, because they are to receive the ballots; and when received and deposited in the box, it is not supposed by the law to be possible to identify them, but the ballots show for themselves whether or not they conform to law, and there is neither difficulty nor uncertainty in rejecting ballots as being illegal, because of what is shown by them upon inspection. We think the effect of section 157 of the code of 1880 is to condemn as illegal, and not be received or counted, every ballot which has on its back or face any device or mark other than names of persons by which one ballot may be distinguished from another.

"This statute does not condemn devices or marks on the outside of a ballot merely, but clearly embraces the face of the ballot as well. That is apparent from the exception contained in it, and a device or mark on the face of the ballot is as much within what we suppose to have been the object of this provision as one on the outside or back of it. It is apparent from the provision that its object is not only to preserve secrecy as to what ballot an elector casts, which is the leading idea of statutes in some other States, which prohibit any device or mark on a ballot folded which betrays the secret of the voter; its object is to secure absolute uniformity as to the appearance of ballots, in order that intelligence may guide the electors in their selection, and not a mere device or mark by which ignorance may be captivated. The legislature was trying to prevent multitudes from 'being voted,' and being guided by a mere device or mark by which they should distinguish the ballots they were to use in the process without a knowledge of the names of persons for whom their ballots were being cast. Elections are a contrivance of government which prescribes who are electors and how they may express their will, and it is a legitimate exercise of power to prescribe the description of ballots which shall be used. Section 157 of the code of 1880 does this, and requires all ballots to be written or printed with black ink, with a minimum space between names, on plain white news printing paper of a certain width, and without any device or mark by which one ticket may be known or distinguished from another, &c.; and it declares that a ticket different from that prescribed shall not be received or counted. Considerations of policy dictated the description of ballots prescribed, and it was deemed of such importance to secure an observance of the requirement that it is declared that ballots not conforming to the description prescribed shall not be received or counted.

"It would have been competent to impose a penalty on the circulation or use of such ballots, but the means by which their use is sought to be prevented is the rejection of the ballot when offered or from the count. It is not penal for an elector to use a ballot differing from the legal pattern, but it shall not be counted, and thus he fails to express his will through such an instrumentality. If the device or mark is external, and observed by the inspectors, they should not receive the ballot. If it is received, and on being opened is discovered to be of the kind condemned as illegal, it is not to be counted; but if the inspectors count such ballots in disregard of law and their duty the commissioners of election, assembled at the court-house, with time and opportunity afforded to scrutinize and correct, as far as may be done by the data furnished by the face of the returns, without a resort to evidence aliunde, should reject, as the inspectors should have done, ballots which the law says shall not be counted. The only safe guide as to what ballots are illegal because of devices or marks is the statute. It excludes any mark or device by which one ticket may be known or distinguished from another. A distinction between ballots by means of devices or marks instead of by means of the names on them is what the statute aims to prevent, and we are not at liberty to confine the broad language of the statute to any particular description of devices or marks, for ingenuity would evade any such limit. The law should be enforced as written.

"There is no room for distinction between what is directory and what is mandatory, what is essential and what is not. The requirement that ballots shall be written or printed with black ink, with a space not less than one-fifth of an inch between names, seems to have been designed to guard against confusion and mistake as to names of the persons voted for for the different offices, while the requirement of plain white news printing paper of a designated width within narrow limits, and the exclusion of any device or mark by which one ticket may be known or distinguished from another, must have been intended to secure uniformity in the appearance of ballots, so that ignorance and blind party devotion might not be led to the adoption of ballots by the guidance of some mark and devices, as to which they were instructed by their leaders, and which, instead of intelligent comprehension of whom or what they are casting their ballots for, should determine their selection of ballots to be cast. It was well known that ballots are prepared beforehand under the direction of political managers, and are distributed for use among electors; and it was further known that captivating marks and devices on ballots, appealing to ignorance and blind party zeal, were a favorite resort as an electioneering device deemed legitimate and freely practiced with much effect; and the purpose of section 157 was to stop this pernicious practice, and to make the prohibition effective by prohibiting any mark or device by which one ticket can be distinguished from another, and by rejecting any ballot in violation of its requirements. It was assumed that ballots would still be prepared beforehand by party managers or persons interested in having them legal, and that, as all would be alike, the advantage to one party over another should not consist in tickets, but that ballots must be selected not by devices and marks, but because of the names to be voted for.

"We do not think that the commissioners of election can be required to meet and recanvass the returns of the election. Having made their canvass and declared the result, and transmitted a statement of it to the secretary of state, their connection with the returns ended. Any error committed by them is not to be corrected by requiring them to reassemble and correct it. The legality of their action may be the subject of judicial investigation in case a in which provision is made for contesting the election by an appeal to the courts of the State, but only in those cases.

"The House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States is the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members, and the courts of the State have nothing to do with this matter.

"This case might properly have been disposed of without considering any of the questions made by the record except that last mentioned, but the attorney-general informed us from the bar that doubts exist as to the proper interpretation of the election law of 1880, and that criminal prosecutions have been instituted against the commissioners of elections of some of the counties for supposed violations of the law in reference to their duties, and we have complied with his request in declaring our view of the several questions presented by the record.

"Judgment affirmed. To be reported.

"Chalmers, C. J., took no part in the decision of this case.

"I. D. Oglesby, district attorney, vs. J. J. Sigman et al.

"I concur entirely in the opinion of the court, as drawn up by Judge Campbell. The duty to examine and reject illegal ballots rests on every officer or court required or authorized by law to count them. The statute prohibits the use of any mark or device on a ballot by which one 'ticket may be known or distinguished from another.' That the mark or device adopted is a mere printer's mark, commonly used for ornamentation, makes no difference. The statute prohibits any distinguishing mark whatever, and no court has a right to do away with the effect of the statute by holding that marks which are mere printer's ornaments may be used. It is wholly unimportant whether the marking on the ticket was the result of ignorance or a design to evade the statute. The inspectors and commissioners have no power to inquire into motives; nor has the statute made motives important. It condemns as illegal every ballot or ticket which is so marked 'that it may be known or distinguished from another.' The ticket used in this case and made an exhibit to the petition is thus marked, and should have been rejected. We have nothing to do with the policy or impolicy of the statute. The language is plain and does not admit of construction; and it is the duty of the courts and other officers to obey and enforce it in the sense the words clearly indicate.

"GEO3GE."

We have set out the decision of the Supreme Court in full, and before discussing it we might as well say here that so far as the views of the minority or the decisions of the Committee on Elections in former Congresses on this point is concerned (which have been referred to by the contestee) we fully concur in the views there expressed and adhere to them, with the exception of that part of the report in Yeates vs. Martin, in the Forty-sixth Congress, referring to marked ballots. We dissent from the view expressed by the majority of the committee in that case, as did also the minority of the Committee on Elections at the time it was rendered.

It is seriously contended by the contestee that the decision of the supreme court of Mississippi construing the sections of the election laws of that State ought to be followed by Congress, and that it is against the settled doctrine of both Congress and the Federal judiciary to disregard the decisions of State tribunals in construing their own local laws. This is too broadly asserted, and cannot be maintained. It is true that where a decision or a line of decisions has been made by the judiciary of the States, and those decisions have become a "rule of property," the Federal judiciary will follow them. Not to do so would continually place titles to property in jeopardy and disturb all business transactions. The rule as to all other questions is well stated in Township of Pine Grove vs. Talcott, (19 Wall., 666-'67,) as follows:

"It is insisted that the invalidity of the statute has been determined by two judgments of the supreme court of Michigan, and that we are bound to follow these adjudications. With all respect for the eminent tribunal by which the judgments were pronounced, we must be permitted to say that they are not satisfactory to our minds. * * * The question before us belongs to the domain of general jurisprudence. In this class of cases this court is not bound by the judgment of the courts of States where the cases arise; it must hear and determine for itself."

There is still another reason why Congress should not be bound by the decisions of State tribunals with regard to election laws unless such decisions are founded upon sound principles, and comport with reason and justice, which does not apply to the Federal judiciary, and it is this: every State election law is by the Constitution made a Federal law where Congress has failed to enact laws on that subject, and is adopted by Congress for the purpose of the election of its own members. To say that Congress shall be absolutely bound by State adjudications on the subject of the election of its own members is subversive of the constitutional provision that each House shall be the judge of the elections, qualifications, and returns of its own members, and is likewise inimical to the soundest principles of national unity. We cannot safely say that it is simply the duty of this House to register the decrees of State officials relative to the election of its own members.

The foundation of this contention is that if the Congress of the United States fails to enact election laws and makes use of State laws for its purposes, it adopts not only the laws thus enacted, but the judicial construction of them by the State courts as well.

We do not agree that this is the rule except as it may apply to a "positive statute of the State and the construction thereof, adopted by the local tribunals, and to rights and titles to things having a permanent locality, such as the rights and titles to real estate and other matters immovable and intra-territorial in their nature and character." (Swift vs. Tyson, 16 Peters, 1-18.) As to matters not local in their nature, the Supreme Court of the United States has uniformly held that the decisions of the State courts were not binding upon it.

Election laws are or may become vital to the existence and stability of the House of Representatives, and to hold it must shut itself up in the narrow limits of investigating solely the question as to whether an election has been conducted according to the State laws as interpreted by its own judiciary would be to yield at least a part of that prerogative conferred by the Constitution exclusively on the House itself.

It may be stated generally that the House of Representatives will, as a general rule, follow the interpretation given to a State law regulating a Congressional election by the supreme court of a State, where decisions have been continued and uniform in such a way and for such time as to become the fixed and settled law of a State. The processes of determining the election and all questions relating to the honesty and bona fides of ascertaining who received the highest number of legal votes must of necessity forever reside exclusively in the House.

Where decisions have been made for a sufficient length of time by State tribunals construing election laws so that it may be presumed that the people of the State knew what such interpretations were would furnish another good reason why Congress should adopt them in Congressional election cases. But this reason would be of little weight when the election had been held in good faith before such judicial construction had been made, and where there was a conflict of opinion respecting the true interpretation of a statute for the first time on trial.

There is still another cogent reason why this House may, and perhaps should, disregard the decisions of State courts, when such decisions are made in cases where there is confessedly no jurisdiction in the court to pass upon the question which it assumes to pass upon, or where the court assumes to pass upon questions not properly involved in the case before it.

We cannot express in better language the effect which obiter dictum in judicial opinions should have on future decisions than that employed by Mr. Justice Curtis in Carroll vs. Carroll, 16 Howard, 279-287. After considering the maxim at common law of stare decisis, the learned judge proceeds to discuss the thirty-fourth section of the judiciary act in connection with the maxim, and then says:

"And, therefore, this court and other courts organized under the common law, has never felt itself bound by any part of an opinion in any case which was not needful to the ascertainment of the right or title in question between the parties."

Citing some cases, he continues:

"And Mr. Chief-Justice Marshall said, 'It is a maxim not to be disregarded that general expressions in every opinion are to be taken in connection with the case in which those expressions are used.' If they go beyond the case they may be respected, but ought not to control the judgment in a subsequent suit when the very point is presented. The reason of this maxim is obvious. The question actually before the court is investigated with care and considered in its full extent; other principles which may serve to illustrate it are considered in their relations to the case decided, but their possible bearing on all other cases is seldom completely investigated. The cases of Ex parte Christy, 3 How., 292, and Jenness et al. vs. Peck, 7 How., 612, are an illustration of the rule that any opinion given here or elsewhere cannot be relied on as binding authority unless the case called for its expression. Its weight of reason must depend on what it contains."

There is abundance of authority running through all the reports of the judicial opinions of the various States, and also through the reports of the Supreme Court opinions of the United States, that they will not be bound by the obiter of their own decisions, much less that of other courts. And where there is a conflict in the decisions of a State supreme court, other State courts and the Supreme Court of the United States will adopt not the later, but that line of decisions which best speaks the reason and common sense of the proposition elucidated, except in those cases purely local, as pointed out in Swift vs. Tyson, supra.

Another suggestion in argument needs greater amplification than we can give it now, which is: that by adopting the machinery of the States to carry on Congressional elections this House stands in the nature of an appellate court to interpret these election laws so far as they relate to Congressional elections; that it ought not in this view to be bound by the decisions of the State courts at all, unless the reasons given by them are convincing to the judicial mind of the House while acting in the capacity of a court.

It need, however, hardly be added that a line of carefully considered cases in the States, in which courts have undoubted jurisdiction, so far as they would apply in principle, would go a long way toward settling a disputed point of construction in any State election law. In fact it may be said that it would probably be the duty of Congress to follow the settled doctrine thus established.

It now becomes necessary to review the opinion of the supreme court of Mississippi in Oglesby vs. Sigiman. As will be seen by an examination of the case, it was a mandamus proceeding, under a section of the Mississippi Code, to compel the commissioners of election in Tunica County to reassemble and recount the votes cast in that county on the 2d day of November, 1880, for member of Congress in the sixth Congressional district of Mississippi. The allegations, substantially, are that the election commissioners counted 566 ballots for the contestant in this case, Mr. Lynch, which had upon them marks and devices, and which were illegal under the provisions of section 137, 138, 139, and 140 of the Mississippi Code, and ought to have been rejected, instead of being counted as they were. A fac-simile of the ballots challenged is set out on the record, and on the ticket is found certain printers' dashes, which are similar to those challenged in the pending contest, and which are the distinguishing marks complained of. The Oglesby-Sigiman case "was submitted by counsel without brief or oral argument," as we are informed by the contestee's brief. The judge who delivered the principal opinion in this case closes the opinion of the court with this remark:

"The House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States is the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members, and the courts of the State have nothing to do with this matter.

"This case might properly have been disposed of without considering any of the questions made by the record except that last mentioned, but the attorney-general informed us from the bar that doubts exist as to the proper interpretation of the election law of 1880, and that criminal prosecutions have been instituted against the commissioners of election of some of the counties for supposed violations of the law in reference to their duties, and we have complied with his request in declaring our view of the several questions presented by the record."

The point, as remarked by the judge, on which the case might have been disposed of, was as to whether the official life of the election commissioners was functus officio, and they were therefore incapable of being brought together to perform official duties; which, being determined in the affirmative, the court had nothing to do but to dismiss the petition, as it did when it refused to entertain a petition on behalf of Mr. Lynch, made on the 9th day of December, 1880, to prevent the governor of the State from issuing to the contestee a certificate of election as member of Congress from the sixth Congressional district of Mississippi, on the ground that it had no jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action.

Had the Mississippi supreme court stopped here, the question of how far the decision of State courts in construing their own election laws ought to bind this House would be free from embarassment; but the court, after remarking upon its want of jurisdiction on the first two points, stated in the beginning of its opinion, and having disposed of the third on the ground that the official duties of the election officers were at an end and that they could not be reassembled, proceeded to construe the law relative to distinguishing marks, and decide what were such by the terms of the Mississippi Code so far as it could do so, the same being confessedly not before it.

It is sufficient to say that if the argument sustaining the conclusions reached by the Mississippi court met our views of the true construction of the law, a further analysis of the opinion would be unnecessary; but, as we cannot agree with the argument or the conclusion of the court, it becomes necessary to give some of the reasons why we do not concur and why we do not feel bound by it.

First. The court declared in terms it had no jurisdiction of the subject-matter embraced in the first and second grounds stated in the opinion. The third ground does not involve a construction of the law, and of course cannot be considered in determining the question raised in the pending contest.

It is with great hesitation and reluctance that we feel compelled to disagree with the eminent gentleman who concurred in the opinion, and we do so in no spirit of unjust criticism, for we would much prefer to follow rather than dissent from it. Had the opinion been rendered before the election of 1880, or become one of settled law of Mississippi, we do not say but that it would have had such weight with us that, though we might disagree with it in logic, we might feel compelled to follow it. We think that the decision is against the current of authority and contrary to the well-settled doctrine heretofore discussed; that it can be regarded as obiter dictum merely, and as the opinion of eminent gentlemen learned in the law, but not as a judicial construction of the code. It may happen, should the supreme court of Mississippi adhere in the future to the reasons advanced in this case, in cases where it has jurisdiction, that this House will adopt them; but until the happening of this event we cannot say that the reasons given in the Oglesby-Sigiman case are controlling.

The general doctrine in construing election statutes is that they are to be construed liberally as to the elector and strictly as to the officers who have duties to perform under them. A statute directing certain things to be done by election officers ought to be followed by them with a high degree of strictness, but duties to be performed by the electors, as declared by statute, are directions merely, which, if not observed, it is true, may in some instances defeat his ballot; but when there is an honest intention to obey the law, and the voter is not put in fault by any laches or negligence which he, by the use of reasonable diligence, might or could avoid, or where there is no palpable intention of violating the law apparent, in order to maintain the inestimable right of voting, courts have generally adopted the most liberal construction.

In an almost unbroken line of precedents, from the foundation of the Government, in all the States this rule has been declared. (McCrary on Elections, section 403; Kirk vs. Rhoades, 46 California, 398; Prince vs. Skillen, 71 Maine, 493; People vs. Kilduff, 15 Illinois, 492; Millholland vs. Bryant, 39 Indiana, 653; The State, ex rel., vs. Adams, 65 Indiana, 393; Pradut vs. Ramsey, (5 Morris,) 47 Mississippi, 24, and many other cases not necessary to cite.)

In the present case we find, as a matter of fact, that there was no intentional violation of the law, and we further find, as a matter of fact, that every precaution was taken which a reasonably prudent man would be likely to take under similar circumstances; that the contestant in person applied to those whom he might reasonably believe to be well versed in the art of printing, and, with the law in their hands, discussed the question of distinguishing marks, and was assured that tickets would be prepared and printed strictly within the letter of the statute. After the tickets were printed the contestant was assured that they were lawful, and might be relied upon as not being obnoxious to the law. It does not appear that the printers' dashes which appear on the ticket were observed by the contestant or his friends, at least until the morning of the election, after they were all distributed, and it was too late to furnish other tickets; and when the dashes were discovered it was stoutly contended that they were not distinguishing marks within the meaning of the law. It also appears that there was no intention on the part of any one, either those connected with the printing of them, or those for whose use they were designed, to print the dashes in the tickets for the purpose of distinguishing them from any other ballots of any other party.

It is also proved that tickets precisely similar to those that are questioned in this contest, in so far as the printers' dashes are concerned, were printed and furnished to the opposing party in at least one of the counties in the sixth Congressional district of Mississippi, and were unquestionably voted without a suspicion that they were obnoxious to the law. To further illustrate the entire good faith with which these tickets were printed and used, and how they would be regarded by practical printers, the testimony of Charles Winkley, one of contestee's witnesses, becomes very important; it is as follows:

"Cross-interrogatory 2. Are you a practical printer, and have you critically examined the 'marks,' so called, on the tickets of Lynch, rejected from Warren County? If so, were not these only the usual printers' dashes to be found generally in newspaper articles and upon tickets generally?

"Answer. I am a practical printer; I have not critically examined the tickets, but the dashes used are such as any printer of taste would either put in or leave out, according as he wanted to lengthen or shorten the ticket to suit the paper, or otherwise.

"Cross-interrogatory 3. If you were called upon generally to print tickets, without any special instructions, is it likely that you would have printed the tickets similar to those complained of and rejected from Warren County?

"Answer. I might or might not, just as it might have seemed to strike me at the time.

"And further deponeth saith not." (Rec., p. 261.)

It further appears that printers' dashes, such as were used on the tickets in this case, are universally known among printers as punctuation marks; in fact, most of the characters which appear upon these tickets are set down in Webster's Unabridged Dictionary under the head "marks of punctuation." It is known to the most casual reader of print that printers' dashes frequently occur in books, newspapers, and publications of all kinds, and to the common understanding to argue that they are of themselves "marks or devices" would not meet approval.

We have already found that they were not used or placed upon the tickets for the purpose of distinguishing them from any other ballots, nor as a device for that purpose, and not being of themselves devices we cannot say that they are inimical to the statute. It is true that printers' dashes may be intended and used as a mark or device, and so may different kinds of type, or punctuation marks of different kinds. Arrangement of names and heading of tickets may also be made "marks and devices," and it seems to us that the reasonable interpretation of the law would be, first, in the use of these appliances, which are ordinarily used in printing, were they so arranged as that they become "marks and devices?" and were they so used and arranged for that purpose? and, secondly, was the unusual manner of their being used such as might or ought to put a reasonably prudent man on his guard?

This view of the law would be the extreme limit to which we think we would be justified in going under well established principles of construction in like cases. No case has been called to our notice which goes this far.

What we have here remarked does not, of course, apply to the marks or devices ordinarily used on tickets, such as spread-eagles, portraits, and the like; those would be considered "marks and devices" of themselves, and not necessary in the ordinary mechanical art of printing. The use of the latter would be considered a violation of the statute in any aspect of the case, while the use of the former seems to us, in any view of the law, ought to be restricted to an intentional or manifest misuse.

The evident object and intention of prohibitory legislation against "marks and devices" is to secure the freedom and purity of elections, to preserve the secrecy of the ballot and place the voter beyond the reach of improper restraint or influence in casting his ballot, and we cannot better express ourselves upon this subject than by quoting the supreme court of California in Kirk vs. Rhoades, supra, which is as follows:

"The object of these provisions is to secure the freedom and purity of elections, and to place the elector above and beyond the reach of improper influences or restraint in casting his ballot. When all the ballots cast are similar in appearance, and without any distinguishing mark or characteristic, the most dependent elector in the county may vote with perfect freedom, as his employer or other person upon whom he is dependent has no means of ascertaining for whom he voted.

"It will be observed that there are two classes of things required by section 1191. Over one class the elector can have no control; over the other he has perfect control.

"For instance, whether the paper on which his ballot was printed was furnished by the secretary of state or not, or upon paper in every respect precisely like such paper, or whether it is four inches in width and twelve inches in length, or falls short of this measurement by an eighth, or a sixth, or a fourth of an inch, or whether it is printed in long primer capitals or not, or whether it is single or doubled leaded; these are matters over which the great majority of electors have no control, and about some of which they are entirely ignorant. The ballots are always furnished on the day of election by committees appointed for the purpose by the respective political parties, or by independent candidates or their friends. The elector in but few instances ever sees these tickets until he approaches the polls to cast his ballot, and it would be absurd in the extreme to require him to have a rule by which he could measure and ascertain whether his ticket exceeded or fell short of twelve inches in length by a sixth of an inch, or only by an eighth of an inch, or whether the color of his ticket was of the exact shade of the paper furnished by the secretary of state.

"Again, not one elector in five hundred knows the difference between long primer capitals or any other capitals, or whether his ticket is single or double-leaded. It is impossible that he should know or be able to determine these facts. This very case presents a striking instance of the absurdity of requiring the elector to judge of these facts."

The respondent, Rhoades, by his counsel, objected to counting 22 ballots for Kirk upon the grounds that they were not printed in long primer capitals and that the lines were double-leaded.

Such was this case. Section 1208 expressly required a ballot found in the box not conforming to the requirements of section 1191 to be rejected. This section did not, as the Mississippi law does, omit to state that this rejection should be of the prohibited ballots when and after found in the box, and yet the court held expressly that as to all matters regarding character of the type, the paper, the width and length of ticket, they were matters that ordinarily were not under the control of the voter, and that the statute should be held directory as to such matters, and that the claim of respondent that the 22 votes for Kirk should be rejected on account of not being printed in long primer capitals and that the lines were double-leaded was by the court overruled. In the conclusion of its opinion the court said:

"To defeat the will of the people in any election it would only be necessary to furnish the electors, or a portion of them, with tickets in which the printed lines were one forty-fourth part of an inch further apart than required by the code—a difference which cannot be detected except by an expert. There are, however, other requirements of the code within the power of the elector to control, and these, if willfully disregarded, should cause his ballot to be rejected. He can see, for instance, that his ballot is free from every mark, character, device, or thing that would enable any one to distinguish it by the back, and if in willful disregard of law he places a name, number, or other mark on it he cannot complain if his ballot is rejected and he loses his vote."

The above language quoted from this case is the language of the court below. The supreme court, after quoting this language in the opinion, closes its opinion in these words:

"We agree with the county judge in his conclusion that the twenty-two ballots spoken of were properly counted for Kirk, and that the motion to strike them from the count was properly denied. Judgment affirmed."

We do not feel called upon to give our reasons why we dissent from much that is said in the opinion in the Mississippi case. It may not be out of place to remark that some of the reasons on which the opinion is based appear to be directly opposed to the current of authority upon which like legislation is maintained. It is remarked that "its object is to secure absolute uniformity as to the appearance of ballots in order that intelligence may guide the voter in his selection, and not a mere device or mark by which ignorance may be captivated."

Our understanding has been that these laws were designed to protect the weak and ignorant against undue restraint by the strong and powerful, to make the ballot secret and free, and place the dependent on the same plane as the most favored; and that laws of this character ought not to be so construed as to become a snare to the very persons for whose protection they were designed. The learned and powerful need no such protection. The laws are designed for the protection of the weak and unlearned. It seems to us that the construction given to this law inevitably establishes a basis of intelligence—of being able to read, at least, for if you strip all ballots of every punctuation mark, and all dissimilarity in print, and make them of the same paper, of the same size, and similarly spaced, the man who is unable to read will be entirely at the mercy of his more favored neighbor, and thus you will defeat the very thing which the law was intended to prevent.

It is urged that the construction given to this law defeats one of the provisions of the constitution of Mississippi, which extends the right of suffrage to all without reference to illiteracy. This point not having been referred to by the court in Mississippi, we infer that it escaped their attention, and we do not care to go into the question. It is quite evident to us that these laws must pass under judicial notice frequently in the future, and we are quite content not to anticipate the results which may be hereafter reached.

We have examined the question of "printers' dashes," in the first instance, because if we arrived at the same conclusion respecting their illegality as the contestee did it was manifest to us from the beginning that we would not have to go farther, as this would control the case. Having arrived at a conclusion adverse to contestee it becomes material to next examine exceptions filed by him to certain of the testimony printed in the record. His exceptions are as follows:

"John R. Lynch, contestant, vs. James R. Chalmers, contestee.

"The contestee comes in proper person and excepts to so much of Exhibit D filed as additional testimony in this case, and appearing from page 225 to page 243, inclusive, of the record:

"1. Because there is no such officer as chief supervisor of elections for either the northern or southern district of Mississippi known to the laws of the United States and authorized to make such reports.

"2. Because there is no law authorizing the supervisors of elections to make any reports of the election in any district outside of a city of 20,000 inhabitants.

"3. Because these pretended reports are not signed by both of the pretended supervisors at each precinct.

"4. Because there is no evidence that the parties signing these reports as supervisors were, in fact, appointed United States supervisors of elections.

"5. Because there is no evidence that the parties whose names appear to be signed to said reports actually signed the same.

"6. Because the pretended reports were not presented as an exhibit to contestant's deposition when taken, and were gathered up by contestant and filed here long after the time for taking testimony in this case.

"7. Because the pretended certificate of Orlando Davis appears on its face to have been signed September 13, 1881, long after the time for taking testimony in this case.

"8. Because said papers appear on their face to be filed with the Clerk of the House of Representatives only on the 21st of December, 1881, long after the time for taking testimony in this case, and do not appear to have been transmitted by any authorized officer of law.

"JAS. R. CHALMERS, Contestee."

Before passing upon the question we call attention to the sections of the Revised Statutes bearing on the question of supervisors' returns. Sections 2011 and 2012 authorize the judge of the circuit court, on the application in writing of ten good citizens, to appoint in each election precinct, at which a Representative in Congress is to be voted for, two citizens of different political parties as supervisors of elections. Section 2025 requires the circuit court to designate a circuit court commissioner to act as chief supervisor for the district. Section 2017 specifies the duties to be performed by them, among which is, to personally scrutinize the manner in which the voting is done, and in which the poll-books, tally, or check-books are kept. Section 2018 requires that to the end that each candidate for Representative in Congress shall obtain the benefit of every vote cast for him, the supervisors shall scrutinize personally the count, and canvass each ballot, and make and forward to the chief supervisor (section 2025) certificates and returns of all such ballots as such officer may require.

Section 2026 requires the chief supervisor to "receive, preserve, and file all oaths of office of supervisors of election, and of all special deputy marshals, appointed under the provisions of this title, and of all certificates, returns, reports and records of every kind and nature contemplated or made requisite by the provisions hereof, save where otherwise herein specially directed."

The contestant contends that these sections apply to country supervisors as well as to supervisors appointed in cities of 20,000 or more inhabitants; while the contestee claims that section 2011 is made up partly of the acts of 1871 and 1872; that sections 2012 to 2027, inclusive, are taken from the act of 1871, and have no reference to supervisors appointed in counties or parishes on the petition of ten citizens, and that 2029 is also taken from acts of 1872. Reference is made by the contestee to the Congressional Globe, page 4455, second session Forty-second Congress, to the debate had when this provision was pending in the House.

It is needless to enter into an extended history of this legislation. The disputed question between parties is this: the contestant claims that the statute requires the supervisors of elections in country precincts to make and keep an official record of the result of the votes polled, of the manner of conducting the election, the truth or fairness of the canvass and its conduct, and the honesty of the count, if the chief supervisor shall so direct, and return the same to the chief supervisor, who shall keep and preserve them, and in accordance with law file a certified copy with the Clerk of the House of Representatives; that these returns, or duly certified copies of them, are competent evidence in contested-election cases. We copy the following strong statement made by contestant's counsel in support of this contention:

"That where the law, either statutory or other, makes a document a public record or file, and requires it to be preserved as such, and puts the custody thereof in the hands of an officer there, as a matter of common law, and without statutes authorizing the custodian to certify to copies of such record, the common law will admit the copy certified by the custodian as evidence of what is provable in any case by the original, is a matter of elementary law. The opposing brief seems to controvert this, as, for example, at the bottom of page 29, where it cites section 104 of McCrary's Election Laws. That citation wholly fails to meet or negative the last preceding proposition. That section 104 is a statement simply to this effect:

"'That statute-certifying officers can only make their certificates evidence of the facts which the statute requires them to certify; and when they undertake to go beyond this and certify other facts they are unofficial and no more evidence than the statement of an unofficial person.'"

We admit there is much force in this argument. But the conclusions we have reached do not make it necessary for us to decide this question, and we do not. We present the following analysis of the various precincts upon the view that it is unnecessary to look to the supervisors' reports for any purpose:

ADAMS COUNTY.

The returns from Dead Man's Bend precinct were rejected by the commissioners of election on the ground that there was no list of voters sent up with the returns by the precinct officers. At page 75 of the record, William J. Henderson, one of the commissioners of election, testifies that the vote of that precinct was: For Lynch, 85; for Chalmers, 15. (See also record, page 88.) We think the vote of this precinct should be counted. It was rejected for unsubstantial reasons; no fraud is charged, and it would, to our mind, be the grossest injustice to deprive the voters of their right to participate in a choice for their Representative on this ground.

Palestine precinct.—As to this precinct, Mr. Lynch proves by William J. Henderson, at record, page 75, of his testimony, that the box was rejected because there were 35 more ballots found therein than there were names on the list of voters kept by the clerks. Mr. Henderson says:

"The Palestine returns were rejected because the box contained 35 more ballots than were accounted for in the list of voters as kept by the clerks. * * * To the best of my recollection, the inspectors sent up their returns, stating that there were in the box 17 votes for Chalmers and 270 votes for Lynch, the latter number including 35 votes which were found to be in excess of the list of voters as kept by the clerks."

Lennox Scott, another witness, who was a United States supervisor, testifies, on record, page 187, that to his own personal knowledge 231 votes were cast at this precinct for Mr. Lynch. An effort was made to explain how the excess of 35 votes appeared. The evidence on this subject is not very satisfactory, but we think, on the whole, that Mr. Lynch should receive 231 votes and Mr. Chalmers 17 from this precinct. (See also record, page 191, testimony of H. C. Bailey.)

BOLIVAR COUNTY.

Under section 138 of the Mississippi code the inspectors of elections are required to send up to the commissioners the whole number of votes cast at the poll, and the commissioners, under section 140 of the code, are required to "transmit to the secretary of state, to be filed in his office, a statement of the whole number of votes given in their county for each candidate."

This duty being enjoined by statute, their certificate is evidence of the fact that the number of votes which they certify were given. That return was put in evidence, from which it appears they returned Lynch 979, Chalmers 301. It further appears by a certificate signed by the commissioners of election that they threw out Australia precinct, containing 30 Democratic votes and 192 Republican votes, because the returns were "not certified to by the inspectors or the clerks."

Bolivar precinct.—It appears from the same certificate that in this precinct they rejected 45 Democratic votes and 311 Republican votes for the same reason. Another informality is noted which is that the "tally-sheets" were kept on four pieces of paper, and that they do not show what offices the persons whose names appear on the tally-sheets were voted for. This can hardly be considered to be a good ground when the ballots were before them, and they could have looked and seen.

Holmes Lake precinct.—As to Holmes Lake precinct, it appears that the ballot-box was never opened and the ballots counted by the inspectors and clerks. The commissioners refused to open and count the votes, and perhaps were not authorized to do so by law. The voters of this precinct are deprived of the right to participate in the choice of their Representative by the conduct of their present officers.

Glencoe precinct was rejected because the vote was not entirely counted on the night after the election, and the returns were signed by only two of the election officers, not a majority. The commissioners certify that these imperfect returns show that 27 Democratic votes and 233 Republican votes were rejected on account of this informality. In right and justice these votes ought to be counted, but we do not do so on the statement made by the commissioners.

WARREN COUNTY.

We correct the returns made in this county as follows: The vote as returned to the secretary of state was: Lynch, 57; Chalmers, 1,014. We add the rejected vote: Lynch, 2,029; Chalmers, 20.

The vote returned by the inspectors to the commissioners of election, and by the commissioners of election to the secretary of state, appears in the subjoined tabulated statement:

Counties.	Inspectors' returns to commissioners.		Commissioners' returns to secretary of state.
	Lynch.	Chalmers.	Lynch.	Chalmers.
Adams	1,214	1,419	898	1,287

Total	3,481	1,048

ISSAQUENA COUNTY.

There are two statements in the record which, taken together, enable us with reasonable certainty to arrive at the vote cast in three of the four rejected precincts of this county. The first is the certificates of election made by the commissioners of election to the secretary of state, and found on page 17 of the record.

Hay's Landing.—They say, with regard to this poll, that they find 75 votes reported by the election officers; on four of the ballots all the names are scratched off, and they reject the poll because there was no separate list of voters kept. At page 89 of the record, Richard Griggs, clerk of the chancery court for Issaquena County, certifies, under the seal of said court, that the paper appearing on that page of the record is a true and correct transcript of the election returns made by the election officers as appears of record in his office, by which it appears Chalmers received 34 votes and Mr. Chalmers 29 votes for member of Congress. The commissioners of election for that county certify to the secretary of state that they rejected this precinct return, and the clerk of the court certifies that that return is on file in his office, a copy of which he gives. The two statements taken together are prima facie evidence of the vote received at that poll. The highest number of votes appearing on the tally-list as certified by the clerk agrees with the number the commissioners say were returned from that poll. The commissioners are authorized by law to certify as a fact the number of votes cast; and the clerk of the court is authorized by law, as the keeper of public records, to give certified transcripts thereof.

For the reasons given in reference to Hay's Landing precinct, we also count Ben Lomond and Duncansby precincts; by reference to which it will be seen that Lynch's vote was 332 and Chalmers's 20 in the former, (record, pages 17 and 90,) and 371 for Lynch, and for Chalmers 45, in the latter.

JEFFERSON COUNTY.

The only precinct in dispute in this county is the Rodney precinct poll, the vote of which is admitted to be 247 for Lynch, and 92 for respondent. This is shown also by the report of the commissioners, at page 19 of the record. Having come to a conclusion adverse to contestee in reference to marked ballots, we count this poll as returned.

WASHINGTON COUNTY.

The evidence in the record, at page 23, shows that the Stoneville precinct was rejected by the commissioners for want of a statement signed by the inspectors of election. Page 206, John Jones testifies that at this poll there were 315 cast for Mr. Lynch and 60 for Mr. Chalmers. He says: "I saw the votes counted, and know that to be the fact and correct." This testimony is uncontradicted, and is sufficient to put the returned member to proof to show why the vote should not be counted. It was the unquestioned duty of the inspectors to make return of this vote as it was cast. The election appears to have been conducted in a quiet and peaceable manner, and no sufficient reason having been given by the commissioners of elections why they did not return the vote, we think it right and fair to count it as the testimony shows it was cast. As to Lake Washington and Refuge precincts, there is no testimony in the record showing what the vote as cast was. If the supervisors' returns are rejected, and the contestee's exceptions sustained, it leaves us without means to ascertain the true vote at these precincts.

COAHOMA COUNTY.

In this county the commissioners in making the certificate to the secretary of state omit to state what the vote was in the rejected precincts. There were elections held in seven precincts in this county, six of which were rejected by the commissioners and one, Friar's Point, was counted. There is in the record, at page 98, a certificate made by R. N. Harris, clerk at the circuit court, giving a transcript of the tally-lists signed by the inspectors of four precincts: Clarksdale, which shows that Lynch received 307 and Chalmers 117 votes; in Sunflower, Lynch received 32 and Chalmers received 77; Dublin, Lynch 70, Chalmers 63; Magnolia, Lynch 109, Chalmers 23. At the Delta precinct the inspectors and clerks did not count the votes, and this box was, therefore, in the same condition as the one at Holmes Lake. The Jonestown precinct is omitted because the clerk fails to certify. The clerk's certificate is probably evidence that these papers are on file in his office, and that they are the returns sent up by the precinct election officers. As to whether they are evidence as to the fact whether so many voters voted for the persons named for the offices named, is submitted to the House.

FRAUDULENT RETURNS.

At Kingston precinct, in Adams County, it is conclusively shown by the testimony of Jerry Taylor, Henry B. Fowles, Abraham Teltus, Smith Kinney, Harry Smith, jr., and William H. Lynch, that the vote as cast was 350 and for Chalmers 59. The vote as returned by the precinct election officers was, Lynch 160, Chalmers 249. It is shown that there was abundant opportunity for tampering with this box at the noon recess, when it was taken to the residence of one Dr. Farrar, and the Republicans were excluded from the presence of the box, and the aperture was not sealed. The Republican inspector who had the key could not have stuffed the ballot-box in its absence. We think under the evidence this vote should be corrected so as to show the true vote as cast, as testified to by these witnesses who are uncontradicted. We therefore add 190 votes to Mr. Lynch's aggregate and deduct that number from Mr. Chalmers.

The corrected vote of the parties will stand thus:

	Lynch.	Chalmers.
Returned vote	5,393	9,172
Add rejected votes:
Warren County	2,029	20
Dead Man's Bend	85	15
Palestine	231	17
Australia	192	30
Bolivar	311	92
Hay's Landing	39	24
Ben Lomond	332	20
Duncansby	371	45
Rodney	247	92
Stoneville	315	60
	9,545	9,540
From which we deduct		190
And add that number to Lynch's vote to correct the returns in Kingston precinct, Adams County	190
Which makes total	9,735	9,350
Majority for Lynch	385

We have not added the vote of the rejected precincts in Coahoma County, as shown by the clerk's certificate, nor have we corrected the vote in Robb's precinct, in Washington County, where it is charged the ballot-box was tampered with, and about which there is a conflict of testimony.

In three precincts in Adams County it is claimed the returns should be thrown out because of mismanagement, misconduct, and abuse of power on the part of the managers in contestee's interests, and peace officers and challengers acting on behalf of and in contestee's interests. And at Washington precinct, in Adams County, they excluded the United States supervisor of elections from the presence of the box from the time of adjournment in the evening to the time of commencing the counting of the vote in the morning. In precincts of Court-House and Jefferson Hotel it is claimed that the Republican voters were prevented from voting by a systematic course of vexatious questions and inexcusable delays, whereby 300 or 400 voters were prevented from voting at all. The evidence on this subject is conflicting, and doubt exists in the minds of the committee whether it is sufficient to exclude these boxes from the count, and we therefore decide to let them stand. As to Washington precinct, it may be gravely questioned whether it ought not go out, but as it can make no difference in the final result, we decide to let it stand.

If the precincts in Coahoma County shall be counted the tabulated statement would be as follows:

	Lynch.	Chalmers.
Returned vote	5,393	9,172
Add rejected votes:
Warren County	2,029	20
Dead Man's Bend	85	15
Palestine	231	17
Australia	192	30
Bolivar	311	92
Hay's Landing	39	24
Ben Lomond	332	10
Duncansby	371	45
Rodney	247	92
Stoneville	315	60
	9,545	9,540
From which we deduct		190
And add that number to Lynch's vote to correct the returns in Kingston precinct, Adams County	190
Which makes total	9,735	9,350
Clarkesdale	307	117
Sunflower	32	77
Dublin	70	63
Magnolia	109	23
Total	10,253	9,630
Majority for Lynch	623

If you add the votes as shown by the supervisors' returns, the following table will exhibit the vote:

	Lynch.	Chalmers.
Returned vote	5,392	9,172
Add rejected votes:
Warren County	2,029	20
Dead Man's Bend	85	51

Total	11,093	10,050
Majority for Lynch	1,043

These tabulated statements are made for the information of the House. The first tabulated statement shows the result which the undersigned members of the committee all concur in, and upon which the report is based.

Your committee therefore recommend the adoption of the following resolutions:

Resolved, That James R. Chalmers was not elected, and is not entitled to his seat in the Forty-seventh Congress from the sixth district of Mississippi.

Resolved, That John R. Lynch was elected, and is entitled to his seat in the Forty-Seventh Congress from the sixth district of Mississippi.

ENROLLED BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS SIGNED.

Mr. PEIRCE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found duly enrolled a bill and joint resolutions of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. No. 1014) for the relief of Joseph L. Stevens;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 161) making an appropriation to enable the Light-House Board to meet the extraordinary expenses consequent upon the flood in the Mississippi River; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 185) granting the use of tents at the soldiers' reunion to be held at Belle Plaine, Iowa, in the month of September or October, 1882.

CONTESTED-ELECTION—LYNCH VS. CHALMERS.

Mr. PETTIBONE. Mr. Speaker, in the case now under consideration John R. Lynch, the contestant, claims the seat now occupied by James R. Chalmers, the contestee, on the ground, stated in the briefest manner possible, and stripped of all legal verbiage, that a clear majority of the legal votes which were cast at the election held on November 2, 1880, in the sixth district of Mississippi, were really and honestly cast for him; but that by fraudulent, corrupt, and lawless manipulation of the election machinery; by the throwing out by the county commissioners of election, unjustly and illegally, of the votes thrown for him at a great number of polls; by the rejection of more than 2,000 votes in one county alone, which were honestly given to him, because of dashes, mere punctuation marks, used by the printers in making up the ballots which were voted in good faith by his supporters, and by other fraudulent devices set out in particular in his notice of contest, a seeming majority was secured by Mr. Chalmers in defiance of justice and public law, in mockery of the hackneyed words "a free ballot and a fair count!"

All this is denied, of course, by the contestee; and in the investigation of the case the first thing to be seen and understood is to ascertain how the actual fact is. Was a majority of the legal vote actually given to Mr. Lynch? If not, there is then a speedy end to the controversy, and by every principle of justice, and square, honest dealing Mr. Chalmers should retain the seat he now occupies. But, on the other hand, if a majority of the legal votes were cast for Mr. Lynch, then he should be awarded the seat, unless, indeed, the case of Mr. Chalmers is so buttressed by positive law that the House of Representatives, though the sole judge, by the express terms of the Constitution, of the "elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members," cannot right the wrong done to the fundamental idea which underlies our American system as, indeed, all republican or democratic politics, that the will of the majority should always prevail.

The "official" returns show the result to be: for J. R. Chalmers, 9,172 votes; and for J. R. Lynch, 5,393 votes, which leaves a majority for Mr. Chalmers of 3,779. It will thus be seen that Mr. Chalmers must retain the seat he now holds, unless Mr. Lynch can show that more than 3,779 votes, honestly cast for him, were improperly rejected. And it is equally manifest that if he can and does, then fraud of the deepest and darkest character can alone account for Mr. Chalmers's great majority as shown on the face of the returns.

The importance of the case; the rights of the parties to the contest; more important still, the rights of a supposed free constituency behind them; and, most important of all, the right of all the people of this Union to know that the elective franchise is not a "mockery and a snare," but that it reflects and ever shall reflect the will of the sovereign people of this nation, all demand in this case a most careful analysis and scrutiny, to the end that the very truth and the very right of this contest shall be seen and known, that equal and exact justice shall be done.

NOW WARREN COUNTY.

In the county of Warren it is charged and admitted that 2,029 votes cast for Mr. Lynch, and 20 votes cast for Mr. Chalmers, were rejected by the county commissioners, to whom the inspectors who held the election in the various precincts of that county (and who had passed on them as valid) had made their certified returns. They were thrown out by the county commissioners on the ground that the ballots cast for Mr. Lynch, a fac simile of which is seen on page 48 of the record, were in violation of section 137 of the code of Mississippi, which declares that—

> The ballots shall be without any mark or device by which one ticket may be known or distinguished from another, excepting the words at the head of the ticket.

It is also charged, and admitted, that in the Rodney precinct of Jefferson County 247 votes were cast for Mr. Lynch and 95 votes for Mr. Chalmers, a clear majority for Mr. Lynch of 152 votes, and that the ballot-box and its contents, after the close of the election, were seized and destroyed. Who did this high-handed outrage the record does not show. It is sufficient to say that no one has yet even hinted that it was done for the benefit of Mr. Lynch. It is also charged and admitted that the votes cast for Mr. Lynch at Rodney were of the same character as those thrown out in the county of Warren. The aggregate vote thus lost to Mr. Lynch over that in the same way lost to Mr. Chalmers in Warren County and in Rodney precinct of Jefferson County is 2,161. Subtract this number, as I do for the present, from Mr. Chalmers's certified majority of 3,779, and it would cut down his majority to 1,618 votes.

ISSAQUENA COUNTY.

In the county of Issaquena contestant charges that the commissioners of the county "threw out, and rejected, and refused to make any return of 785 legal votes for him which had been duly polled by the voters, and duly received, counted, and returned by the inspectors who held the election." Respondent denies—what? That the commissioners "threw out and rejected 785 votes which had been duly revised, (a new word,) counted, and returned by the inspectors of election." Yet he admits that four boxes of the county—to wit, Skipworth, Ben Lomond, Ingomar, and Hay's Landing—were not counted by the commissioners "because the inspectors of election did not make out and return any certified statement of the election as required by law."

Now, when we turn to the record, on page 17 we find that the commissioners state they rejected these polls because they "did not find any separate lists of the names of the voters in the box, as required by section 139 of the Revised Code of the State of Mississippi." That section provides that—

> The statement of the result of the election at each precinct shall be certified and signed by the inspectors and the clerks, and the poll-book, tally-list, list of voters, ballot-boxes, and ballots shall all be delivered to the commissioners of election.

And on page 89 and following of the record is found a copy of the certificates of the inspectors of these four precincts, with a copy of the tally-sheet of each, which show that 785 votes were cast for Mr. Lynch and 115 for Mr. Chalmers, which were not counted because the lists of the voters' names were not sent up with the poll-books, tally-lists, ballot-boxes, and ballots.

Thus it will be seen by the record, and not denied by anybody, that in Issaquena County Mr. Lynch was deprived of 785 votes, and deducting the 115 votes cast for Mr. Chalmers (which had to be rejected in order to reject Mr. Lynch's still larger vote) Mr. Lynch suffers a net loss of 670 in that county—legal, properly cast, properly counted, as the very ballots in the ballot-boxes before these Democratic county commissioners showed, but rejected by them because the Democratic inspectors failed to send up by accident, or by design, a list of the voters' names, as the statute directed them to do.

And Mr. Chalmers demands in this case that Mr. Lynch shall suffer for the mistakes (?) or willful frauds of his, Mr. Chalmers's friends. And this in a matter where the statute is clearly directory merely, and not mandatory.

ADAMS COUNTY.

Passing now to the county of Adams, it appears from the record that in this county the poll for the precinct of Dead Man's Bend was thrown out by the county commissioners. The reason given is, as sworn to by W. N. Whitehurst, a Democratic county commissioner, (record, page 66,) as follows:

> The only reason I recollect for rejecting the Dead Man's Bend precinct was because no list of voters was sent up.

In this he is corroborated by Thomas R. Quateman, another Democratic county commissioner, who swears, (record, page 69:)

> The Dead Man's Bend precinct box was rejected because of informality; the inspectors did not comply with the law and furnished no list of the voters.

William J. Henderson, the Republican commissioner, swears to the same fact and shows, as do the two United States supervisors, one a Democrat and the other a Republican, that the vote at Dead Man's Bend actually cast, received, and counted by the officers who held the election was 85 votes for Lynch and 15 for Chalmers. This gave a clear majority of 70 votes to Mr. Lynch.

In like manner the vote of Palestine precinct was thrown out because 35 more votes or ballots were in the box than the number of names on the "list" of voters signed by the clerk. Here the list was sent up, but the tally-sheet showed 39 votes in excess over the list of voters. It showed that 270 votes were given to Lynch and 17 to Chalmers. (Record, page 87.)

Lenox Scott, the United States supervisor, who was present, swears that 231 votes were cast for Lynch. Lynch's supporters voted open tickets. He saw that many openly voted! (Record, 189.) He also swears that 17 votes were cast for Mr. Chalmers.

Now, it was to the interest of Mr. Chalmers that the entire vote should be thrown out. He would lose 17 votes, but his adversary would lose 231 votes. Any scheme to throw out the entire vote was greatly to his advantage, just as the throwing out of 2,029 votes in Warren County to only 20 of his votes was to his advantage. And the Palestine poll was thrown out! A fraud was perpetrated. Mr. Chalmers's friends had the election machinery in their own hands. These are the simple, undeniable facts. Who perpetrated the fraud in this instance by placing 35 fraudulent votes in the box the record does not absolutely disclose. But it must satisfy any mind that it worked to the advantage of Mr. Chalmers, and the testimony is clear, with nothing contradicting it, that Mr. Chalmers got 17 votes at the Palestine poll, while Mr. Lynch got at least 231 votes—a clear majority of 214 votes, which added to the 70 majority at Dead Man's Bend makes a clear majority, thrown out by the commissioners on technical grounds, of 284 votes in Adams County over those thrown out which were cast for Mr. Chalmers.

BOLIVAR COUNTY.

In Bolivar County the commissioners rejected and threw out the vote of Australia, Glencoe, and Bolivar precincts. They gave the reason as follows:

Australia, 30 Democratic and 192 Republican votes, because the returns were not certified to by the inspectors or the clerks.

Bolivar precinct, 45 Democratic and 311 Republican votes, because there was no certified returns from the inspectors and clerks.

We have rejected the Glencoe precinct vote, 27 Democratic, 233 Republican votes, because the vote was counted out in part by all the inspectors and clerks, and then discontinued until next day, when the count was finished by one inspector and one clerk, and a very imperfect tally-sheet and return sent in by those two not certified to.—Record, page 15.

Thus it will be seen that 102 Democratic votes and 786 Republican votes were thrown out by the county commissioners; and this is corroborated by the certified statement of O. Davis, chief United States supervisor, on page 26 of the record. He certifies that the supervisors' returns showed that the vote in these precincts were: Australia, 30 votes for Chalmers and 192 for Lynch; Bolivar, no return for Chalmers, 311 for Lynch; Glencoe, 27 votes for Chalmers, 231 for Lynch. This exactly agrees with the statement of the county commissioners, save in Bolivar no return is made of Chalmers's vote, which Mr. Lynch concedes was 45; and in Glencoe the county commissioners certify there were 233 Republican votes, while the supervisor certifies that Lynch, the Republican candidate for Congress, only got 231 of the 233 Republican votes.

There is in both statements clearly "substantial truth with circumstantial variety." It thus clearly appears that by the throwing out of these three precincts in Bolivar County Mr. Lynch lost over the votes for Chalmers thrown out 632 votes. Let it be observed, there is no pretense that these votes were not legally cast by the electors, and legally placed in the box by the inspectors who held the election, and legally and properly sent up to the county commissioners in the ballot-boxes.

In this connection it is wise to see how the action of the county commissioners in rejecting the votes of poll after poll and ballot-box after ballot-box would strike the judicial mind. In the case of the United States vs. The Election Commissioners of Warren County, in the district court of the United States for the southern district of Mississippi, the court charged the jury, among other things, as follows:

The inspectors of election are, so far as these officers are concerned, the sole judges of the qualification of voters and of the votes to be counted.

The commissioners of election for this purpose are ministerial officers, whose duty it is to examine and canvass the returns made to them by the inspectors, and from them to ascertain the whole number of votes cast for each person in the county, with the office voted for.

For the purpose of ascertaining these facts the inspectors are required to send up with the return the ballots, the tally-sheets, and list of voters, to enable the commissioners to correct any mistakes which the inspectors may have made; but the commissioners are not made judges of the votes to be corrected. For any mistakes they may innocently make in the discharge of the ministerial duty imposed upon them they are not responsible; but for a neglect of the performance of the duty so imposed upon them they are responsible.—Record, page 28.

In Biddle and Richard vs. Wing (Cl. and H., 504) the court declared:

Indeed, nothing short of the impossibility of ascertaining for whom the majority of votes were given ought to vacate an election, especially if by such decision the people must, on account of their distant and dispersed situation, necessarily go unrepresented for a long period of time.

And see McCrary on Elections, 230 et seq.

WASHINGTON COUNTY.

Now, passing to Washington County, we find in the record, pages 22 and 23, a tabular vote of said county attested by the county commissioners, by which it appears that against the name of Lake Washington precinct are the words "Rejected from canvass on account of illegal returns;" and against Refuge precinct are the words "Rejected from canvass on account of the returns not being signed by the inspectors of elections." Against Stoneville precinct are the words "Rejected from canvass on account of no statement of election being returned by inspectors of election."

With regard to the reasons given for the rejection of Lake Washington precinct, wherein it appears the commissioners rejected the vote because in their opinion the returns are not legal, though they give no reason for so thinking, but use the general term "not legal," the maxim that "fraud lurks in generalities" seems a most fitting comment.

And in respect to all these three precincts there is no pretense that there was not in each a fair election, that the votes were not honestly cast, fairly and honestly counted, and the poll-books, tally-sheets, ballot-boxes, and the very ballots voted, sent up, as the law required, to the county commissioners. And the question that now and here confronts us is, How did the vote of these precincts stand as between Mr. Lynch and Mr. Chalmers?

On page 239 of the record appears the certified statement of the two United States supervisors, one a Republican, the other a Democrat. Their statement shows that at Lake Washington Mr. Lynch received 112 votes, against 229 votes for Mr. Chalmers. This is corroborated by the certified statement of Mr. J. G. Marshall, the circuit clerk, found on page 97 of the record, who gives the vote as 112 for Lynch and 229 for Chalmers.

In this precinct it appears that Mr. Chalmers loses by the throwing out of the vote 117 votes more than Mr. Lynch. This would seem to break the rule that the rejection of entire ballot-boxes was to the injury of Mr. Lynch, but with this precinct was thrown out the vote in the same county of Refuge and Stoneville precints. As to Refuge precinct, the two United States supervisors, one a Republican and one a Democrat, certify (record, 239) that the vote stood, John R. Lynch 99, and James R. Chalmers 67, giving Mr. Lynch a majority of 32. And as to Stoneville precinct, John Jones, the United States supervisor, certifies on page 26 of the record, that Mr. Lynch received 315 votes, and Mr. Chalmers 60 votes; he swears, when called on as a witness, that Mr. Lynch received 315 votes and Mr. Chalmers 60 votes. (Record, 207.) This shows Mr. Lynch got a majority at Stoneville of 289 votes, and adding his majority of 32 at Refuge would make an aggregate majority of 321 votes, as against the majority of 117 of Mr. Chalmers at Lake Washington. And this would show a net loss of 204 votes in the rejection of the three precincts of Lake Washington, Refuge, and Stoneville, which were rejected at the same time by the same board of commissioners. It shows clearly that where a wrong was done to Mr. Chalmers a double wrong was done to Mr. Lynch.

Mr. CARLISLE. With the permission of the gentleman from Tennessee, I desire to ask a single question at this point.

Mr. PETTIBONE. Certainly.

Mr. CARLISLE. I wish to ask if the gentleman considers and treats the certificate made by the United States supervisors, in districts having within them no city or town containing a population of twenty thousand, as competent evidence of any fact connected with the election?

Mr. PETTIBONE. Not necessarily as to the election of Lynch; but I will come to that in a few moments, as I have my own views and will present them further on.

So much for the present for the county of Washington. And now as to

COAHOMA COUNTY.

All the polls were thrown out in Coahoma County by the county commissioners save Friar's Point, namely: Clarksdale, Sunflower, Jonestown, Dublin, and Magnolia. Why they were thrown out the county commissioners do not certify. (Record, pages 15 and 16.) They leave us in most blissful ignorance. But on page 98 of the record we have the certified statement, under seal, of the three inspectors who held the election at Clarksdale. They certify that James R. Chalmers received 117 votes and John R. Lynch 307; a clear loss to Lynch of 190 votes.

Mr. ATHERTON. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. PETTIBONE. Certainly.

Mr. ATHERTON. Do you think now that the votes in Coahoma County which were rejected should be counted?

Mr. PETTIBONE. I will answer fully——

Mr. ATHERTON. I want to call attention to the majority report, and ask the gentleman why, if he supposes now the votes in that county should have been counted, he did not so report?

Mr. PETTIBONE. I will give the answer before I get through, and satisfactorily to the gentleman.

On page 98 of record is a certified statement, signed by all the inspectors and clerks, that at Sunflower Mr. Chalmers received 77 votes and Mr. Lynch 32; a clear loss to Mr. Chalmers of 45 votes.

On page 100 of record the inspectors and clerks certify that at Dublin Mr. Chalmers received 63 votes and Mr. Lynch 70 votes; a loss to Mr. Lynch of 7 votes.

On page 101 of record is found the certificate of W. W. Shelby, one of the inspectors, that at Magnolia precinct J. R. Chalmers received 23 votes and John R. Lynch 109 votes; a clear loss to Mr. Lynch of 86.

And this will give in the precincts of Clarksdale, Sunflower, Dublin, and Magnolia, of Coahoma County, where the actual vote is certified to and proven by the very men, the inspectors, who held the election, a clear majority of 238 in Coahoma County in favor of Mr. Lynch, but thrown out arbitrarily by the county commissioners, who do not even deign to give a reason why they did so, but do certify (record, page 15) that they give "a correct report of the votes cast in the election held in Coahoma County!"

Now, add together these votes—these clear majorities for Mr. Lynch at precincts thrown out by the county commissioners where there is in the entire record no pretense or claim, or decent insinuations even, that the election was not fairly held, so far as Mr. Lynch is concerned, the ballots legally cast, properly placed in the box, honestly counted, and the will of the electors fairly, honestly, and clearly expressed, and we have—

In Warren County, Lynch's rejected majority	2,009
In Rodney precinct, of Jefferson County, Lynch's rejected majority	152
In Issaquena County, Lynch's rejected majority	670
In Adams County, Lynch's rejected majority	284
In Bolivar County, Lynch's rejected majority	632
In Washington County, Lynch's rejected majority	204
In Coahoma County, Lynch's rejected majority	238
Making a total of	4,189

as against Mr. Chalmers's majority on the face of the returns of 3,779; thus giving a clear, unquestioned, undoubted, undeniable, majority of 310 votes for Mr. Lynch, as certified to by the very men—Democrats almost every one of them—who held the election at the various precincts which I have passed in review, who received the ballots from the hands of the voters and placed them in the ballot-boxes, and who sent those ballot-boxes containing those very ballots up to the county commissioners, and with them the very tally-sheets; but they were rejected by those wise (?) county commissioners for the reasons—

First. Because in Warren County and in Rodney precinct of Jefferson County, printers' dashes were used as punctuation marks on the face of the tickets which the electors voted in good faith, and concerning which Mr. Charles Winkley, a practical printer, who was called as a witness by Mr. Chalmers himself, swears on page 261 of the printed record in this case that "the dashes used are such as any printer of taste would either put in or leave out according as he wanted to lengthen or shorten the ticket to suit the paper or otherwise." That is what Mr. Chalmers's own witness solemnly swears; or,

Second. Because the inspectors who held the election, by accident (?) or design, failed to send up a list of the voters' names from their polls to the county commissioners, or failed properly, in a technical sense, to sign the returns; or,

Third. As in the case of Coahoma County, because the county commissioners, leaving us in most blissful ignorance, do not even pretend to offer an excuse why they threw out the returns of Clarksdale, Sunflower, Jonestown, Dublin, and Magnolia precincts, only just they did so! In the record of this case there is not a hint why they so acted, but in the record of the case of Buchanan vs. Manning, from the same State of Mississippi, on page 6, the matter is fully explained.

After the election of 1880, certain gentlemen were indicted for various election frauds in the United States court for the northern district of Mississippi. The county commissioners of the county of Coahoma, as the record in this case on page 16 shows, were M. B. Collins, W. W. Matthews, and Joseph E. Monroe, and in the record in the case of Buchanan vs. Manning, along with a brief transcript of other cases, appears this terse but most suggestive record:

No 1765. United States vs. M. B. Collins, Warner Matthews, Joseph E. Monroe, commissioners of election for Coahoma County.

Charge.—Failing to return vote of the county, returning the vote of one precinct as the entire vote of the county.

Plea of guilty by each defendant.

When charged with their malfeasance in open court these pure patriots plead guilty with wonderful alacrity. And we are asked to shut our eyes and take their open, gross, palpable, self-confessed frauds as if they were a thus saith the Lord!

Now, if these two classes of votes, amounting in the aggregate to 4,189 votes, were improperly rejected, then Mr. Chalmers holds his seat in defiance of justice and public law, and we need look no further. But there are charges of ballot-box stuffing at other polls; of false returns by the inspectors; of intimidation, and of conspiracy to stifle the voice of the electors. These are grave charges. They justify and demand examination.

At the Washington precinct, in Adams County, the county commissioners certify (record, page 13) that James R. Chalmers received 264 votes and John R. Lynch received 98 votes.

Charles W. Minor, the United States supervisor, certifies that Lynch received about 300 votes, and Chalmers not more than 57. The reason for this ambiguity he gives when on oath as a witness, on page 160 et seq. of the record.

The law of Mississippi (Code, section 136) requires the count to be made so soon as the polls are closed. "When the election shall be closed the inspectors shall publicly open the box and number the ballots," &c.

Mr. Minor shows that when this poll was closed, at 6 p. m., the inspectors opened the polls and counted three ballots! The inspectors then adjourned the count until the next morning, placed the box in the upper room of a private house, pretended to lock the door, and left it. During the night a light was seen in that room, and the next morning the count was completed with the result certified to. Minor swears that about 362 votes were cast; that about 200 voters present and waiting to vote had not voted when the polls closed; that there were about 600 registered voters in that district, of whom only about 80 were white men.

The Democratic challengers asked voters a great many questions, some of which I remember. Voters were asked where they lived, whose place they lived on, where they were staying, when they had registered, where they had registered at, and so on.—Record, 160.

Mr. HOOKER. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him, as he has referred to Washington County?

Mr. PETTIBONE. Certainly.

Mr. HOOKER. I will state that the gentlemen who are alleged to have committed the offenses referred to were tried before the United States court. I chanced to be one of the counsel engaged in the defense, and in every single instance every man charged with that offense was acquitted by a mixed jury consisting of white and colored.

Mr. PETTIBONE. Still, the evidence before us of what the vote was is the testimony upon which we should make up our minds, instead of taking any outside evidence; although of course I give the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] the full benefit of his statement.

At Pine Ridge precinct, in Adams County, the returns give Lynch 138 and Chalmers 141, total 279. Alexander Johnson, the United States supervisor, certifies (record, 229) that Lynch received 223 votes and Chalmers 50. He shows that when the polls closed at 6 p. m. the election inspectors refused to "publicly open the box" and count the vote; but against his wishes and protest the box was taken by Mr. E. B. Foster, one of the inspectors, to his private residence and kept all night, and the next morning the count was made.

Webster Bowyer, one of the inspectors, testifies that the Republicans tried to vote open tickets—clearly their right if they so wished to do—but "the inspectors would not receive them in that way." (Record, 179.) Why should they not? It was the voter's clear right to vote an open ticket. But if all Republicans did so, bystanding witnesses could swear from observation how the vote stood. Forbidding the voting of an open ticket, against law, reason, and common sense, was the complement and necessary counterpart of the unlawful refusal to obey the law and "publicly open the box" and count the vote when the poll was closed.

In Robb and Stone precinct of Washington County we have a repetition of the programme. The county commissioners give Lynch 176 votes and Chalmers 295.

T. B. Cooper, the United States supervisor, certifies that he "actually saw and counted 297 straight Republican tickets put in the box, and was satisfied there were a great many more." (Record, 25.) Sworn as a witness, he testifies:

There were 471 ballots cast at that precinct, but there was not a fair count. In the first place the colored people, or, in other words, the Republicans, voted an open ticket solidly Republican from bottom to top, and I, to my personal knowledge, counted 297 of that kind of votes which went into the box. I stood right there and saw them go in. (Record, 207-8.)

At this precinct the inspectors refused at the close of the poll to "publicly open the box" and proceed with the count. They waited four hours, then opened the box and counted out 100 ballots, and then a Democratic inspector, in violation of law, took the box to his home, and the next day at ten a. m. the box was again publicly opened, and Mr. Chalmers got 295, and Lynch only 176 votes!

The witness further swears:

I voted a ticket that had Garfield for President and Arthur for Vice President printed at the top, and General Chalmers's name for Congress at the bottom, and I in the presence of a great many persons scratched Mr. Chalmers's name off and inserted the name of John R. Lynch.

And the witness adds: "If that ticket has ever been counted I never saw it, and I examined every ticket that was counted." (Record, 209.)

Much of the evidence which proves the charge of conspiracy, of intimidation, and ballot-box stuffing, not necessary, happily, in this case to show that Mr. Lynch and not Mr. Chalmers was honestly elected, are the copies of the reports of the United States supervisors of election. And here it is proper to inquire whether such evidence can be looked to. And this must depend on the question whether the county supervisors of election provided for in sections 2011 and 2012 of the Revised Statutes of the United States are covered by section 2018.

By consulting sections 2011 and 2012 of the Revised Statutes it will be seen that two classes of supervisors are provided for, the one to be appointed by the circuit courts of the United States for cities and towns of upward of 20,000 inhabitants, and on the application to the judge in writing of two citizens of such city or town.

These, for clearness, may be styled the city supervisors. The other class to be appointed for cities or towns of less than 20,000 inhabitants, and for the country generally, on the application of ten citizens, and in like manner, for clearness, they may be designated the country supervisors. In section 2012 both these classes of supervisors are covered by the same words. They shall, in the language of the statute, "be known and designated as supervisors of election."

Then in section 2017 it is provided that—

SEC. 2017. The supervisors of election are authorized and required to attend at all times and places for holding elections of Representatives or Delegates in Congress, and for counting the votes cast at such elections; * * * to be and remain where the ballot-boxes are kept at all times after the polls are open until every vote cast at such time and place has been counted, the canvass of all votes polled wholly completed, and the proper and requisite certificates or returns made, whether the certificates or returns be required under any law of the United States, or any State, Territorial, or municipal law, and personally inspect and scrutinize, from time to time, and at all times, on the day of election, the manner in which the voting is done, and the way and method in which the poll-books, registry lists, and tallies or check-books, whether the same are required by any law of the United States, or any State, Territorial, or municipal law, are kept.

Why should "the supervisors of election," whether city supervisors or country supervisors, do all these things? Section 2018 reads as follows:

SEC. 2018. To the end that each candidate for the office of Representative or Delegate in Congress may obtain the benefit of every vote for him cast, the supervisors of election are, and each of them is, required to personally scrutinize, count, and canvass each ballot in their election district or voting precinct cast, whatever may be the indorsement on the ballot, or in whatever box it may have been placed or be found; to make and forward to the officer who, in accordance with the provisions of section 2025, has been designated as the chief supervisor of the judicial district in which the city or town wherein they may serve, acts, such certificates, and returns of all such ballots as such officer may direct and require, and to attach to the registry list, and any and all copies thereof and to any certificate, statement, or return, whether the same, or any part or portion thereof, be required by any law of the United States, or of any State, Territorial, or municipal law, any statement touching the truth or accuracy of the registry, or the truth or fairness of the election and canvass, which the supervisors of the election, or either of them, may desire to make or attach, or which should properly and honestly be made or attached, in order that the facts may become known.

This would seem to cover both classes of supervisors. It is not denied that city supervisors may, and indeed must, make such "certificates and returns" as may be called for by the chief supervisor. But it is denied that the above section 2018 covers the case of the country supervisors, and the reason urged is because the words "in the city or town wherein they may serve" are employed in reference to the supervisors, and logically restrict the power to make "certificates and returns" to the city supervisors. But in reply it is pertinent to say that the words "to make and forward to the officer who, in accordance with the provisions of section 2025, has been designated as the chief supervisor of the judicial district in which the city or town wherein they may serve, acts," &c.—these words constitute merely a descriptive clause of the officer to whom the returns are to be made, i. e., the chief supervisor.

What was the purpose of the section? It is declared at the outset:

To the end that each candidate for the office of Representative or Delegate in Congress may obtain the benefit of every vote for him cast, the supervisors of election are, and each of them is, required, &c.

What are they required to do? Why, among other things, to make and forward to the chief supervisor "such certificates and returns" as he may direct. But it is insisted by Mr. Chalmers that the words "city or town" cut down the meaning of the section and confine the making of certificates to the city supervisor, and that there were no such supervisors in the "Shoestring" district of Mississippi.

It will not be amiss to call attention here to well established principles of construction:

The purview of an act may be qualified or restrained by a saving clause in the statute. A saving in the statute is only an exception of a special thing out of the general things mentioned in the law; but a saving clause in a statute, where it is directly repugnant to the purview or body of the act and cannot stand without rendering the act inconsistent and destructive of itself, is to be rejected.—Sedgwick on the Construction of Statutory and Constitutional law, second edition, page 47.

Again:

Laws which favor what public utility, humanity, religion, freedom of intercourse, and other similar interests, regard favorably, as well as those intended to favor particular individuals, ought to be interpreted with all the liberality to which these interests are justly entitled in an equitable point of view, and ought not to be interpreted severely, nor be applied in a manner calculated to prejudice the persons intended to be favored.—Domat's Rules in Potter's Dwarris on Statutes, &c., page 141.

It is the duty of courts so to construe statutes as to meet the mischief and to advance the remedy, and not to violate fundamental principles.—Ibid., page 144.

Statutes must be interpreted according to the intent and meaning, and not always according to the letter.—Ibid., page 144.

The intention of the Legislature may be found from the act itself, from other acts in pari materia; and sometimes from the cause or necessity of the statute, and wherever the intent can be discovered it should be followed with reason and discretion, though such construction seem contrary to the letter of the statute. This is the rule where the words of the statute are obscure.—Ibid., page 144.

A thing within the intention is within the statute, though not within the letter; and a thing within the letter is not within the statute unless within the intention.—Ibid., page 144.

Now, country supervisors of election are "supervisors" as truly as city supervisors, and each of them is required to make "such certificates and returns" as may be called for by the chief supervisor.

Again, frauds can be perpetrated as well in the country as in the city. Votes are cast in the country as well as in the city. The object of the section, declared and undeniable, is to prevent fraud, "to the end that each candidate may obtain the benefit of every vote for him cast."

Nor does it antagonize this construction and interpretation of section 2018 of the Revised Statutes that section 2029 declares that "the supervisors of election appointed for any county or parish in any Congressional district, at the instance of ten citizens, as provided in section 2011, shall have no authority to make arrests or to perform other duties than to be in the immediate presence of the officers holding the election and to witness all their proceedings, including the counting of the votes and the making of a return thereof," because it was already provided in section 2022 that the marshal and his deputies "shall keep the peace and support the supervisors of election in the discharge of their duties, preserve order at such places of registration and at such polls, prevent fraudulent voting," &c., and in case of flagrant violation of law "to arrest and take into custody, with or without process, any person who commits or attempts or offers to commit" any of the offenses prohibited in the act; and the section further declares that "the supervisors of election shall, in the absence of the marshal's deputies, or if required to assist such deputies, have the same duties and powers as deputy marshals."

Now, this power conferred in section 2022 was common to both city and country supervisors. But Congress saw fit to restrict the power of the supervisors to act as deputy marshals and make arrests, &c., to the city supervisors. This power to act as deputy marshals, clearly conferred in section 2022, was restricted in section 2029 to one class, namely, the city supervisors. But deputy marshals never had the power to make "certificates and returns;" and taking away from the country supervisors the power to act as deputy marshals, conferred in general terms by section 2022, did not take away the power and duty, when called on to do so, as they were in this very case, to make certificates and returns, and which they did, as appears of record in this case.

Again, if the words "in the city or town wherein they may serve," found in section 2018, restrict the power to make certificates to the city supervisors, the words ought to be "in the city or town of twenty thousand inhabitants or upward," because in a city or town of less than twenty thousand inhabitants the supervisor would rank as a country supervisor merely. And surely it needs no argument to show that there may be cities and towns of less than twenty thousand inhabitants.

And, further, in a large part of our country, as in New England, the term "town" means not merely a village or city, but what in many States is meant by the term "township."

Thus, in the debate in the second session of the Forty-fifth Congress, in the case of Dean vs. Field, (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 29, page 2085,) Mr. B. F. Butler, speaking of this very clause, said: "Our State is divided differently from many others. When we speak of a town we mean a certain territorial district having a municipal government for it." And he shows on the same page that the constitution of Massachusetts uses the term "town" in the same sense.

Now, the chief supervisor of election in Mississippi did call on the various supervisors, both for city and country, for return of the vote of the various precincts where they attended on election day. Such reports are printed in the record of this case. Are they evidence? Greenleaf lays down the law thus:

In short, the rule may be considered as settled that every document of a public nature which there would be an inconvenience in removing, and which the party has a right to inspect, may be proven by a duly authenticated copy. (1st vol., § 484.)

And in the next section Greenleaf declares:

Whether a copy certified by the officer having legal custody of the book or document, he not being specially appointed by law to furnish copies, is admissible has been doubted; but though there are decisions against the admissibility, yet the weight of authority seems to have established the rule that a copy given by a public officer whose duty it is to keep the original ought to be received in evidence.

The object of the act of Congress was to prevent fraud. That was the object in directing the supervisors to make returns. They have made them. They expose the frauds perpetrated. They are evidence. They are not contradicted save by a most expressive silence. They must be credited. They demonstrate the frauds were perpetrated in favor of Mr. Chalmers and to the injury of Mr. Lynch, to the corruption of public morals, in defiance of common honesty, in contempt of public right, and in violation of constitutional freedom.

But it is insisted that the votes thrown out by reason of "printers' dashes" appearing on the face of Mr. Lynch's ballots were properly rejected. And this demand is buttressed by an opinion of the supreme court of Mississippi in the case of Oglesby, district attorney, &c., vs. Sigman et al., delivered, it is curious to know, immediately after the election.

To that case Mr. Lynch was no party. The record shows (9-13) that Mr. Lynch had sought an injunction to restrain the secretary of state and prevent the issuing of the certificate to Mr. Chalmers, by which he now holds the seat. But his honor Judge Campbell, of the supreme court of Mississippi, very properly refused to grant the injunction prayed for by Mr. Lynch, in these words:

I decline to grant the injunction prayed for in the annexed bill, because the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States is the exclusive judge "of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members," (made so by the Constitution of the United States,) and a decision of the question as to the election of a member of Congress by any other tribunal would not be authoritative or final, &c.

This repelled Mr. Lynch from the State tribunal, because there was a want of jurisdiction expressly declared. Yet in the case of Oglesby vs. Sigman, to which neither Mr. Lynch nor Mr. Chalmers were parties, and which Mr. Chalmers kindly informs us, on page 13 of his personal brief, "was submitted by counsel without brief or oral argument," the supreme court of Mississippi, speaking through the same judge (Campbell) expressly says:

We think the effect of section 137 of the code of 1880 is to condemn as illegal and not to be received or counted every ballot which has on its back or face any device or mark, other than names of persons, by which one ballot may be distinguished from another.

And further, that if the commissioners "find in the ballot-boxes ballots declared by law to be illegal, and such as shall not be counted, it is their plain duty to reject them."

This is the very meat of this decision. And it will be seen that the supreme State court of Mississippi differs widely from the United States district court for the same State. That court held in a case where it had jurisdiction that "the inspectors (not commissioners) of election are, so far as these officers (i. e., Representatives in Congress) are concerned, the sole judges of the qualification of voters and of the votes to be counted."

The supreme court of Mississippi flatly contradicts the United States district court for the same State in a case where it (the supreme court of the State) had not jurisdiction. For in the very case of Oglesby vs. Sigman, the court, Judge Campbell delivering the opinion, declared:

The House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States is the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members, and the courts of the State have nothing to do with this matter.

If the court of which Judge Campbell is the mouth-piece had nothing to do with the matter, it would seem that it is no matter what he said. Obiter dicta have but little weight anywhere.

And section 137 of the Code of Mississippi, read in the light of well-settled principles, so far as the validity of those ballots which had "printers' dashes" on them is concerned, must be held to be merely directory, not mandatory. It is almost a universal custom in the United States for the tickets or ballots to be printed prior to the election. The voter has no control and in the main little knowledge of the mystery of type-setting. In the case of Kerr vs. Rhodes (supreme court of California)—

The court held, and we think upon the soundest reason, that as to those things over which the voter has control the law is mandatory, and that as to such things as are not under his control it should be held to be directory merely. (McCrary on Elections, section 403.)

This is the very gist and cream of all the decisions on this subject. And it is a sound maxim of the law that ratio legis est anima legis—the reason of the law is the soul of the law.

What is the reason of the vote by ballot, rather than by viva voce? Clearly the main purpose is to preserve the right of the most timid voter to vote as he wishes, unawed and unintimidated. Clearly it is in order that the real will of the people may be expressed, and that the weak shall not be punished by the strong for voting as they wish.

Is there any complaint that those who voted for Mr. Lynch were compelled to so vote because of such printers' dashes—mere marks of punctuation—or prevented by them from voting either for Lynch or Chalmers as they might desire?

Charles E. Wright, a witness, (record, 24,) swears:

The dash I regard as a punctuation mark, and as such it is described by Webster. There was no mark on the outside of the ticket, and when folded none was discernible.

Geo. W. Rogers (record, 441) swears:

Witness examines the ticket marked Exhibit A in Albert Butcher's testimony, and states that the marks are not visible on the outside any more than the letters, and these are not discernible.

But further, in a case before the supreme court of Mississippi, when there was no question of want of jurisdiction, (Pradat vs. Ramsay, 47th Miss., 5 Morris, 24,) Simrall, J., declared—

An election statute ought to be interpreted with liberality as providing a mode to ascertain the choice of the electors, as directing machinery to bring out and ascertain the vote. Nor should such omission of forms prescribed or any irregularities on the part of those conducting the election invalidate it, unless the effect has been to stand in the way of and defeat the popular preference or the production of satisfactory evidence of it.

* * * * * * *

The people who are electors should not be deprived of the benefit of their votes because those whose duty it was to hold the election were ignorant, incompetent, or willfully failed in some particulars to do their duty, nor should the successful candidate lose his office because of the misconduct of those officials, if he is free from complicity with them and has not gained the office by reason of such misbehavior.

The evidence is clear that Mr. Lynch, who it is notorious is a man of color, desired to strictly comply with the very letter of Mississippi law in getting up his ballots; he knew the election machinery was all in the hands of his political opponents. He knew that a large part of his supporters were recently emancipated slaves, landless, and uneducated, and illy prepared to cope in any contest with their trained, educated, disciplined, and landholding opponents. But last, and finally, has any State the right to take from the citizen the privilege of voting for a member of Congress unless a particular kind of ballots shall be voted by him for Representatives in Congress? If no State has, then Mississippi has not.

Section 4 of article 1 of the Constitution of the United States provides:

The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.

Up to 1871 the matter was left to State control, and up to this time the custom of voting by ballot even was not unusual. The vote by viva voce still existed. In 1871 Congress, acting under the above-quoted section of the Constitution, passed the law carried into the Revised Statutes, as follows:

SEC. 27. All votes for Representatives in Congress must be by written or printed ballot, and all votes received or recorded contrary to this section shall be of no effect. But this section shall not apply to any State voting otherwise whose election for Representatives occurs previous to the regular meeting of its Legislature next after the 28th day of February, 1871.

That this act was constitutional will not be denied. That it put an end to viva voce voting for a Representative in Congress will not be questioned. Having entered the field has Congress excluded any State legislation on the subject?

In the case of Houston vs. Moore (5th Wheaton, 1) Judge Washington, speaking for the court, as early as 1820, held that in regard to the militia the States having exercised control before the Constitution was adopted, and not being prohibited by it, could still legislate upon the subject, but that Congress having entered the field excluded the States from any control. Or, as stated by Judge Kent:

The doctrine of the court was that when Congress exercised their powers on any given subject, the States could not enter upon the same ground and provide for the same objects. The will of Congress may be discovered as well by what they have not declared as what they have expressed. Two distinct wills cannot at the same time be exercised in relation to the same subject effectually, and at the same time be compatible with each other. (1st Kent, 389.)

In Priggs vs. The Commonwealth, a fugitive-slave case, Mr. Justice Story, clarum et venerabile nomen, in 16 Peters, 617, 618, declared as follows as early as 1842:

In a general sense this act may be truly said to cover the whole ground of the Constitution, both as to fugitives from justice and fugitive slaves; that is, it covers both the subjects in its enactments; not because it exhausts the remedies which may be applied by Congress to enforce the rights, if the provisions of the act shall in practice be found not to attain the object of the Constitution, but because it points out fully all the modes of attaining those objects which Congress in their discretion have as yet deemed expedient or proper to meet the exigencies of the Constitution. If this be so, then it would seem, upon just principles of construction, that the legislation of Congress, if constitutional, must supersede all State legislation upon the same subject, and by necessary implication prohibit it. For if Congress has a constitutional power to regulate a particular subject, and they do actually regulate it in a given manner and in a certain form, it cannot be that the State Legislatures have a right to interfere, and, as it were, by way of complement to the legislation of Congress, to prescribe additional regulations, and what they may deem auxiliary provisions for the same purpose.

In such a case the legislation of Congress, in what it does prescribe, manifestly indicates that it does not intend that there shall be any further legislation on the subject-matter. Its silence as to what it does not do is as expressive of what its intention is as the direct provision made by it. This doctrine was fully recognized by the court in the case of Houston vs. Moore, 5 Wheat., 1, 22, 23, where it was expressly held that where Congress has exercised a power over a particular subject given them by the Constitution it is not competent for State legislation to add to the provision of Congress upon that subject, for that the will of Congress upon the whole subject is as clearly established by what it has not declared as by what it has expressed.

Again, in Sherlock et al. vs. Alling, administrator, 3 Otto, 104, the Supreme Court of the United States, Swayne, judge, delivering the opinion, expressly held:

Whatever, therefore, Congress determines, either as to a regulation or the liability for its infringement, is exclusive of State authority.

To the same effect spoke Mr. Chief-Justice Waite, in Hall vs. De Cuir, 5 Otto, 489:

Congress, which is untrammeled by State lines, has been vested with the exclusive legislative power of determining what such regulations shall be.

This was a case of commerce between the States.

In ex parte Seebold, Mr. Justice Bradley, construing the election laws of the United States, held:

That the regulations of Congress being constitutionally paramount, the duties imposed thereby upon the officers of the United States, so far as they have respect to the same matters, must necessarily be paramount to those to be performed by officers of the State.

And in The County of Mobile vs. Kimball, 12 Otto, 700, Mr. Justice Field declared:

The grant of power by the Constitution, accompanied by legislation under it, operated as an inhibition upon the States from interfering with the subject of that legislation.

The result of these authorities must be that Congress, acting under section 4 of article 1 of the Constitution, have, in section 27 of the Revised Statutes, entered upon the field, have legislated, have gone as far as they choose to go, and have inhibited any further legislation in regard to ballots for Representatives than is expressed in section 27 of the Revised Statutes. This ends all controversy on the matter of ballots with printers' dashes on them. No "mint, anise, and cumin" of State enactment shall take the place of the weightier matters of the law. But American citizens who vote for a Representative in Congress shall have their votes counted and their voices heard in choosing Representatives to Congress, if only they are legal voters and cast an untrammeled ballot.

Now, to summarize. Without referring to or relying on the statements of the United States supervisors who were present at the various polls and under oath reported what they saw—and let it be remembered one-half of them were Democrats—and, where they signed any report at all, agree in the minutest particular with the Republican supervisors, still the testimony is complete that Lynch and not Chalmers was elected. Their testimony is in the main corroborative of what we know already, and without looking to their reports; but their testimony is all we have as to some of the polls at which Lynch received large majorities, which were thrown out on quibbles and technicalities as thin as the motes which float in the sunbeam.

And taken with the other testimony they drive conviction home to the mind that Mr. Lynch was elected; that he is the victim of hostile prejudice, natural perhaps, but illegal, unjust, and utterly subversive of the very palladium of American liberty.

I am well aware, sir, that I have gone further than the majority report of the Committee on Elections goes. I agree to the utmost in the conclusions reached by a majority of the committee—i. e., that Mr. Lynch was honestly and fairly and undoubtedly elected.

But there are certain ideas which to me are fundamental. For their expression I am alone responsible to my own conscience and to the constituency which sent me here. On day before yesterday the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. McLANE,] whom I am sorry not now to see in his seat, declared that all the people within the lines of the confederacy were confederates, even those "loyal men" whose claims are now filed in this city. Under the rules I could not then contradict him. But I tell the gentleman, and I tell this House, that East Tennessee furnished thirty regiments of soldiers to swell the ranks of the Army of the Union in the days of our great civil war. Their bones now molder in unmarked graves on a hundred battle-fields of that fratricidal war. Now, speaking for those who still survive, the brave, unconquered, loyal citizens of Eastern Tennessee, the descendants of the men who sought of their own accord the lone mountain wilderness rather than submit to British tyranny in the opening days of the revolutionary war, and who under Sevier and Shelby charged up the slopes of King's Mountain under the blazing, deadly fire of the soldiers of Ferguson; whose sons in the next generation, animated by their iron leader, Andrew Jackson, drove before them in headlong rout the veterans of Wellington on the swampy plains of Chalmette in front of New Orleans; these men, my constituents, who rallied around Andrew Johnson and William G. Brownlow in the opening days of our great civil war, and who kept, in the darkest hour of our nation's history, the fires of loyalty and liberty burning in the mountains—they have sent me here, and they bid me to stand for equal and exact justice to all men. Voicing their sentiments and their will, I invoke this Congress to give to the honest voters in every part of this Union the firm assurance that the real will of the people as expressed at the ballot-box shall prevail, and that a free ballot and a fair count shall be had, even in "the Shoestring district" of Mississippi. [Applause.]

[During the delivery of Mr. PETTIBONE's speech the following proceedings occurred:

Mr. ATHERTON. I desire to make a suggestion. As the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PETTIBONE] has intimated that he will have to hurry rapidly over some points, I wish to say I shall be glad to hear all that the gentleman desires to submit to the House; and at the proper time I will ask consent to an extension of his time.

Mr. MOULTON. I am sure there will be no objection to that.

Mr. PETTIBONE resumed his remarks. When he had spoken for one hour——

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan.) The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOULTON. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended.

Mr. MILLER. I take the floor, and yield the gentleman from Tennessee whatever time he needs.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Pennsylvania. How much time does the gentleman from Tennessee desire?

Mr. PETTIBONE. About fifteen minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee will be recognized for fifteen minutes in the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. MILLER.]

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. Does the Chair decline to entertain a motion to extend the time of the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. CALKINS. That is unnecessary, the gentleman from Pennsylvania having yielded the time he desires.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. The Speaker is able to take care of himself. Does the Chair decline to answer my question?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair did not understand a motion to extend the gentleman's time was made by the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. I make the motion.

Mr. MILLER. I have been recognized and have yielded to the gentleman from Tennessee.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair recognized the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. MILLER,] a member of the committee, in his own right, whereupon he yielded fifteen minutes of his time to his colleague on the committee.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. What right has the gentleman from Pennsylvania on that side of the House to take the floor next in order to the gentleman from Tennessee? As I understand the rule, it is that there should be one recognized on either side alternately. I deny the right of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to take the floor the next in order after the gentleman from Tennessee. I submit that to the Chair as a question of order, whether the Chair has the right, under the rules, to recognize the gentleman from Pennsylvania next after the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. CALKINS. I wish to suggest that whatever there may be in the suggestion of the gentleman from Georgia, no question of order can arise upon it; because it is a simple question of recognition by the Speaker. I suppose there need be no difficulty about this. If the gentleman from Georgia desires to object——

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. I do not object to the gentleman from Tennessee going on, but to the mode of administering the rule. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania can be recognized next, the Chair may recognize all the gentlemen on that side in order and ignore us until all that side is heard.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has no disposition to do anything of the kind. The Chair was advised from what had occurred that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PETTIBONE] desired an extension of his time. Instead of waiting for an extension to be asked, the Chair recognized another gentleman on the committee, who yielded to the gentleman from Tennessee fifteen minutes.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. And I say, if the Chair pleases, that is out of order. The way for the gentleman to get an extension of his time is by a request for unanimous consent on that side or on this. I make the point of order that the Chair has no right to recognize the gentleman from Pennsylvania now, in order that he may yield any time to the gentleman from Tennessee.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair overrules the point of order, and recognizes the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. MILLER,] a member of the Committee on Elections, who yields fifteen minutes of his time to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. PETTIBONE.]

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. From that decision of the Chair I appeal.

Mr. ATHERTON. In view of the fact that I arose in my place, having been promised recognition next by the Chair, and agreed to make at the proper time the motion for extending the time of the gentleman from Tennessee, and also in view of the universal practice in the House of recognizing members alternately on the opposing sides of such cases, is it proper that some one else should be recognized simply to prevent me from doing that which without suggestion from anybody else I offered to do?

Mr. CALKINS. I respectfully submit that no appeal from the recognition by the Chair of a member has ever been entertained in this House or in any other. It is a mere appeal from the act of the Chair in recognizing a member as entitled to the floor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair declines to entertain the appeal of the gentleman on the ground that an appeal upon a mere matter of recognition of a member is not in order.

Mr. ATHERTON. Then do I understand from gentlemen on the other side that instead of receiving a courtesy from this side they prefer to obtain the floor in some other way?

Mr. CALKINS. It is not a question of courtesy at all.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that had the Chair recognized the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ATHERTON] to debate this question, and at the end of his hour he had desired an extension and some gentleman of the Committee on Elections had taken the floor in his own right and for the purpose of yielding his time to the gentleman from Ohio the Chair would have recognized him for such purpose.

Mr. PETTIBONE. I am grateful for the courtesy shown me in extending my time.

Mr. ATHERTON. Having got their hour they must occupy it now.

Mr. PETTIBONE then resumed and concluded his remarks, and taking his seat was greeted with applause.]

Mr. MILLER. I will reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. I object.

Mr. ATHERTON. I object to that.

Mr. MILLER. Then I will take the floor in my own right and yield it.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. To whom does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. To any person who sees fit to take the floor.

Mr. ATHERTON. I propose to take the floor in my own time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. ATHERTON.]

Mr. ATHERTON. And there will be no time left, as I understand it, for the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. MILLER.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Ohio as entitled to the floor for one hour.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 4466) making appropriations for the Agricultural Department of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and had appointed Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia, Mr. PLUMB, and Mr. HALE as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

CONTESTED ELECTION—LYNCH VS. CHALMERS.

Mr. ATHERTON. Mr. Speaker, it is unfortunate, perhaps, for me and to the cause I represent to be called upon to engage in this discussion without fuller preparation. I agree substantially with the eloquent gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PETTIBONE] who has spoken on the other side, when he claims that this issue is to be determined by ascertaining, if we can, who received a majority of the legal votes cast in the sixth Congressional district of the State of Mississippi.

There are certain things which we as judges of that election must consider and determine. I hope that each of us may be able to throw off all feelings of partisanship, and to forget for the moment that we are Democrats or Republicans; and that we will endeavor to ascertain how this case stands upon the evidence. I assume that we as the constitutional judges of the elections, of the returns, and of the qualifications of members of this House must, before we find that any contestant is entitled to a seat in it, find that such person was properly elected, that he was properly returned, and that he possesses the proper qualifications for a seat in this body.

Allusion has been made to a supposed prejudice against Mr. Lynch on account of race and color. So far as my prejudice in this case is concerned, being a man of northern birth, living all my life-time in that portion of the Union where freedom only was known, for one I certainly have no prejudice against the distinguished gentleman who comes here as a contestant in this case. I recognize in him a competent officer, an honest man, as I understand it, and a man who is worthy in every respect of a seat in this House if it appears he has been duly elected thereto. Neither his lineage, color, or former condition of servitude will prevent me from doing the fullest justice to him and his cause.

I desire to examine this case simply in the light of the testimony which is before us, and to ascertain if possible whether the contestant has made out affirmatively a case which will justify us in ousting Mr. Chalmers from the seat which he now holds and permitting the contestant to occupy it.

It is said that we are the sole judges of the election of members of this House. So we are. In an argument (I speak not of the able argument addressed to the House to-day by the gentleman on the other side, but of an argument submitted to the Committee on Elections) it was suggested to us that being the sole judges of election of members we were, because made omnipotent and absolute and free from all supervisory power, absolved from any obligation to stand by the testimony and to decide the case according to the law and the evidence.

Certainly that is not the kind of argument that would be made in the Supreme Court of the United States or in the supreme court of any State, nor is it a reason which would be given to the courts why we should disregard evidence and disregard law because there was no supervisory power by which the judgment and discretion of this body might be controlled.

Now, Mr. Speaker, coming to this case I do not propose in the short time limited to me for the discussion of the legal principles involved to travel outside of the record and report which the majority of this committee have brought here and put before us as the facts which they have found and the conclusions to which they have arrived. I propose to commence the consideration and examination where they left off. They, the majority of the committee, have decided that Mr. Lynch had a majority of 385 votes over General Chalmers. They agreed upon nothing else. They disagree among themselves as to whether the certificates of the supervisors of the country districts were evidence of anything that they contain. The distinguished chairman of our committee [Mr. CALKINS] agrees with me in the proposition that the certificate of a country supervisor is not evidence of the facts it purports to authenticate; that such an officer is not authorized by statute to certify anything, and therefore his pretended certificate is not proof of any fact which it asserts.

When the majority disagree on this proposition I do not undertake to discuss it, but will leave its discussion to other members on this side of the House or to gentlemen on the other side, including the distinguished chairman of the committee himself.

Approaching the result which the majority of the committee have declared, there are several propositions of law which will address themselves so clearly, it seems to me, to every legal mind—several propositions the determination of any one of which in favor of the sitting member must give him the seat—that if I can have the attention of the House, or, as the gentleman [Mr. PETTIBONE] upon the other side said, of the lawyers of the House, and if this case is to be determined by the law and evidence, and is not to be guessed off by reason of suggestions thrown out at the end of the majority report, but which that majority are themselves unwilling to indorse, it seems to me beyond cavil or question the sitting member will be demonstrated to be entitled to his seat.

I am glad, Mr. Speaker, that this opportunity has been afforded to the country to learn something about what is termed the "Shoestring district" of Mississippi. I do not know what may have been the case in all portions of the country; but in Ohio it has been asserted by the whole Republican press that Mr. Lynch was elected by a majority of—I don't know how many—perhaps 17,000. Every fellow who ran a newspaper press had his theory. But all those wonderful tales and false representations are dissipated in the first instance by the report of the majority of this committee; for, instead of claiming a large majority for Lynch, they satisfy themselves with the claim that Lynch, the contestant, has a majority of 385.

Secondly, there is not in the notice of contest filed here by Mr. Lynch a single intimation that any one voter in all the "Shoestring district" of Mississippi has been intimidated or prevented from depositing his ballot by any violence or force.

And thirdly, Mr. Lynch himself made an application for an injunction to the chancery court of Hinds County, Mississippi, on the 16th day of November, 1880, against the secretary of state of Mississippi, in which his highest claim to a majority was 559 votes.

Turning to the question of fraud, in regard to which the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PETTIBONE] has talked so eloquently without evidence, I want to meet his charges and confront him by reading what was testified to by Mr. Lynch himself, and is a part of the record in this case. I refer to page 50 of the record, where Mr. Lynch, presenting himself as a witness, was asked as to this matter of fraud:

Q. Do you know of your own personal knowledge any fraud committed by the commissioners in this district by throwing out these votes?—A. My judgment is that the action of the commissioners in this district in throwing out those votes was fraudulent, but whether they acted from pure or impure motives I cannot say.

There can hardly have been fraud if the commissioners acted from pure motives.

Q. Specify now some act of the commissioners done in this district which is fraudulent.—A. The rejection in Warren County of 2,029 votes which were polled for me.

Q. Specify some other act of these commissioners that you claim to be fraudulent in this or other counties in this district.—A. I know no more than the public knows. I do not assert that any frauds were committed by the commissioners of election in Warren or any other county in the district other than by the rejection of votes.

Q. Your assertion that that is fraud is based entirely upon the fact that they rejected the votes?—A. Yes; together with the reasons they assigned for such rejection.

This is all that is asserted by Mr. Lynch himself upon the question of fraud; and this rejection of votes was declared afterward to be legal by the highest court in the State of Mississippi.

Before proceeding to the legal question to which I wish to address myself, there is one thing in the report of the majority to which I desire a moment's attention. It will be observed that on page 21 of the report the majority have added up at a certain point the votes which were originally claimed to be returned for Mr. Lynch, and also the votes originally returned for Mr. Chalmers, together with certain other votes which the majority of the committee unite in declaring ought to be received. The result of this tabulation was that Lynch received 9,545 votes and Chalmers received 9,540. It looked very much as if when this tabulation was made the majority of the committee intended to rest there. But this was a very small majority upon which to seat a man—a majority of five; and then the majority of the committee looked about for the purpose of diminishing the vote for Chalmers and adding something to the vote for Lynch. Upon the same page they say:

At Kingston precinct, in Adams County, it is conclusively shown—

Mark the language—

it is conclusively shown by the testimony of Jerry Taylor, Henry B. Fowles, Abraham Teltus, Smith Kinney, Harry Smith, jr., and William H. Lynch, that the vote as cast was 350—

The words, "for Lynch" are omitted—

for Chalmers, 59.

At this point I wish to call attention for a moment to the evidence which in the opinion of the majority so conclusively proves that these votes were fraudulent, against the well-known presumption that the officers of the law are presumed to have done their duty, and upon this the contestant takes the burden of proof. The majority say that the proof is conclusive. Now, let me turn to the testimony of Jerry Taylor, on page 128 of the record. This is the first witness mentioned by the majority. Among other things, he says:

I am satisfied that there were more Republican than Democratic tickets voted there that day. Not less than 250 or 260 Republican tickets were voted there that day. I am sure there was not less than that, and there may have been more. I saw the name of Lynch on the foot of a great many of these Republican tickets; others came in and called out the name of "Lynch" as they voted. I could tell whether these men voted a Republican ticket by the size of the ticket and the roll of it, because the Democratic ticket was so much longer than the Republican. I could distinguish the Republican ticket from the Democratic ticket when folded, because, being so much shorter, the Republican ticket would make a smaller roll when folded.

It turned out that the Democratic ticket was a half inch or an inch longer than the Republican, and the witness declares he could tell after they were rolled up by the size of the roll whether they were Democratic or Republican. He did not keep any tally of the number of Republican ballots cast. He does not pretend that he kept a tally. He had no means of knowing how many votes were for Lynch except from a general impression, and he makes the general statement that 250 or 260 voted for Lynch, while the majority of the committee give him 350. They give Lynch 90 or 100 votes more than this witness claims were polled for the contestant. Certainly his evidence did not make it conclusive even to persons easily persuaded.

Again, to prove it was simply a matter of recollection, and recollection without any reason to recollect, on cross-examination to be found on page 131, this same witness says:

I kept no tally-list that day as the voting was going on. I kept no count that day of the colored persons who, when they came up, called out, "Lynch ticket."

Therefore it was simply an impression, and on page 132 he says again:

What I saw of open tickets, and what the voters said, is my reason for stating in my examination-in-chief that more Republican votes than Democratic were put in the box.

The next witness mentioned by the majority of the committee is Henry B. Fowles, and his testimony will be found in the record, commencing page 132. He is the only man who pretended to have kept a tally-sheet, or to know in any way we can credit how many votes were cast for Lynch and how many for Chalmers. After giving the impression that a larger number of votes were cast for Lynch than for Chalmers he says, on page 133:

Out of the 350 which I have on my tally-sheet, I actually saw and read the name of Lynch on 160 ballots; the balance I took by what the voters said.

This is the only witness, as I have said, who pretends to have kept any tally of this vote; the only witness, and he kept no tally of votes for Chalmers.

This witness having testified that he knows 160 votes were given for Lynch, if you then turn to the report made of that election you will find Mr. Lynch is credited with just 160 votes, the largest number of votes this man swears to from personal knowledge; and it is the largest number any man swears to in this list of witnesses, and seems to be relied on by the majority as showing conclusively that 350 ballots were given for Lynch at that poll and only 59 for Chalmers.

To show the amenities and friendship existing between the white and black voters on that day at that election, and the total absence of ill feeling, ill will, intimidation, or violence, I will read another short quotation from his testimony. He says, and I will read it for my red-hot friend from Tennessee, [Mr. PETTIBONE:]

We had a right-smart of fun there that day. When a voter would come up to the poll he would present his ticket open and say, "Lynch." Then Mr. Higgins would order the clerks to hunt for Lynch in the poll-book, and the clerks, after fooling awhile with the books, would say, "Lynch ain't here." They laughed a bit and then Mr. Higgins would tell the voters to "fold" their tickets, but in place of folding them they would "hold" them up open, and Mr. Jerry Taylor or Mr. Felters would take it and fold it for them.

Mr. CALKINS. What page is that?

Mr. ATHERTON. That is on page 133. I will next read from page 136.

I refer now to the testimony of Mr. Fowles to the same purport and touching some of these 350 votes, and I call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Elections and the gentleman from Tennessee to this language, and desire to know how it can be claimed in the face of the evidence that 350—all of the votes claimed to be tallied by this witness for Lynch—could have been cast for the latter, when the only witness who kept the tally, and the only one who had the means of knowing, says that a portion of these 350 votes may have been given for the Democratic candidate. He says:

Some of these three hundred and fifty colored voters may have voted the democratic ticket. I cannot say how many did or did not. I am positive that on one hundred and sixty of the tickets I saw I read the name of "Lynch." Beyond that one hundred and sixty I cannot be positive further than that the voters said "Lynch."

He cannot be positive; the witness who was there, and who kept the tally, says that he cannot be positive; and yet in the face of that testimony the majority of the Committee on Elections can be certain beyond all question, and state to the House that it is "conclusively proved" that all these votes were cast for Lynch. They can be more certain than the men who stood about the polls and saw what was going on and from whom alone they obtained all information on the subject. They can find the conclusive proof when the very witness whose testimony is here given stated at the same time that a portion of that 350 votes was cast for the Democratic candidate, and all that he can be positive of is that 160 of them voted for Lynch; and Lynch got 160 votes by the returns of the inspectors, and he did not get any more. He was credited with the very highest number of votes that was proved by the doubtful testimony of any one present at the election to have been cast for him, the highest number that is testified to by any person who had any reasonable opportunity of knowing what was taking place.

Now, I come to the testimony of the next witness, Abraham Teltus. He says:

Mr. Henry Fowles was the tally-keeper on the Republican side.

This was the man who says that 160 votes was the number he can positively state was cast for Lynch, and who was the tally-keeper on the Republican side. This witness was afraid that some of the weak colored brethren might be by somebody representing the Democratic side talked into voting that ticket; and was very much afraid that some Democratic serpent might invade this political Eden and entice away some colored Republican saint. Now, the witness says in this testimony:

There could be no tangling up of the tickets from the time the voters left until they came to the voting room, unless they had Democratic tickets also, and Democratic tickets were circulated on the ground. There were Democrats on the ground trying to get the colored people to vote the Democratic ticket.

And turning to the testimony of the next witness, Harry Smith, jr., who likewise feared some tampering with the faithful in the same connection, he says:

I saw no Democratic tickets on the ground until eleven to twelve o'clock, when I saw a bundle of Democratic tickets in the hands of Mr. Dan Ashford, who had quite a multitude of men 'round him—colored men. I made for where they were, and walked in amongst the ranks and pulled one of my tickets out of my haversack and said: "Gentlemen, the understanding that I got from you was that you are to pay no attention to any ticket but our Republican ticket." Some colored men told me to pull out my tickets, and I did so, and said to them: "Gentlemen, beware of false prophets; remember that the tickets in Mr. Ashford's hands are the same color paper and similar printing to our own."

They were afraid that somebody would entice away a colored man to vote the Democratic ticket; and the only one who had an opportunity of knowing—the man who kept the tally-sheets—swears that a certain number of the three hundred and fifty might have been enticed away.

As there is nobody else speaking or testifying on this question, and these men only gave their general impressions of the number voting one way or the other, how can a majority of this committee pretend to say that these 350 votes are conclusively proved to have been given for Lynch at this precinct, and only 59 for Chalmers? They find without proof and are satisfied without evidence when they assert that beyond all question and beyond all reasonable doubt such was the state of the vote. And they say there is no doubt of the fact which they allege, in the face of the admissions of their own witnesses to the contrary, and of the presumption in favor of the honest official action of men whose duty it was to see that the election was properly conducted, that the vote was properly certified.

Under these circumstances, with the witnesses to the fact failing to testify that the 350 votes were cast for Lynch but only 160, the most that any of them testify to, I say how can it be said in view of such a state of facts that you, the majority, are willing to state in your return that 350 votes are conclusively shown to be given for Lynch at that precinct? How can it be claimed that you are to count these votes for Lynch under such circumstances? But it is said in this majority report:

It is shown that there was abundant opportunity for tampering with this box at the noon recess, when it was taken to the residence of one Dr. Farrar, and the Republicans were excluded from the presence of the box, and the aperture was not sealed.

They have failed to point out, and I call the attention of the gentlemen representing the majority of the committee to the fact that they have failed to point out anything in the statute of Mississippi that was violated by taking that box home under the circumstances. The box was locked up and the key was taken by the Republican inspector, and another inspector took the box after it was locked during this recess, and that action is justified by the law of Mississippi.

For the purpose of showing that they were justified, I call the attention of the House to the language of section 126 of the code of Mississippi:

SEC. 126. The commissioners of election in each county shall procure, if not already provided, at the expense of the county, which shall be paid by order of the board of supervisors, a sufficient number of ballot-boxes, which shall be distributed by them to each election precinct of the county before the time for opening the polls, which boxes shall be secured by good and substantial locks, and if an adjournment shall take place after opening the polls and before all the votes shall be counted the box shall be securely closed and locked, so as to prevent the admission of anything into it during the time of adjournment, and the box shall be kept by one of the inspectors and the key by another of the inspectors, and the inspector having the box shall carefully keep it and neither unlock nor open it himself, nor permit it to be done, or permit any person to have any access to it during the time of such adjournment.

And there is no evidence that a single iota, a single provision of that statute was violated by these men at this election. I want to say that is all there is in the report of the majority of the committee relating to any fraud in the Shoestring district. It is the only fraud they have called attention to as affecting that vote.

I now come to another question in this case. It is not necessary, for the purpose of vindicating the rights of General Chalmers to his seat, to prevent these 190 votes being taken from him, or 190 votes being given to Mr. Lynch. But this charge of fraud has been so much the subject of comment in the majority report, that I refer to it for the purpose of calling attention to the fact that it is the only charge of fraud which they pretend affects this election.

I call attention to the next question. On page 20 of the report it is said in reference to Hay's Landing and other precincts, as follows:

At page 89 of the record, Richard Griggs, clerk of the chancery court for Issaquena County, certifies, under the seal of said court, that the paper appearing on that page of the record is a true and correct transcript of the election returns made by the election officers as appears of record in his office, by which it appears Chalmers received 34 votes and Lynch 29 votes for member of Congress. The commissioners of election for that county certify to the secretary of state that they rejected this precinct return, and the clerk of the court certifies that that return is on file in his office, a copy of which he gives. The two statements taken together are prima facie evidence of the vote received at that poll. The highest number of votes appearing on the tally-list as certified by the clerk agrees with the number the commissioners say were returned from that poll. The commissioners are authorized by law to certify as a fact the number of votes cast; and the clerk of the court is authorized by law, as the keeper of public records, to give certified transcripts thereof.

For the reasons given in reference to Hay's Landing precinct, we also count Ben Lomond and Duncansby precincts; by reference to which it will be seen that Lynch's vote was 332 and Chalmers's 20 in the former, (record, pages 17 and 90,) and 371 for Lynch and for Chalmers 45 in the latter.

There is no evidence upon which any of these votes can be received unless the clerk of the chancery court for a county in the State of Mississippi has a right to certify to the state of the vote and to certify to what he calls the returns in his possession. It depends upon that alone as to whether the vote from those precincts can be received or counted. Now, we have very carefully collated in the minority report every statute of the State of Mississippi relating to election and bearing upon the question of the right of the clerk of the circuit or chancery court in a county in Mississippi to certify so as to make his certificate legal evidence, and the theory of the law relating to elections in Mississippi where the returns are to be sent and by whom tabulated and kept will be ascertained by looking at the quotations we have made from the code of Mississippi and copied in the minority report at page 27. And in order that there may be no misapprehension as to that, there is a little statement as to that matter, as to what is meant by section 105, because certain words therein used may have a different meaning in some other State.

Remembering that the question we are trying to get at is this: Has the clerk of the chancery or circuit court of a county in Mississippi a right to give a certificate relating to election returns alleged to be in his custody that shall constitute legal evidence? Section 105 provides as follows:

SEC. 105. The books of registration of the electors of the several election districts in each county and the poll-books as heretofore made out shall be delivered by the county board of registration in each county, if not already done, to the clerk of the circuit court of the county, who shall carefully preserve them as records of his office, and the poll-books shall be delivered in time for every election to the commissioners of election, and after the election shall be returned to said clerk.

While a general book of registration is made out for a county in Mississippi, a special document or book, called a poll-book, containing the record of this registration for each poll is made out for every election precinct in the county, and it becomes the duty of the commissioners of election to see that these poll-books are placed in the hands of the proper election officers, and after the election they are to be returned to the clerk in the condition in which they were sent out by him. No return is made upon the poll-book—no tally made thereon—thus furnished. They go to the clerk and come back to the clerk in exactly the same condition, without any mark upon them at all. After the election is held section 139 shows what is to be done:

SEC. 139. The statement of the result of the election at their precincts shall be certified and signed by the inspectors and clerks, and the poll-book, tally-list, list of voters, ballot-boxes, and ballots shall be delivered as above required to the commissioners of election.

The returns do not go back as records to the clerk of the circuit court, nor to the clerk of the chancery court; they do not go to any clerk at all; but they go to the commissioners of election, who are general officers in the county, whose duty it is to receive the returns. And on the reception of these documents the commissioners of election canvass the vote, and after they have canvassed and tabulated it it is made their duty within ten days to certify the result to the secretary of state. That being the case, they are the custodians of the election returns. If anybody is to give a certificate of election returns that duty must be discharged by the commissioners of election. It is to these officers the law says the returns shall be made, and it is their duty to certify the result, tabulated from all the returns in the county, to the secretary of state.

Such being the case, will anybody say to me that because by some process not authorized by law the returns may have got into the hands of a clerk he can certify them and make his certificate legal evidence? Nobody will pretend to say they are records of the court in which he acts as clerk. They do not even pretend that, as clerk of the chancery court, he has any power to make any certificate relating to election returns that will constitute valid evidence at all. But he having certified as clerk of the chancery court, and they assuming that the clerk of the chancery court and the clerk of the circuit court are one and the same person, they assume to take the certificate of the chancery clerk as proof of the returns. No proof has been made of the state of the vote in these three precincts, except such as is furnished by the certificate of the clerk of the chancery court, and if that is not legal evidence of what it purports to contain these votes must be eliminated and thrown out. That change will of itself defeat Lynch and elect Chalmers. So if you give the former all the votes he claims, except such as are unproved except by the certificate of the clerk of the chancery court, and Chalmers is elected. Are we to decide the case by the well-known rules of evidence, by those crystallized by the wisdom of the ages? They are older and wiser than we.

These rules say that such a certificate is not evidence. In Greenleaf on Evidence it is said in regard to certificates given by persons in official positions:

The general rule is that the law never allows a certificate of a mere matter of fact not coupled with any matter of law to be admitted as evidence. If the officer was bound to record the fact then the proper evidence is a copy of the record duly authenticated. But as to matters which he was not bound to record, his certificate, being extra official, is merely the statement of a private person, and will therefore be rejected.

Now, he certifies in the first place as clerk of the chancery court; but that furnishes no proof that his act was an official act as clerk of the circuit court. But waiving that for the time being, we find by looking at the statutes of Mississippi that the returns never went into his possession as a record of the court; never went into his hands as a public officer charged with their custody as such, or in any other way known to the statutes. Therefore his certificate as a matter of evidence is without legal value, and proves nothing. It is of no more effect than the white paper it was first written upon.

No lawyer can say, unless he can successfully dispute these grounds which I have assumed, and unless he shows that the statutes of Mississippi are different from what I have stated them to be, that such a certificate is proof of what it contains; unless somebody can show that, it will not do to say to any member of this House who has ever been a judge or any one who pretends to be a lawyer that such a certificate proves anything.

In view of it, I repeat, enough votes are affected by this one proposition, even if you give to Lynch what the majority of the committee claim for him, (but rejecting these,) that is, a majority of 385 votes—enough votes are affected by this one proposition to overcome that majority and elect Chalmers by 315 votes, or about that number; by simply rejecting this pretended vote about which there is no legal evidence under the sun, no pretense of evidence except this certificate. And this certificate, as it seems to me, is conclusively shown to be without any legal authority, to be void and proving nothing.

Now, the majority of the Committee on Elections are not slow to apply a rule of this kind when it will lose votes to a Democrat and give them to a Republican. Let me call the attention of members of the House a moment to a report which has been made in another contested-election case, by my distinguished friend from the "hub of the universe," the gentleman from Boston, [Mr. RANNEY.] I say the majority of the committee are not slow in respect to another case in coming to a decision as to the testimony of such a clerk. I refer to the case of Bisbee vs. Finley. On page 8 of the report of the majority they say:

As to the testimony of this clerk, it is sufficient to say that there is no law in Florida providing for the preservation of the ballots for the purpose of being used as evidence; the ballots are not evidence sufficient to overcome the testimony of the voters where the question of fraud and tampering with the ballot-box is raised.

In the Florida case, where the attempt is made to unseat a Democrat, the certificate of the clerk is of no value whatever for the purpose of proving legal votes. But in the State of Mississippi, where the proposition is to unseat a Democrat and to seat a Republican in his place, the certificate of the clerk is a very good thing and quite sufficient for the purpose. I hope, however, that the views of the majority in that regard will not be concurred in by members of this House.

Mr. CALKINS. Do you not disagree to that statement as one of the minority?

Mr. ATHERTON. No, I do not. There is no difference between us.

Mr. CALKINS. I thought there was.

Mr. ATHERTON. It may be said in the Florida case that other evidence was adduced in addition to the certificate of the clerk, and that the vote on the evidence should not have been rejected, but the principle we have never disputed. No certificate, no officer's certificate touching a document of which he has not the legal custody, can be received as legal evidence.

Now, to come to the next proposition, which is still clearer, if the one can be clearer than the other. The majority of the Committee on Elections, in order to make up the majority for Lynch which they claim, have restored the pretended returns in Australia precinct and in the Bolivar precinct in Bolivar County, which the commissioners rejected. In Australia precinct they claim for Lynch 192 votes and for Chalmers 30 votes; and in Bolivar precinct they claim for Lynch 311 votes and for Chalmers 45 votes.

Now, let me have the attention of the House to this matter for a moment, in order to see whether any of us disagree as to the principle to be applied to uncertified returns. I desire to call attention to page 19 of the report of the majority. It is there said in regard to to Bolivar County, in the first place:

Under section 138 of the Mississippi code the inspectors of elections are required to send up to the commissioners the whole number of votes cast at the poll, and the commissioners under section 140 of the code are required to "transmit to the secretary of state, to be filed in his office, a statement of the whole number of votes given in their county for each candidate."

This duty being enjoined by statute, their certificate is evidence of the fact that the number of votes which they certify were given. That return was put in evidence from which it appears they returned Lynch 979, Chalmers 301.

I call the attention of the House to this statement for this reason: it is put here as though the votes that were said to be rejected were a part of those certified by the commissioners. Such is not, however, the case. But those votes, 979 for Lynch and 301 for Chalmers, are included in the returned vote and have nothing to do whatever with the rejected vote that follows. And now as to that rejected vote let us see what appears? I read from the same portion of the report:

It further appears by a certificate signed by the commissioners of election that they threw out Australia precinct, containing 30 Democratic votes and 192 Republican votes, because the returns were "not certified to by the inspectors or the clerks."

Again, it appears from the same certificate that in this precinct—Bolivar precinct—45 Democratic votes and 311 Republican votes were rejected for the same reason. Now, for what reason did they reject those votes? They had no proof that any such pretended votes were given at all. The returns were signed by nobody, neither by the inspectors of election, the clerks of election, nor anybody else. They were simply papers coming up in the form of election returns, unsigned by any person on the face of the earth. For anything that the election officers knew they might have been interpolated between the place of the election and the place where they were delivered.

Now, I would like the attention of the lawyers among the majority of the committee. I would like the attention of the distinguished chairman of the committee, [Mr. CALKINS,] and especially the attention of my learned friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. RANNEY,] who prepared the report in the case of Bisbee vs. Finley. I would like to see his face here just now, because my beloved friend from the glorious "hub of the universe" has committed himself in the report which he made, and which my friend from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] signed, to this very proposition. When I read it will not somebody say as I say now, "consistency, thou art a jewel?" and add, may thy glorious beams illumine at some time the work of the majority of this committee!

I hold in my hand the report in the case of Bisbee vs. Finley, written and printed before the ink was dry upon the majority report in the present case. I call attention to page 19:

ORANGE COUNTY.

The paper purporting to be a return from the poll in this county known as Fort Christmas is not signed by the officers of the election, as appears from a certified copy thereof in evidence, and it is proven that these votes stated in this paper were included in the official return from the county.—Record, pages 1129 and 76.

Such a return is illegal, and no votes stated therein can be counted.—McCrary on Elections, sections 174 and 274.

This document states that Finley received 30 votes and Bisbee 3 votes, which we deduct from the count.

Now, let us find out the difference between the two cases. In both cases there were election returns which were not signed or certified by any officer. In the case of Lynch vs. Chalmers the commissioners of election who had the authority to do so ruled out these returns, refused to admit them into the tabulated return. In the case of Bisbee vs. Finley these returns were admitted. The chairman of the Committee on Elections in his report in this case, signed by eight or nine Republican members, said that although the returns were thrown out they should be received; and the next day, before the printer's ink had dried on the report in this case, the majority of the committee submit a report declaring that returns of this kind which had been received under similar circumstances should go out. The election officers in the Lynch case did their duty, and ruled out these returns; and the majority of the committee say they shall be put back. In the other case the inspectors of election did not do their duty but admitted returns of this kind; and the majority of the committee in their report propose to throw them out.

Now, is it necessary, is it proper, is it essential that I should stand before this House, composed as it is said, of eighteen lawyers out of every twenty members, to urge upon you that what would otherwise be a return, but is signed neither by a judge of the election nor a clerk, is unauthenticated in every way, and should be ruled out? If it is necessary that so plain a proposition should be bolstered by authority, all I have to do is to refer to the authority presented by the learned gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RANNEY] in his report. He refers to McCrary on Elections, sections 174 and 274. I read those sections:

SEC. 174. In Chrisman vs. Anderson (1 Bartlett, 328) it was held to be the duty of the House of Representatives in the investigation of an election contest to go behind all certificates for the purpose of correcting mistakes brought to its notice. In the same case, however, it was held that a return not signed or certified by any of the officers of the election was not admissible; and the same point was held in Barnes vs. Adams, (2 Bartlett, 760.) It is the duty of the party seeking to avail himself of a vote which is not legally certified or returned to make the necessary proof to supply the place of the usual formal certificate and return; and if he fails to do so, such vote cannot of course be received.

SEC. 274. Where the statute required that the return of the vote of each town should consist of a copy of the town record, signed by the selectmen and attested by the clerk, it was held that a certificate which did not on its face purport to be a copy of the town record, and which was attested by James N. Tilton without anything to show that he was town clerk, was void, and could not be received by the canvassing board. (Luce vs. Mayhew, et al., 13 Gray, Mass., 83.) And, of course, if the proper officers omit altogether to sign a return, though it may be otherwise formal, it is void and proves nothing. (Barnes vs. Adams, 2 Bartlett, 771.)

That is the authority of my friend from Massachusetts; and I am glad to see it. I know he will vote with us on this proposition, although turning to the majority report in this case I find his name in the list of signers. Now you see it, now you don't.

There are some other propositions of law which the minority in their report quote from the same book:

SEC. 363. The general rule is that when the return is set aside both parties must prove their votes by other evidence.

SEC. 365. It is impossible to state more definitely than we have done the general rule which should govern in determining whether a return should be set aside, and the parties on either side required to prove their actual vote by other evidence.

SEC. 391. It is very clear that if the returns are set aside no votes not otherwise proven can be counted.

It certainly will be admitted that a pretended return not certified to at all would be in no better condition than a vote certified to, but the return of which had been set aside; because if the supposed return be unauthenticated there is nothing upon which the election officers can say it is a return.

The correction of the vote by the exclusion of these votes uncertified altogether is enough to overcome the majority claimed for Lynch and to elect Chalmers. So on that, as well as on the other proposition, you may concede the pretended illegal votes, you may concede these votes unproved except by a certificate of the clerk who had no authority to make it, and still Mr. Chalmers is elected by a very good majority, I do not know exactly how many.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CALKINS. I move, Mr. Speaker, by unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended to the conclusion of his speech.

There was no objection.

Mr. ATHERTON. I am much obliged to the gentleman from Indiana. I prefer to go on by the courtesy of my friends of the House than for my friends to get it by taking the floor in their own right and then yielding it to me as was done on the other side.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized to continue his speech.

Mr. ATHERTON. I am glad to say, Mr. Speaker, we on this side desire kindness and courtesy from our Republican friends whether those on the other side do or not, and I most especially thank the chairman of the committee for it, from whom I am indebted for so many favors and whose breadth of intellect is only excelled by the goodness of his heart.

Now we come to the consideration of a question, Mr. Speaker, that I do not think has ever been disputed before in a committee of this House, or before any court in all the history of jurisprudence of this country under its complex system of government until the dispute which is made by the majority of this committee, and that is, when a local statute of a State has received the construction of the highest court of that State, the courts of the United States, or a committee of this House, this House itself recognizes its binding authority upon all questions of local statutory construction.

And it is necessary by reason of the complex system of our Government, that it must be so. We give to the Supreme Court of the United States the jurisdiction to construe its Constitution and its laws. A construction of either, when put upon them by the Supreme Court of the United States, is from the time of the enactment of the law to be considered as much a part of it as any of it which may be considered more immediately the work of the Legislature. The construction is ingrafted upon it and becomes a part of the law, and you do not follow it afterward because it is a decision of the Supreme Court, but because it is a part of the supreme law of the land. In like manner each State has delegated to the highest court in that State the construction of its constitution, of its statutes, and when the highest court of a State construes a local statute that construction relates back to the time of the passage of the law and is as much a part of the law from the moment the statute has been enacted as though in express terms that construction was a part of the declaration of the Legislature when the law was made.

And it must be so. For instance, take a case such as this. Here we are trying to find out, not what any court has decided, but we are here for the purpose of learning what is the election law of Mississippi. And how do we find it out? We look to these statutes, and if there is anything for the judicial construction, we look beyond the statute to see what construction is given to that statute by the highest court of the State. Whether the original statute, so to speak, or whether it is an additional idea ingrafted upon it by the judicial construction, it is the law from the moment the statute was enacted. It is a new idea suggested by the chairman of this committee in his report that, in order to make the construction of the statute binding upon anybody, it must continue for sufficient length of time, so the people shall find it out, just as though there could be a construction of the statute that did not bind the parties until after it was made; that is to say, that here we construe this statute, and we do not construe it for those who may be affected by it up to this time, but we construe it for those who are to come after us. Who ever heard of such a claim as to a construction of a statute? The construction is not the enactment of a law, but it is simply declaratory of what the law has been all the time since its enactment. It is as much a part of the law as any other portion of it if it could be divided. It is a mere declaration that such was the law from the beginning.

Otherwise, what condition of things would you have at an election in the State of Mississippi. Here a man comes up with a ballot, and what does he say? That ballot is illegal for any office in the State of Mississippi; it cannot be a valid ballot to deposit for any officer of the State of Mississippi; but it may be a good ballot for a Congressman. It illustrates what I said before, that under our complex system of government you must allow a State to construe its own laws; and so long as the Government of the United States allows the State to make the election law relating to State and Congressional elections, and the courts to construe it, the courts of the United States, the Congress of the United States, and this House are bound by that construction. Such has been the uniform decision all the time from the beginning of our complex system until now, unless we are now to ingraft an exception upon it in the Lynch-Chalmers case. The only pretended exceptions (and they are not really exceptions) are that the United States courts do not follow the decision of the highest court of the State where they are within the domain of general jurisprudence. They do not do it also when by the last decision the courts of a State attempt to overturn former decisions that have become a rule of property.

The majority of the committee attempt also to establish another exception and claim that a single decision of a State court touching the construction of a local statute would not govern the United States courts or this House, and it only a line of decisions that should be followed. If a decision had been made and you do not follow it until there is a line of decisions clearly sustaining it, if it is very thoroughly acquiesced in by the people, there would probably be no other decision like it, because the people indorsed it and no similar case is likely to arise. Therefore, to say this shall be the line of decisions before the courts shall be bound to follow them, and that no construction shall be binding until it has become known, is putting upon and ingrafting into the law a principle unknown to it, which has not been practiced, and in the nature of things cannot be.

If it is necessary to demonstrate how thoroughly this doctrine has been followed, let me call the attention of the House to the ordinary judicial declaration on the subject. In the case of Green vs. Neal, 6 Peters Reports, 291, the court say:

The decision of this question by the highest tribunal of a State should be considered as final by this court, not because the State tribunal, in such a case, has any power to bind this court, but because a fixed and received construction by a State in its own court makes it part of the State law.

That bears out exactly what I have attempted to indicate.

Again, in the case of The Tioga Railroad Company vs. The Blossburgh Railroad, in 20 Wallace, 143, the court uses this language:

These decisions upon the construction of the statute are binding upon us, whatever we may think of their soundness on general principles.

This is not a question as to whether we would have made the same decisions that the court made, but the point which we are to consider is, Was it a question for judicial construction; was it a construction the court might put upon a statute? And if it was so decided by the highest judicial tribunal of the State, then the courts of the United States have declared their intention to abide by such decisions and stand by such a construction.

Not only has that been the language of the court but much more has it been the language of this House and of its Committees on Elections. Let us see how the Committee on Elections in former reports have spoken on this question, the question as to whether this House should stand by the construction of the highest court of the State in construing their own statutes. I call attention first to what has been called the Tennessee cases, and to the report made thereon by Hon. G. W. McCrary, who has become the author of our standard work on this subject of elections law. He says:

It is a well established and most salutary rule that where the proper authorities of the State government have given a construction to their own constitution or statutes that construction will be followed by the Federal authorities. This rule is absolutely necessary to the harmonious working of our complex government, State and national, and your committee are not disposed to be the first to depart from it.

Now, it was stated in language not quite as strong in the Iowa cases, in the Forty-sixth Congress, in a report signed by Messrs. Field, the present Speaker of the House KEIFER, CALKINS, CAMP, Weaver, and Overton:

We are not disposed to be the first to depart from it, and we certainly think that such a decision, made in good faith and acquiesced in at the time by the people of the State, and followed by a full and fair election, should not be overthrown or questioned, except for the gravest reasons, founded on an undoubting conviction that it was plainly an error, and that the error had worked some substantial injury.

That, I am informed, was not a decision of the court of the State, but referred to a proclamation of the governor fixing the day of election.

Mr. BELTZHOOVER, on the same question, spoke substantially in the same line. He says:

The question whether the constitution of the State of Iowa "must be amended in order to effect a change in the election of State officers" is one which it is the exclusive right of the State to decide. The persons to whom the constitution and laws of Iowa confide this decision have made it, and their determination is a finality and is conclusive on all parties. The committee have not the right to review the decision.

And in the case of Curtin vs. Yocum, which turned upon the construction of a statute of Pennsylvania, the minority report, which was made by Mr. CALKINS and signed by our present Speaker and Mr. Weaver, relying upon this construction of a State court, uses this emphatic language, speaking of an unregistered voter:

We think this question, under the present constitution and laws of Pennsylvania, not an open one. The highest court of judicature of the State has decided it; at least it has given a construction to that part of the new constitution under consideration, and we quote therefrom.

This is unequivocal language, and this minority report was adopted by Congress, and a Greenbacker was permitted to retain his seat in a Democratic House.

In the case of Bisbee vs. Hull, in the Forty-sixth Congress, the decision of the supreme court of Florida was held to be conclusive by the committee and the House. When the admission of Mr. Hull, who held the governor's certificate, was under discussion, Mr. CALKINS said:

How can this certificate stand, even as establishing a prima facie right, when the basis upon which it rests has been swept away by a decision of the supreme court of the State of Florida?

Is it true that a decision of the supreme court of Florida is to receive the fullest consideration and to govern the action of the committee, while the decision of the supreme court of Mississippi is to receive no consideration whatever at the hands of that committee? And in that report Mr. KEIFER uses this language:

The opinion of the supreme court of Florida, pronounced by the chief justice, on the question of canvassing the vote of the county of Madison will be found in the record, page 221.

* * * As already stated, duly certified copies of these returns were put in evidence by the contestee; they are signed by all the officers of the election; they are perfect in form, clear and explicit in the statement of the votes cast, and have all been adjudged by the unanimous opinion of the supreme court of Florida, in a case before it, to be good and valid returns of the election at these polls. (17 Florida Reports, page 17.)

If the supreme court of Florida, speaking upon a matter before it, declares, and that declaration as cited by the Committee on Elections "having been adjudged by the unanimous opinion of the supreme court of Florida in a case before it to be good and valid returns," it ought to bind the committee.

Again, in the case of Boynton vs. Loring, the report which was prepared by my distinguished friend, the chairman of the Committee on Elections, contains a clear and explicit announcement of the doctrine I now contend for.

I have only time now to refer to a fact which has been suggested but not argued by the majority of the committee: that the statutes of a State become by adoption the property of the United States in respect to the election of members of Congress, and, being so, this House has the same power as a supervisory board over them as the Supreme Court has over questions of Federal law. But no such distinction was pointed out by the committee or anybody else in respect to the construction of the State statute relating to an election. And it was said in the report of the Committee on Elections in this case of Boynton vs. Loring:

But it is not necessary for us to decide this question, and we do not, much preferring that the courts of Massachusetts shall first construe their own statutes, and when they have undergone judicial construction we would follow the decisions of the courts of that State.

Ah, yes; when a Democrat is to oust a Republican we will follow the decision of the State of Massachusetts and retain the sitting member; and when a Democrat is to be ousted by a Republican, we will put our foot on the decision of the supreme court of the State of Mississippi and refuse to be bound by it, and oust the Democrat.

It is not denied in a general way that the rule I have contended for should generally control the action of this House. But it is attempted to be said—and I wish to have the particular attention of the House while I am discussing this proposition—it is attempted to be said this decision of the supreme court of Mississippi is not to guide the House, for two reasons. One reason is, it is said to be an obiter dictum. Another reason is, that the court is alleged to have been without jurisdiction to make this decision. Now, if I can have the attention of members of this House, I say it seems to me, however much I may fail in it, that I can demonstrate that this decision is not obnoxious to either of these objections. It certainly is not obiter dictum. What is an obiter dictum? Let me ask my friends on this side of the House or on the other, what is an obiter dictum? Can the court consider and decide the principal points raised in the case and the result be an obiter dictum?

Here the supreme court of Mississippi decided three propositions in a case fairly presented. Not for the purpose of determining the Lynch and Chalmers case, but for the purpose of getting a decision on the construction of a Mississippi statute, three questions were presented. The first was whether the commissioners of election, these general county officers, had to receive without question the returns sent up by the inspectors of election, and not purge or correct them, or whether it was their duty to canvass and correct them? The next question was, if it was their duty to canvass them, were these votes, the marked ballots which they had received, legal? The third question was, if they were illegal votes, could the court recall the board of county commissioners for the purpose of doing their work over again, or were they functus officio?

Those were the three questions presented, those were the questions fully considered by the court, and those were the questions decided.

Now, I ask, what is an obiter dictum? It is simply an expression of the judge illustrating, as he goes along, the proposition he intends to decide. It is something said by way of illustration outside of the real point he decides. Here it was the principal point decided. There were three points decided. The first was that the court did assume to decide that these commissioners of election had the power as a supervisory tribunal to recanvass the votes that were sent up to them; to look at the returns and compare them with the ballots and say what should remain in and what should go out. They said, in the second place, these ballots marked with what are called printers' dashes are illegal; and therefore it was the duty of the officers who received them to have rejected them. But as to the third point they, the commissioners, having exhausted their powers, could not be called together because their powers were functus officio, they having first attempted to discharge their duties as they did.

Well, now, if it was not an obiter dictum—and it does seem to me if there be any proposition that must be said to have nothing in its favor, as contended on the other side, it is that this decision of the court was an obiter dictum—the next question is, Was the court without jurisdiction? Well, whether it was or not is to be determined by the statute and what they did. There was a statute in the State of Mississippi which authorized the attorney-general under certain circumstances to invoke the jurisdiction of the court in any matter in which the public had a general interest. Its language was this, as found in section 2542 of the Code of Mississippi:

On the petition of the State by its attorney-general, or a district attorney, in any matter affecting the public interest, or on petition of any private person who is interested, the writ of mandamus shall be issued by a circuit court commanding any inferior tribunal, corporation, board, officer, or person, to do, or not to do, an act, the performance or omission of which the law especially enjoins as a duty resulting from an office, trust, or station; and where there is not a plain, adequate, and speedy remedy in the ordinary course of law.

It was said at this time the officers of election had been subjected to arrest for either receiving or rejecting votes under the statute of the State of Mississippi, and the attorney-general, in pursuance of the power conferred upon him by this section, filed a petition in mandamus against the election officers in Tunica County, State of Mississippi, complaining they had received votes which were obnoxious to the Mississippi law relating to elections, and insisting that they should be called together for the purpose of undoing the wrong that they had done by the reception of those votes; in other words, being called together, that they should exclude these votes which they had consented to receive It was a question of general interest. It was not a question of Lynch and Chalmers; it was a question relating to the peace and good order of the State of Mississippi. It was a question relating to the powers of this board of election commissioners. It was a question in which there was not a plain and adequate remedy at law, and the jurisdiction of the courts of Mississippi was properly invoked by the attorney-general not for the purpose of deciding the case of Lynch against Chalmers, but for the purpose of deciding the proper construction of the law and preserving the peace and good order of the State of Mississippi.

He, having commenced this proceeding against these officers of Tunica County, was met by a demurrer. It is attempted to be said here that all the parties to that proceeding were attempting to help Chalmers against Lynch. Yet the very first thing these election officers did, who are supposed to have been in the interest of Chalmers and attempting to help him, was to file a demurrer disputing the jurisdiction of the court, showing that the defendants were making a proper and bona fide defense, were making a legal technical defense, and were not doing it for the purpose of aiding in procuring any particular construction of this statute.

The circuit court of the State decided in favor of the defendants, and thereupon the case was appealed to the supreme court of the State of Mississippi; and these questions came up before that court, which are stated here in the report of the minority. I have endeavored to state them before. But in order that there shall be no misunderstanding, I will ask gentlemen to listen while I state what are the questions which were presented to the court, the order in which they were presented, the way in which they were presented, and how they were decided. I quote from the decision:

> This case presents for adjudication three questions, namely:
> 1. Whether the commissioners of election have the right to reject illegal ballots cast and counted by the inspectors of election and returned to them with the statement of the result at the precincts.
>
> 2. Whether the ballots which the commissioners of election for Tunica County refused to reject should have been rejected by them as being illegal for having on them a device or mark by which one may be known or distinguished from another.
> 3. Whether the action of the commissioners was final, or whether they may be required by mandamus to meet and act in the matter again, as the court may order.

Those were the questions. Now, I ask those gentlemen who say that this was a decision made without jurisdiction, (and let me hear the response when we come to hear from the other side,) suppose that the supreme court of the State of Mississippi had determined the second proposition just contrary to what they did determine it. Suppose they had determined that these ballots which the commissioner of election of Tunica County had received were legal ballots and not obnoxious to the provisions of the Mississippi statute, then I would like to ask any gentleman on the other side whether it would have been said that that decision was without jurisdiction?

It was a question which they had as much right to decide as any other. All three questions invoked the jurisdiction of the court to construe the statutes of the State of Mississippi as to elections. Now, the proposition I make—I might make it as to this first question, but I make it as to the second so that I may not be misunderstood—the proposition I make is this: suppose the court had decided that these ballots were legal, and that the commissioners had not done wrong in rejecting them, would anybody say that they had not the right to so decide in this case, and so relieve the defendants by turning them out of court upon the theory that they had done no wrong? Suppose that it was the first question they had to determine, and its determination had been different from what it was. Suppose they had found that the commissioners of election had no right to reject votes that were returned to them by the inspectors of election. Suppose the court had determined in that way. Would they not have had the right to so determine? That would have ended the case, as the determination of the second proposition would have ended the case.

Nobody will pretend that the court was without jurisdiction, because it could determine upon either of the propositions just as fully as it could determine upon the third proposition if that had been first taken up.

Now, let me ask gentlemen on the other side, those who say that this question was determined without jurisdiction, is it not a most peculiar case that the court, the supreme court of the State of Mississippi, has the right to determine the question one way, and you make no point against the jurisdiction when it so decides, but when the court determines the same question the other way you hold that it has no jurisdiction and the determination is void? You will have to come to that conclusion before you can ever say that the court determined the case without jurisdiction. You will have to come to the conclusion that the court had the power to determine the question one way with full jurisdiction, while if it had determined it the other way it had no jurisdiction.

It is said that the court first determined that these commissioners could not be called together again. They did not so determine. But they determined the questions in the following order: Have the commissioners the right to pass upon the correctness of the returns sent up by the inspectors of election? If they had determined that they had not the right, then there would have been nothing to be decided touching these ballots which the inspectors of election received. If they determined that question one way there is nothing further to determine; if they determined the ballots to be legal there would be no need to go further.

But if they determined that the ballots returned by the inspectors and received and counted by the commissioners were illegal, then the third question came up, and that was whether the court could call this board together again for the purpose of undoing the wrong which it had committed. The question was determined just as much, with as full jurisdiction, and is just as much a decision which should bind this Congress and this House as the decision of any question that was ever determined by any State court in construing any statute of a State.

There was not only one decision merely but it was followed by another of like tenor. So the case comes within the rule as prescribed by the majority of the Committee on Elections. Here are two decisions of the same question—a line of like decisions. In a second decision made afterward by the Committee on Elections, by which a Democrat was unseated and a Republican permitted to occupy the place, the same court substantially determined that this statute was not directory, but was mandatory; that it was for the court not to make but to declare the law.

Now, if you will look to the language of that statute you will find upon the very face of it, as it seems to me, that no court could have properly come to any other decision upon the construction of that statute than the one arrived at by the supreme court of Mississippi. A proper construction of that statute, mandatory in terms, required the court to decide that a mark not only upon the back of the ballot shall make it obnoxious to the provisions of the law, but that there shall be no mark upon the face of the ballot; that a mark upon the face of a ballot shall have exactly the same effect as one on the back. The language of the statute is this:

> But this shall not prohibit the erasure, correction, or insertion of any name by pencil-mark or ink upon the face of the ballot.

Gentlemen say that these marks are not obnoxious to the statute, because they were upon the face of the ballot. But the statute says that any mark by which one ballot may be distinguished from another destroys the ballot. It says to the inspectors of election, "You shall not receive any ballot that has anything upon it, either on the face or back, by which one ballot may be distinguished from another in any other way than by the names." It says to the commissioners of election, "If the inspectors of election, in violation of this law, shall have received any ballots with any of these distinguishing marks upon them, you, when you meet as a board having supervisory power over the action of the inspectors, must disallow such ballots."

The statute applies to any marks upon the ballot anywhere; and the proviso, the saving clause, is that this shall not prohibit the erasure, correction, or insertion of any name by pencil-mark or ink upon the face of a ballot, showing that the face of the ballot was the subject of legislative consideration and action as well as the back; that the statute was directed against everything other than the names by which one ballot might be distinguished from another.

As to the decision of the supreme court of Mississippi, I have no mission to perform in the way of vindicating the wisdom of that court. It is enough for us to say that the court had jurisdiction and that it decided this question of statutory construction. If it were necessary to go further and vindicate the wisdom of that decision I might say that the court would have gone outside of its powers as a court construing the law and would have attempted to usurp the powers of legislation if it had not obeyed the law as it found it and made simply that decision which is consistent with the language of the statute.

It is not true, as has been asserted, that no other decision can be found in the same line or the same direction. The minority report refers to decisions, not precisely like this but analogous to it, in the Pennsylvania reports, the Oregon reports, and also a very strong case in the reports of the State of Alabama. These decisions declare in effect that when the law-making power of a State has determined what a statute shall be, it is the duty of the courts to vindicate that legislation and carry it out, not to higgle upon the principles that ought to have influenced the law-making power, but to find out the meaning of the statute and construe it accordingly. But if, as I have said, the construction given by the supreme court of Mississippi in this case is not the construction which you or I would have given; if this construction differs from the construction given to a similar statute in Indiana, or California, or any other State, we are here simply for the purpose of determining what the law is on the subject in the State of Mississippi; and when the highest court of judicature in that State has determined the construction of the statute-law of the State we are bound, in order to maintain our complex system of government, to accept that construction.

But it is said that some other court in Mississippi (though I never heard the statement until I heard the speech of the gentleman on the other side within the hour just past) has made a different decision. If this be so it was much better reason that the matter should have been authoritatively determined by the supreme court of the State. This House is not bound by a decision of the district court which has been reversed. There is no declaration in any of the decisions or in any of the reports of committees of this House that the inferior courts of a State are to declare the proper construction of a statute of the State. The declaration is that the report of the highest court of judicature in the State is to govern the courts of the United States, as well as the action of this House, in the construction of a State statute.

There are many other propositions which, as a matter of course, it would give me pleasure to discuss; but I have taken much more time than I expected, and much more than I ought to have taken, by the courtesy of the House. But the Constitution has made us the judge of the elections and returns of members; and we are to determine in this case whether one man, who now has a seat in the House, or another, who is seeking a place here, is entitled to the seat. Shall we act as judges? Are we to determine these cases according to legal rule? Are we to be guided by the wisdom of the ages that have gone before? Are we to abide by the determinations of the courts? Or are we to adopt language that I heard used in our committee-room, and to assume that we are judges, uncontrolled except by such rules of law or evidence as we see fit to adopt, and being thus uncontrolled, and subject to no supervisory power, we will do exactly what our notions of right shall indicate without reference to the rules of evidence or the decisions of the courts?

Such a principle simply brings us to a state of anarchy, a condition in which nobody outside of this House would have any respect for our decisions. If we stand by the well-considered determinations we have heretofore made, and by the well-established rules of law, it makes no difference whether one man vacates the chair he occupies here and another takes his place; we have vindicated our manhood; we have asserted the constitutional rights and lawful powers of this House. Whenever we do otherwise we simply bring this House into a state of confusion and anarchy, so that no man here has any known title by the rules of law to the place which he occupies, and his constituency no power to enforce their right to his services. I have misunderstood my mission if I am not to determine this question by the rules of evidence and law heretofore adopted by courts and by the Committee on Elections, and the House itself.

If we do not, then there is no need of suggesting any rule or making any law regarding these contests, because if we have the absolute authority, the supreme power, with nobody to control our action from outside, if for that reason we—and in the language of a former illustrious member of this House, who came in just as the final vote was being taken in a contested-election case, and being told that both contestant and contestee were not particularly good or honest, and were, in the opinion of this person talking, d—d scoundrels, simply said: "Yes, I know, but who is our d—d scoundrel?" and being informed, was in possession of all the knowledge he desired to control his vote—if we are influenced by no higher considerations of duty than that, the country has had enough of our services and we had better quit the business and go home. I want, however, to say that the suggestion above contains no intimation touching contestant or contestee. We have no d—d rascal on our side and charge none as to the other. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. MOORE obtained the floor.

Mr. ATKINS. Will my colleague, as it is late, yield to a motion to adjourn?

Mr. MOORE. The introduction of my speech was intended specifically for yesterday morning, but I will make it now. I have some interesting reading.

Mr. CALKINS. I will move to adjourn at five o'clock.

Mr. MOORE. I will go on then.

Mr. ATKINS. Very well; as you prefer.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, before proceeding to the discussion of this case, with all deference and respect for the older and wiser members of our party who think differently, I wish now and here to enter my solemn protest against the shilly-shally, pig-and-puppy policy of our managers, if we have any on this side of the House. We have a number of Republicans here, who know themselves to have been lawfully elected to seats upon this floor, now and for nearly five months past entreating this Republican House to give them an opportunity to present their claims for consideration. The Democrats oppose it. Of course we are not surprised at this; opposition is their chief accomplishment. But when our own party friends, from whom we have a reasonable right to at least expect some sort of sympathy, deliberately decline from day to day to allow us to bring up the claims of these neglected associates, we think we have a just and valid right to feel deeply aggrieved. We have three contesting members whose cases, after many months of investigation, are now ready to be presented to this House with favorable reports, prepared with such care and cautious investigation as will commend them, we trust, to the judgment and sense of right of every fair man in this House and in this country. We insist now upon their right to be heard. The Republicans of the South, they who have come up through great tribulation, will not longer excuse the party for this dangerous and unjust neglect of the highest privileges of these Representatives, namely, the right to occupy and possess their lawful but now usurped seats upon this floor.

Mr. Speaker, I shall make no threats. I have for twenty years voted and shall continue to vote the Republican ticket, no matter at what personal cost, and that cost is well known to many; but all other men are not so ingrained as I am into the principles of the Republican party; and I warn this Congress to-day and the whole country that unless they do simple justice, and do it reasonably soon, to these Republican contestants who have almost literally fought their way to the doors of this House, it will require no prophetic foresight to see the Forty-eighth Congress in the hands of a round Bourbon majority and led by a Bourbon President. Why, even now Republicans are asking in vain, in many instances, and sometimes in exalted places here, for Republican support because Democrats occupying high positions are permitted to set up prior and superior claims. Can any party be run successfully by allowing its enemies to dictate its policy?

I confess to an incapacity to understand or indorse such tactics. The democratic minority of this House will of course object. That is their business. Opposition is their party shibboleth, and obstruction is the political pabulum on which they live and move and have their being. Let them object; let them even filibuster if they will, but let the Republican majority go on in all proper efforts to conduct the public business, and if they are prevented by the Democratic minority let the facts go before the country, and then let the issue rest where it belongs.

I confess that I am, and I think the country is, growing very impatient with the milk-sop policy of our Republican majority here, and unless we decide soon to first seat the men who have been fairly and honestly elected, and then go on vigorously in the prosecution of the important public business for which we were sent here, I do not hesitate to say that the country will not do what it ought to do if it fails to repudiate our party at the very next election. A word to the wise is sufficient.

Mr. Speaker, what I may say to-day shall be spoken from a business stand-point, and is intended to reach the business ear of the country.

The legal aspects of the question will be left to the lawyers of this House for discussion. All the politics that I have look only to the promotion of the material interests of the country; and any politics or party policy that does not, in my view, tend to promote peace and quiet, law and order, thrift and prosperity, commands neither my sympathy nor support. I desire, therefore, to be recognized as a purely business representative, speaking to the business interests of my own district, my own State, and my own country.

The question at issue to-day is one which should be discussed in a spirit of fairness, without passion, without prejudice, and without partiality. The time is past for crimination and recrimination; the dead past, with its unpleasant memories, should be permitted to bury its dead; and we who are presumed to represent living issues should engage in their discussion with such calm and temperate investigation as fitly become the representatives of a great nation claiming to be built upon the abiding basis of equal and exact justice to all. We should do right if we can: first, because it is right; and, second, because it is expedient. Let all the ends we aim at, therefore, be our country's, and God's, and truth's.

It is our chief boast that the Government of the United States is a "government of the people, for the people, and by the people," and that every man has, or should have, a voice in the choice of its rulers. Is this boast true in point of fact? I propose, with the consent of the House, as briefly as may be, to show that in some portions of our country, at least, the facts do not support the claim. Following up this idea on the opening day of Congress I said: "In the interests of justice, in the interests of common fairness, in the interests of good government and the civilization of the nineteenth century, I respectfully and solemnly protest in the name of the American people against the administration of the oath of office to the Hon. James R Chalmers, of the sixth district of Mississippi, to a seat in the Forty-seventh Congress of the United States."

That protest was made deliberately and advisedly, and although, as will be well remembered, our Democratic friends then thought it exceedingly funny, I wish now to repeat and emphasize it, even at the risk of detaching from the subject that earnest and serious consideration which its gravity demands.

Mr. Speaker, I desire to impress upon this House, and especially upon the people of Mississippi and the nation, that I can have no personal motive of opposition to the occupancy of the contested seat by the honorable gentleman now in it; and am moved solely by a sense of duty and responsibility to the interests of my Government, and my oath of office to faithfully try and serve it.

Whether Hon. Mr. Chalmers or Hon. Mr. Lynch is to hold the seat now contested is a matter of comparatively trivial concern; but whether the candidate lawfully elected shall be kept out of it by unlawful means is a matter of consequence so grave and serious that it cannot be safely passed over by this House without patient, earnest, and faithful investigation.

Was Hon. Mr. Chalmers fairly and lawfully elected? This is the simple question at issue to-day. I do not believe that he was; and furthermore, I do not believe that any fair-minded and unbiased member of this House even on the other side of it, will in his heart of hearts contend for it. The issue is so plain, and has been so generally proclaimed by the American newspaper press, that I presume there are very few general readers in the United States but have already come to the same conclusion irresistibly forced upon myself, and, no doubt, also upon the contestee.

But why do I believe so? By what line of reasoning and argumentation do I arrive at my conclusions? It is due to the occupant, as well as my duty to this House and to the American people, as one of their Representatives, to give the reasons for my action, in order that, if in error, they may be combated by those who, if there be any such, may feel inclined to take the other view.

According to the official census reports of 1880, the State of Mississippi contained a white population of 479,398, and a colored population of 650,291, making an excess of colored people in Mississippi of 170,893. The population of the counties composing the sixth district of that State alphabetically stated are as follows, namely:

Counties.	White.	Colored.
Adams	4,796	17,853
Bolivar	2,694	15,958
Claiborne	3,910	12,853
Coahoma	2,412	11,156
Issaquena	826	9,178
Jefferson	4,260	13,054
Quitman	592	815
Sharkey	1,405	4,901
Tunica	1,256	7,205
Warren	8,717	22,521
Washington	3,478	21,889
Wilkinson	3,570	14,245
Total	37,916	151,628

Making an excess of colored people in this district of 113,712, nine-tenths of whom I think it entirely fair to say would vote the Republican ticket if left in the free, voluntary, and undisturbed possession of their rights.

Now, let us examine into the official vote upon which the honorable gentleman claims his right to the contested seat and see if even a semblance of vague probability can be tortured so as to justify his absurd and unjust claims. The official records are as follows, showing, first, the inspectors' returns to the State commissioners; second, the number of votes rejected by the commissioners; and third, the commissioners' final returns to the secretary of state, as per appended tabulated statement, namely:

Counties.	Inspectors' returns to commissioners.		Votes rejected by the commissioners.		Commissioners' returns to the secretary of state.
	Lynch.	Chalmers.	Lynch.	Chalmers.	Lynch.	Chalmers.
Adams	1,214	1,419	316	32	898	1,387
Bolivar	1,715	403	736	102	979	301
Coahoma	1,235	594	883	369	352	225
Claiborne	288	1,061	.....	.....	288	1,061
Issaquena	1,118	173	785	114	333	59
Jefferson	383	1,043	247	92	136	951
Quitman	83	153	.....	.....	83	153
Sharkey	175	484	.....	.....	175	484
Tunica	506	239	.....	.....	506	239
Warren	2,086	1,034	2,029	20	57	1,014
Washington	1,298	1,963	526	356	772	1,607
Wilkinson	814	1,961	.....	.....	814	1,691
Total	10,915	10,257	5,522	1,085	5,393	9,172

The summing up of the above figures shows that the votes of the district returned by the inspectors of elections to the State commissioners were: for Lynch, 10,915; for Chalmers, 10,257; leaving an original majority for Lynch of 658. The votes rejected by the commissioners were: for Lynch, 5,522; for Chalmers, 1,085; making in favor of Chalmers, 4,437. The votes returned by the commissioners to the secretary of state were: for Lynch, 5,393; for Chalmers, 9,172, showing a majority for Chalmers of 3,779, notwithstanding the fact that the inspectors had already, as before shown, returned a majority for Lynch of 658.

What now, Mr. Speaker, is the inevitable conclusion that irresistibly forces itself upon every fair-minded man concerning the question under discussion?

When we are officially shown that the twelve counties composing the sixth Congressional district of Mississippi contain only 37,916 white population, including women and children, and a colored population of 151,628, or four times as many colored as white people, are we not unreasonably required to strain our credulity when asked by the honorable contestee and his political friends to believe that he received a lawful majority of votes in that district? Suppose, by way of illustration, that we accept the rule which allows one voter for every five persons and apply it to the case in question; by that rule the white vote of the district would amount in round numbers to 7,600. Applying the same rule, the colored vote would amount to in round numbers 30,350, leaving a colored majority in the district of 22,750.

But if the rule of one to five be objected to as in the interest of the colored people, suppose we take the rule of one to six, which, if partial to either white or colored, is certainly in favor of the former. Then while the white vote would be about 6,300, the colored vote would be 25,250, or more than four to one. Now, suppose, further, that one-tenth of the colored voters would if left unintimidated vote the Democratic ticket and that one-tenth of the whites would vote the Republican ticket. This would give an aggregate Republican vote of 23,357 and an aggregate Democratic vote of 8,255, or, in other words, a fair Republican majority in the district under any reasonable circumstances of not less than 17,000, or about three to one.

I will not undertake to speak to-day of the methods known more particularly as "the Mississippi plan," by which the State of Mississippi now sends a solid Democratic delegation to the Congress of the United States; because the discussion of this subject always angers Democrats, and I desire to avoid that, and, furthermore, I deem it altogether unnecessary in the presentation of my case. The simple statement of the official figures is believed to be strong enough to carry conviction with it to every man willing to be guided by truth and justice. It is confidently believed that even a cursory study of the figures above presented will convince any reasonable man, of even the Democratic party, that if fraud and violence and intimidation were not the habits in that district and in some others, also, of the State, the delegation to Congress would be as overwhelmingly Republican as it is now Democratic. The existence of this disordered political condition is not a matter that any fair man will even question; and there are those now on this floor who personally know it to their cost.

It is within the bounds of my own personal knowledge that there are business men in Mississippi, native and to the manner born, who vote regularly with the Bourbon party while secretly despising it, and who are led to do so only because the proscriptive and intolerant spirit of that "rule-or-ruin" party will not recognize the right of opposition, and because also that party teaches its adherents to obstruct in every possible way business transactions with a Republican. One of the oldest and most respectable of that class, socially and financially, has only very recently whispered in my own ear, as if afraid it might be heard outside, that the political practices of that bulldozing party in Mississippi were simply beyond the pale of all Christian and honorable precedent; and it can be easily and philosophically accounted for.

It is a matter of public record that the editor-in-chief of a leading Bourbon newspaper in the great southwestern Mississippi Valley, an organ of that party in Mississippi, has editorially urged that "small-pox should be written over the doors" of business men and merchants, and has actually succeeded, by this diabolical policy, in literally breaking up and driving out of the reach of his pernicious influence reputable and respectable gentlemen, for no other reason than that they were earnest and conscientious Republicans, and yet in the same paper this editor has emptied gallons of ink in turgid appeals for new immigrants to come into his section only to receive upon their arrival the same treatment in case they happened to bring with them their opinions and their manhood. If, therefore, the oldest and most conspicuous editor of this proscriptive party in that section has found profit in publishing such views, is it any wonder if the smaller provincial papers, taking their cue from this demoniac leader, shall fulminate from day to day their seditious imitations? Listen to the utterances of various Mississippi newspapers in the interest of the Bourbons The Lexington Advertiser said:

> Rub up your red shirts, patch up your artillery, and get up a full supply of "enthusiasm" for the campaign this fall. There will be no Federal count at the end of this election.

Hear the Greenville Times. It said in November:

> Stripped to the truth, the Democratic party is not a political organization; it is a vigilance committee.

The Jackson Comet, on October 25, said:

> If there is bloodshed on the 8th of next November, let no colored man say he was not warned in time. If you are satisfied with the government stay at home, for if a conflict should occur you know who will be the victims.

Witness the following utterance in the Charleston News and Courier, one of the most respectable of all the Bourbon organs. It says:

> Killing is not always murder, and violations of law are not always a crime. There is an earlier law than that of the statutes—the law of self-preservation. That law was the guide and master in South Carolina in 1876, and it will be appealed to whenever there is any danger of a return to the vileness of negro rule.

Now, this is what they said when the present contestant was elected, and just what they have said also in Alabama and wherever else the colored voters outnumber the whites. They do not recognize the great American idea of majority rule except when it happens to fit a white constituency; and are satisfied with it only when colored voters cast their suffrage for white Bourbons. The question of whose ox is gored makes to them all the difference in the world. Sir, this it is chiefly that has caused the deplorable condition in that State which we are here discussing. If these editors would but urge their subscribers to read both sides of all political questions, and then go and cast their legal votes peacefully according to their judgment, material prosperity would begin from that good day.

One would naturally suppose that some formal public protest against these outrages would long since have been made by Democratic Representatives, especially by the very able and distinguished senior Senator [Mr. LAMAR] from that State; but if such protest has ever been publicly delivered, notwithstanding he has but just now finished a general State campaign in which he was successful in winning a second term, I have not had the honor to see or hear of it. The country will watch with interest his course during his second term in the United States Senate to see whether the calcium light of his great abilities shall be thrown upon the side of law and order, or, as heretofore, be hidden when that question is at issue under the shadow of a Bourbon bushel. He is too able, too distinguished, and too prominent a political quantity to safely rest longer under the imputation of silence. No wonder, under this condition of affairs, that less than 1,000 immigrants came into the State during the year just closed, notwithstanding more than 600,000 were distributed during the same time among other States of the Union.

The newly-elected governor of Mississippi makes, in his recent inaugural address, a plaintive appeal for immigrants to come in and help build up the waste places of that naturally rich State. The greatest of all authors makes one of his characters exclaim, "I can call up spirits from the vasty deep," and another to answer him, "Why so can I, or so can any man; but will they come when you do call for them?" Now, it is a very easy matter for Governor Lowry to advertise to the world the great needs of Mississippi, but let him be forever assured that until the policy of his State is so fixed and understood abroad as to protect all shades and all classes in the full and free exercise of their religious and political convictions, immigrants, with sense enough and vigor enough to seek new homes will never select that State as a place in which to raise either their families or their fortunes.

This is an age when freedom is asserting herself, and when the prejudices of the narrow past must give place to the broadening and liberalizing spirit of enlightened progress. If he really desires to see his State grow and prosper, let him first impress the people that the laws must and shall be strictly and impartially enforced upon all classes equally and alike, and that, no matter what the opinions of any man may be, all shall have the free and untrammeled right to openly and freely proclaim them. This is the way to get immigrants and this is the way to make Mississippi rich, powerful, prosperous, and happy.

Only a very short time ago this House was agreeably entertained by the honorable gentleman and accomplished Hibernian orator from New York, Mr. COX, in a very proper defense of the rights of foreign-born and naturalized citizens of his own complexion. He then very wisely said that—

> When a nation is forgetful of its duty to any of its citizens it is in process of decadence. Nay, sir, it is already dead for its primal purpose, for it has lost the exultant spirit of nationality which makes it honored and respected by mankind. When a man ceases to be worthy of the protection of the State, the law ceases to be worthy of respect by its citizens. When our nation fails to give its protection it fails before mankind in its duties, whether it be a foreign-born or a naturalized citizen.

Now, these be brave and commendable words, and the country will watch with some degree of interest to see if the distinguished and honorable gentleman will raise his potential voice to insist upon the same rights for his native-born fellow-citizens who have for so long a time been deprived of them in the sixth district of Mississippi, and for no other reasons than that they honestly believed the Bourbon party to be an enemy to freedom and to progress, and because, furthermore, their skins happened to be of a dusky hue.

I know that when the question of a free ballot has been an issue, our good friends on the other side have had so jealous and sacred a regard for the venerated principle of "State sovereignty" as to oppose all national measures calculated to guarantee American citizens in their lawful franchise. But when, as for instance, a very few days ago, the question of large appropriations for citizens of their overflowed States was an issue, then, indeed, were they ready to vote with a wise and unanimous alacrity to throw "State sovereignty" to the dogs, and to conveniently forget all their constitutional scruples upon that erstwhile favorite, and almost apotheosized hobby. It may not be altogether charitable to press upon our good friends on the other side this eloquent inconsistency, but the opportunity is so inviting as to be quite irresistible.

The almost universal Democratic regard which has been suddenly and unexpectedly developed for the late President of the Republicans, is, if sincere, greatly to be commended; and it is gratifying to see distinguished Democrats on this floor now quoting approvingly from his speeches.

On August 6, 1880, Mr. Garfield said:

> So long as we live we will stand by these black allies. We will stand by them until the sun of liberty, fixed in the firmament of our Constitution, shall shine with equal ray upon every man, black or white, throughout the Union. In this there is all the beneficence of eternal justice, and by this we will stand forever.

Of course every Democrat in this House, particularly from Mississippi, now heartily indorses this utterance.

But permit me just here, Mr. Speaker, to express the opinion that in spite of all this the "Mississippi plan" has at length substantially run its course; and that this House has seen the last solid Bourbon delegation from that State that will ever be witnessed upon this floor. The better people, even of their own party, are becoming heartily disgusted and nauseated with these disgraceful doings; and evidences are daily accumulating of their earnest dissatisfaction with the home situation.

Listen to a late utterance of the Democratic Vicksburgh Herald, which says, in words that every American citizen should read:

> Bourbon virus is the deadly leaven which is working and corrupting the very best elements of the social fabric in Mississippi. If public sentiment does not soon spew it out not many elections will pass by before there will be a bloody revolution. Strong arms will be arrayed against strong arms, and the lies, hypocrisy, and cowardice will bear their legitimate fruits in streams of blood. And we may thank Bourbonism for all this. As certain as fate no good can come of trying to conceal the deadly poison that lurks in the body-politic of Mississippi. Let all parties demand and enforce a change. Let all refuse to support men, no matter how high or influential they may be, if they are the apologists of perjury, hypocrisy, and intolerance. There are ministers of the Gospel in Mississippi who encourage the destruction of the youth and the blighting of the growth of the new South by countenancing this Bourbon damnation. Such a course is enough to vomit the devil with disgust.

Let not the people of that party charge me with speaking plainly. I have said nothing half so severe as this. My residence is very near the line of Mississippi, and my commercial business largely within the territory of the sixth district; and I feel all the more personal as well as political interest, therefore, in the peace, quiet, and order of its people. I am almost as familiar with the business people of the sixth district of Mississippi as I am with those of my own; and wish here to put thus publicly on record what I know to be the views of the better classes, the old Henry Clay Whigs and the Douglas Democrats of that rich and productive district, but who have not now here any one to speak for them. These minority classes are made up largely of quiet, unobtrusive, debt-paying men, who are heart and soul opposed to the Bourbon bulldozing practices, but who, on account of their minority, and fear of violence from the irresponsible and lawless Bourbon majority, submit in silent acquiescence to what they in their hearts despise, simply because of their bodily fear, and because also of the danger to their property from these same pestilent law-breakers and disturbers of the public peace.

But the chief trouble with Democrats is that, although professing to favor law and order, they refuse to aid by their practice in sustaining it. If Republicans allude even amiably to kuklux outrages, they vociferously deny the existence of such an order, even though at the very moment the speakers themselves may be leaders of the gang.

Now, let it be borne in mind that the plaintiff, Mr. Chapline, is not a "Yankee," but a confederate soldier, who fought throughout the rebellion; a native of South Carolina, but who, after the termination of the war, removed to Arkansas with his family. He is an educated, intelligent man, and awaking to the belief that the Republican party promised more henceforth to benefit the country than the moribund Democracy, determined to run as a candidate on the Republican ticket, with what results let the accompanying official records show. I ask the Clerk to read the paper I send up.

The Clerk read as follows:

Circuit court, Monroe County, Ark.—J. B. Chapline, plff., vs. T. W. Hooper, deft. In matter of contest of election held in said county for county and probate judge.

Amended complaint.

The plaintiff, by way of amendment to the original complaint filed herein, by leave of the court first had and obtained, states:

I. That defendant, T. W. Hooper, since the filing of the original complaint has received his commission from the gov. of the State as probate and county judge of Monroe County, Arkansas, and has qualified as such judge and has been regularly inducted into said office.

II. Complainant further states that since the filing of the original complaint herein many evil-disposed persons, favoring the course of defendant, have resorted to unlawful and criminal measures for the purpose of intimidating complainant and forcing him to withdraw from this contest and the lawful assertion of his rights. That on the night of the 18th day of September, 1880, a coffin was placed by these evil-disposed persons in complainant's yard and marked thus: "J. B. Chapline, take timely warning. Thus to all damned rascals." That on the night of the 19th September, 1880, an armed mob of twelve men, with blackened faces or black masks over their faces, surrounded the house of Wm. H. Tugwell, one of the judges of the election in Jackson Township, Monroe County, Ark., who was then the lawful custodian of the duplicate tally-sheet and poll-book for that township, and by unlawful force and menace compelled the said Wm. H. Tugwell to surrender and give up to them the said tally-sheet and poll-book; that these unlawful acts have created much fear and alarm in the county of Monroe, and clearly indicate a secret, wide-spread conspiracy to deprive complainant of his lawful rights in defiance of law.

III. Premises considered, complainant prays that defendant's pretended election to the office of county and probate judge of Monroe County, Arkansas, be declared illegal, null and void; that his commission as such judge be declared null and void, and that it be canceled by decree of this honorable court and for nought held; that complainant be declared the duly-elected judge of the county and probate courts of Monroe County, Arkansas, and that a copy of the record in this case be certified to the gov. of the State, to the end that he may commission complainant as such judge, and for all such further relief as the nature of the case may require.

HENRY BATEMAN, J. P.

Mr. MOORE. And in speaking of "kuklux" I do not mean to assert that there is now in existence an organized band of them. On the contrary, I hope, for the honor of the South, that there is not; but if any Democrat in this House denies their existence in the last Presidential campaign, I ask only his attention to the court records of a Southern State, of ten witnesses, eight of them Democrats, in the bundle of testimony contained in this pile of papers now held in my hand, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD as an appendix hereto, and as occurring within the bounds of my own knowledge. I have no disposition (as I know Democrats will charge) to flaunt "the bloody shirt," alluded to by the honorable gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] on yesterday, but simply to let the country know what the kuklux Democrats are doing. Many good people far away from the scenes of these outrages cannot understand and are not prepared to realize the possibility of such a condition. I mention them, therefore, that the country may be authentically informed of the official facts.

Mississippi needs peace; she needs repose; she needs a new infusion of fresh enterprise, and this she will get whenever it is understood all over the country that a man is as much a man in that State as in any other part of the nation; that the laws there will jealously guard and protect him in all proper and just conduct, and when the right to vote and have it counted becomes in reality as well as now, in Bourbon phrase, "the right preservative of all rights." When this is done, then indeed may Mississippi expect to begin to bud and blossom as the rose.

But let it never be forgotten that there is no ray of hope for the prosperity of the State under Bourbon rule. That party presents no attractions or inducements to the men of business, the men of enterprise, the men of progress. It is a hinderance instead of help to all men who would go forward. Ever since it was driven ignominiously from power, more than twenty years ago, it has invented nothing, discovered nothing, and done nothing but hinder, and haggle, and obstruct. Without the wisdom or courage to devise or urge heroic measures to benefit and build up the nation, it has spent its feeble though malignant efforts to block the wheels of legislation, and thereby compel Republican consent to Bourbon measures to promote gigantic frauds like those here complained of. In Mississippi it has passed the election laws under which the present contestee has already fraudulently held not only two seats in this body, but is now here illegally and unblushingly claiming a third. In the language of another:

It has done these things in shameless violation of law, with no member representing the minority. In going through the form of appointing a nominal opponent, when they have the grace to even do that, they select some knave who will basely serve them or some idiot who cannot detect their misdeeds. The majority are scared off in some localities, obstructed by tricks in some, and counted out in others. If the crimes committed against the ballot-box are brought to the notice of grand juries all but the most flagrant offenses are ignored. The trial of those indicted is a mockery. Their accomplices and friends sit on the jury and listen to what they know is flat perjury from others of the party. Pleas of guilty are made in Federal courts on the supposition (afterward sustained) that fines will be nominal.

Now, mind you, this is not mine nor that of any other Republican, but the vigorous and earnest language of a Mississippi Democrat who has become tired of the "Mississippi plan" and desires to have it squelched. There are in the United States according to the census reports 6,580,793 colored persons, each of whom under our Constitution is as much a citizen and equally entitled to the rights thereof as any other class within its jurisdiction. Have they even one Representative upon this floor to speak for them? They constitute about one-eighth of our entire population, and yet while, if divided according to numbers, they would have about thirty-six members in this House, now they have not a single Representative save and except the worthy though solitary contestant whom our Bourbon friends in their magnanimity are now trying to bar out only because of his tinted skin and that he votes the Republican ticket. They bring no charges against his character, except that his father is said to have been a white Democrat, and I am sure we can trust to the generosity of gentlemen on the other side to forgive that; everybody says he is a worthy man; even the gentleman employed to defend the contestee admits this. Only a few days ago, before the Elections Committee of this House, Hon. Casey Young, my Democratic predecessor, in an able argument for the contestee, said:

I will say for the contestant that his presentation of his own case before this committee on yesterday was so forcible, able, and admirable that if the argument had then closed without opportunity for reply on our side he would have gained an easy victory. I will say further for Mr. Lynch, from what I know of him and what I have heard, that in point of intelligence, character, honesty of purpose, and mental caliber he is, without a doubt, the foremost man of his race in this country.

Only listen: "in point of intelligence, character, honesty of purpose, and mental caliber, he is, without a doubt, the foremost man of his race in this country." Then why not give him his seat? The only answer is, and be it spoken to the eternal shame of Democracy, he is a man of color!

Sir, if there should happen to be upon the other side of this Chamber any incipient or embryotic candidates for President of the United States, let them pause and weigh well the consequences before casting their votes to keep this lawfully elected contestant out of the seat to which he is fairly entitled. For 1,100,000 colored voters at the next Presidential election will not likely forget or forgive the men who can so far outrage the rights of freemen as to place themselves upon record as enemies of the very fundamental principles of free government. And in this connection it will be interesting to note the remarks made by a distinguished Mississippi Senator [Mr. GEORGE] in the United States Senate on the 6th instant.

In a discussion of the Chinese question, he asserted that "the time may come—it is not here now—when the relations of another race [meaning the negro] to American citizenship must be discussed," &c.; and when he asserted, substantially, the old proslavery dogma that the Government was made by white men only for white men. Now, in view of the high official position of the honorable gentleman, and of the fact that he is credited with being the original author of the "Mississippi plan," and that a large majority of the lawful citizens of his State are now composed of the class for whom the "relations" of citizenship "must be discussed," it becomes a matter of gravest moment to the whole country, the disposition he proposes to make of this six and a half million colored people. Mr. Speaker, if I could catch the ear of her bulldozed people I would say to them, throw off your Bourbon shackles and plunge with us into the resistless current of progress, which is now rapidly carrying our beloved country to heights of grandeur that eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither hath it entered into the heart of any Democrat to conceive of.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the remedy for this disgraceful condition of things lies in a public sentiment behind these minority classes that will embolden them to openly assert their rights, and to create this public sentiment I believe it to be the duty of the great Republican party, beginning with the President of the United States, to so shape the national policy and appointments that these honest, hard-working, debt-paying classes may be so protected in their principles, their persons, and their property as that they shall be made unmistakably to see that their every business and political interest is legitimately identified with this great party of fair play and progress—the only party that offers any future, especially to the ambitious and rising younger men of the nation. Send them not only sympathy but substantial assistance.

The Bourbon Democracy offers absolutely nothing to the aspiring men, the live men of Mississippi and the nation. They are simply, to put it as mildly as possible, a party of negation.

They opposed the nationality of the country; they opposed the emancipation of the slaves; they opposed each and all the amendments to the Constitution; they opposed the suppression of the Ku-klux Klan; they opposed first the casting and then the counting of honest, legal votes; they opposed the suppression of polygamy and polygamists; they opposed first the substitution of the present wise for the pernicious old "wild-cat" system of money; and they are now opposing, with whatever bull-headed blindness and stolidity they can combine, all efforts to continue the wholesome existing system of national banking in the hope of reinstating the old and repudiated State-bank system, which rendered it necessary for every man to travel constantly with a counterfeit detector in his pocket. They opposed a national system of education for the ignorant, fearing that thereby the poor negroes might receive a passing proportional benefit. In short, they have ever opposed each and all measures tending in any way to elevate, ennoble, and magnify the greatness, glory, and credit of our nation. God forgive them, for they have not the ability to comprehend the magnitude and splendor of their wicked stupidity.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I shall make no appeal to the honorable and respected gray-beards, the Ephraims on the other side of this Chamber, because they are already inextricably chained to the mummied and moss-grown idol of Bourbon prejudice; but to the younger members on that side, and generally to the young men of the nation, whose blood flows warm within, and to whom hope, with her taper finger, now stands temptingly beckoning, I would plead to shun, to avoid, to flee from this repulsive party, this party which, if it does not openly advocate, at least secretly connives at, the perpetration of those monstrous crimes that so shamefully characterize this case, and so seriously smirch the good name of Mississippi and the new South; a party whose watchword is obstruction, whose policy is opposition, and whose practice is continued resistance to progress; a party whose touch is contamination and whose principles are poison; a party whose mole-like eyes are firmly set in the back of its head; whose wasted time is dedicated to the memory of the repudiated resolutions of 1798; whose antediluvian and sluggish thoughts are ever groping amid the decayed political ruins of the long-forgotten past, and whose whole existence is sorrowfully spent in vain and futile efforts to resurrect the fossiliferous remains of the paleozoic period. [Applause and laughter.]

APPENDIX.

State of Arkansas, county of Monroe.—J. B. Chapline, plf., vs. T. W. Hooper, deft.

Depositions before R. C. Lanford, J. P., in the matters of contested election.

The deposition of W. S. Dunlap, taken in the town of Clarendon, on 21st day of September, 1880, at the office of the circuit and county clerk, in said town, to be read as evidence in the action pending between J. B. Chapline as plff. and T. W. Hooper, defendant, in the circuit court of Monroe County, Ark., at the next term thereof after this date:

My name is W. S. Dunlap. I live in Monroe County, Arkansas. I am 46 years of age. I am clerk of the probate and county courts of said county. I received the returns of the election from Jackson Township on evening of the 8th of Sept., about two or three o'clock, from W. C. Swift, who was one of the judges of the election of that township, (Jackson,) which was held on the 6th of Sept., 1880. There was no tally-sheet returned from that township by said Swift or any one else. According to these returns T. W. Hooper received 109 votes for the office of county and probate judge of the county of Monroe and State of Arkansas, and J. B. Chapline received 94 votes for the same office.

My occupation as clerk of circuit and courts gives me opportunities to be familiar with the handwriting of the majority of men with whom I transact business in this county. I recognize very readily the handwriting of prominent business men of the county. I am acquainted with the handwriting of many different persons in the county. I have examined the figures indicating the total votes received by plaintiff and defendant in Jackson Township, and I find them in a different handwriting from that in which the poll-books were made out, and the ink appeared to be a little darker from that which the poll-books were made with. Upon examination of the poll-books evidence of erasure at the point in the poll-books indicating the votes received by plaintiff and defendant in that township; by holding the paper up before the light I can see that the paper is very much thinner at the point indicating the total vote received by the plff. and the deft. in that township. I do not believe that it would require the experience of an expert to discover that fact.

The poll-books were in this condition when they came into my possession. The total vote received by the plaintiff, J. B. Chaplain, for the office of county and probate judge, as shown by the election returns in my office, is nine hundred and forty-five, and the total vote received by the defendant, T. W. Hooper, as shown by the returns in my office, is nine hundred and fifty-six. Upon the assumption that the plf., J. B. Chaplain, received one hundred and seven votes in Jackson Township, and the deft., Hooper, only ninety-six in the same township, Chaplain would have a majority of thirteen. The defendant, T. W. Hooper, has received his commission as county and probate judge of Monroe County, Ark., and he has been qualified and inducted into office. I have the returns from Duncan Township in my possession also. The returns from Duncan Township are only signed by two of the judges, and the judges make the following statements "under the head of remarks on the poll-books:" "there were found six more tickets in the ballot-box than the total on the poll-books. Seven tickets were not numbered." I have evidence that these unnumbered votes were counted for State officers, but I cannot say whether they were counted for plaintiff or defendant, or not. This evidence I give from the poll-books. As shown by the returns, the plaintiff received two hundred and two votes in Duncan Township and the defendant received one hundred and fifty-six votes in the same township.

The poll-books from this (Duncan) township were signed by only two of the judges of the election in that precinct. But the judges in that township all signed the poll-books as to the total number of votes cast, and only two of the judges certified as to the number of votes cast for all of the candidates. From the poll-books from that township it is evident that six of the unnumbered votes were counted for the State officers, but the poll-books give no evidence that they were or were not counted in the election between the plff. and the deft.

W. S. DUNLAP.

I, R. C. Lanford, a justice of the peace in and for the county of Monroe, do certify that the foregoing deposition of W. S. Dunlap was taken before me and was read to and subscribed by him in my presence at the time and place and in the action mentioned in the caption; the said W. S. Dunlap having been by me first sworn that the evidence he should give in the action should be the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, and his statement reduced to writing by me in his presence; the attorney for plaintiff being present, and the defendant being absent in person and by attorney.

Given under my hand this the 20th day of September, 1880.

J. B. Chaplain vs. T. W. Hooper. Depositions. Filed Sept. 25th, 1880. W. L. Dunlap, clerk. J. B. Chapline, by John Hallum, his att'y.

In the circuit court of Monroe County, Arkansas—J. B. Chapline vs. T. W. Hooper.

In matters of contested elections for county and probate judge.

To T. W. Hooper, defendant in the above-styled cause:

Take notice, that I will, on Thursday, the 23d day of September, 1880, at the store-house of Jacob Johnson, in the town of Holly Grove, Monroe County, Arkansas, within legal hours, proceed to take the depositions of John Johnson and others, before R. C. Lanford or some other officer authorized to administer oaths, to be read as evidence in behalf of the plaintiff on the trial of the above-styled cause, when and where you may attend and cross-examine if you choose to do so. This Sept. 21st, 1880.

All of the witnesses are staunch Democrats, except J. K. Whitson and Augustine D. Bury.

JOHN HALLUM.

State of Arkansas, county of Monroe.—J. B. Chaplain, plff. vs. T. W. Hooper, deft.

In the Circuit Court of Monroe County, in the matter of contested election for county and probate judge.

The deposition of J. L. Johnson, Augustus D. Berry, and C. C. Herring, taken on the 23d day of September, 1880, at the store of J. L. Johnson, in the town Holly Grove, to be read as evidence in an action between J. B. Chaplain, plff., and T. W. Hooper, deft., pending in the circuit court of Monroe County, Arkansas.

The witness, J. L. Johnson, after being duly sworn, deposes and says as follows, to wit:

My name is J. L. Johnson. I am thirty-three years old. I live in Holly Grove, Monroe County, Ark. I am a Democrat, and have been all of my life. I never voted any other but a Democratic ticket. I was one of the judges of the late election held in Duncan Township, in Monroe County, Ark., on the 6th of September, 1880, and I acted as such judge in that election. The other judges were James A. Coak and J. W. Kelly. The clerks were C. C. Herring and A. K. Roberts.

The next morning W. M. Walkup was appointed clerk pro tem. in the place of Roberts, to finish counting the ballots, which amounted to 81 votes that were then in the box.

The polls were opened at the usual hour, and the voting continued until the noon recess for dinner. When we adjourned for dinner it was a matter of discussion between us as to where the ballot-box should remain while we were gone to dinner. I was in favor of it remaining at the place of voting, and one of the clerks was in favor of it remaining at the same place, but we were overruled by the other judges. I went to dinner and left the ballot-box in charge of the other two judges. We were gone to dinner about one hour, when we returned to the place of voting; and up to the time of closing the polls three hundred and fifty-nine (359) votes were cast. The ballots were handed to me and I folded them, called the name of the voter, and handed them to the next judge, T. A. Coak, who numbered them and called the numbers, and he passed them to Mr. Kelly, the other judge, and he deposited them in the ballot-box.

I know that every vote cast on that day was numbered, and I know that three hundred and fifty-nine is all that was cast. Mr. Coak, one of the judges, had charge of the key to the ballot-box all day. He locked the ballot-box in the morning before the voting commenced, and put the key in his pocket, and when we went to count the votes he handed the key to me to unlock the box, and I found the box already unlocked; but when, where, or by whom unlocked I can't say.

I took the tickets out of the box as we counted them. I commenced taking them out from the top, and took them out just as I came to them. The first vote I took out was numbered, and out of the first ten tickets counted out of ballot-box and taken from the top, seven of them were not numbered, and I called the attention of the other judges to the fact that the box was unlocked and seven tickets not numbered. When this irregularity was discovered by me we suspended the count for about half an hour. We then got into a dispute about the matter, and I charged that the ballot-box had been stuffed, and Kelly got mad, because he had been in charge of the ballot-box, and I suppose he considered it a reflection on him. These unnumbered tickets were Democratic tickets. These seven unnumbered ballots were all straight Democratic tickets, and they were all cast for the defendant in this cause, (T. W. Hooper,) and they were counted for him at that time. After the votes were all counted out I went out to attend to some private business. This was from about ten o'clock a. m. on the day after the election, until about five or six o'clock p. m. of the same day; and Mr. Coak, one of the judges, came after me to go and sign the poll books. I went with him and examined the poll books, and declined to sign them, for the reason that I knew the fraud related above had been perpetrated, and I did not know to what extent the fraud had been practiced, and I was unwilling to sign any name to anything that was fraudulent.

The Democratic tickets were of two kinds; one kind was on thick white paper, and the other was on rather cream-colored paper, and thinner than the others. The Republican tickets were also printed on two kinds of paper, as follows: one kind was on blue paper, and the other was on the cream-colored paper, like the Democratic tickets alluded to above. I don't know who delivered the poll-books to the clerk. I had nothing to do with that part of it. And further the deponent saveth not.

J. L. JOHNSON.

Augustus D. Berry, being duly sworn, deposes and says:

My name is Augustus D. Berry. I am fifty-five years old. I am a qualified voter, and I reside in Duncan Township, Monroe County, Arkansas. I was in the town of Holly Grove in said township, county, and State on the 6th of September, 1880, and voted in the State and county election held on that day, and I was in town on the day after the election when the judges were completing the count of the ballots; and Mr. J. R. Whitson, the Republican candidate for Representative was also present; and there were seven Democratic tickets in the ballot-box that were not numbered, and Mr. Whitson protested against them being counted, saying to the judges that the unnumbered tickets were illegal; that the election law required every ticket to be numbered. The judges, Coat and Kelly, replied to Mr. Whitson that they would count them. The unnumbered ballots were counted for T. W. Hooper, the Democratic candidate for county and probate judge, and Mr. Johnson, the other judge, refused to sign the poll-books.

JOHN HALLUN.

C. C. Herring, being duly sworn, deposes as follows:

My name is C. C. Herring. I am thirty-nine years old. I live in the town of Holly Grove, Duncan Township, Monroe County, Arkansas, and I was one of the clerks of the election held here on the 6th of September, 1880, for State and county officers. When the ballots were being counted seven unnumbered ballots were found in the ballot-box. They were counted, and the fact of their being unnumbered was written on the poll-books. I heard Mr. Whitson, the Republican candidate for Representative, protest against those unnumbered ballots being counted, and his protest was disregarded. I do not remember whether those unnumbered tickets were Democratic or not. I was sworn as a clerk of the election to record the names of the voters as their ballots were handed in, and I always do my duty as near as I can, and I did record all of the ballots as they were handed in. I don't know how those unnumbered ballots got in the box. I remember that there was three hundred and fifty-nine (359) ballots deposited that were recorded and that there was six (6) more ballots found in the ballot-box that were not recorded.

C. C. HERRING.

STATE OF ARKANSAS, County of Monroe:

I, R. C. Lanford, a justice of the peace for Monroe County, do certify that the foregoing depositions of J. L. Johnson, Augustus D. Berry, and C. C. Herring were taken before me and were read to and subscribed by them in my presence at the time and in the action mentioned in the caption, the said J. L. Johnson, Augustus D. Berry, and C. C. Herring having been first sworn by me that the evidence that they should give in this action should be the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, and their statements reduced to writing by me in their presence, the attorney for plaintiff and the deponents being present at the examination.

Given under my hand this the 23d day of September, 1880.

R. C. LANFORD, J. P.

Summons.—Action by ordinary proceeding.

The State of Arkansas to the sheriff of Monroe County:

You are commanded to summon T. W. Hooper to answer on the 1st day of the next September term of the Monroe circuit court a complaint filed against him in said court by J. B. Chapline, and warn him that upon his failure to answer the complaint will be taken for confessed; and you will make due return of the summons on the 1st day of the next September term of said court.

Witness my hand and the seal of said court this 15th day of September, 1880.

W. S. DUNLAP, Clerk.

CLARENDON, ARK., Sept. 15th, 1880.

I hereby deputize H. B. Bateman to serve the within summons.

A. McMURTRY, Sheriff.

STATE OF ARKANSAS, County of Monroe:

I hereby certify that I have, on this the 15th day of September, 1880, duly served the within by leaving a true and correct copy of the within with Mrs. T. W. Hooper, wife of the said T. W. Hooper.

A. McMURTRY, Sheriff,
By HENRY B. BATEMAN,
Special Deputy.

STATE OF ARKANSAS, County of Monroe, ss:

We, W. H. Tugwell, Nellie Tugwell, his wife, James Tugwell, John Tugwell, L. A. A. Doherty, G. W. L. Kanawah, and John Arthur Wilhite, do severally swear that on this Friday night, Sept. 17th, 1880, we severally and jointly counted the votes as marked on the tally-sheet of the poll-books of the election for State and county officers held in Jackson Township, in Monroe County, Arkansas, on the 6th day of September, 1880, at the house of W. H. Tugwell, on the day and at the time first above written, and we each solemnly swear that said tally-sheet showed at that time that W. M. Mayo, candidate for State representative from said Monroe County, received at said election one hundred and thirteen votes, and that J. K. Whitson, candidate for the same office, received ninety-five votes; and that T. W. Hooper, candidate for county and probate judge of said county, received at said election ninety-six votes, and that J. B. Chapline, candidate for the same office of county and probate judge, received one hundred and seven votes at said election; and that in comparing said votes as specified in detail with the total votes as recorded in said poll-books and as certified to by the several officers of said election showed that W. M. Mayo, candidate for representative in the State Legislature from said county, received one hundred and thirteen votes at said election, and that J. K. Whitson, candidate for the same office, received ninety-five votes at said election; and that T. W. Hooper, candidate for county and probate judge of said Monroe County, received ninety-six votes at said election, and that J. B. Chapline, candidate for the said office of county and probate judge, received one hundred and seven votes at said election, as was and is shown by the poll-books in the footings of the votes cast for each of said candidates for each of said offices, and that at the time of this comparison and examination said tally-sheet did not show any scratches or erasures in any of the tallies marked thereon, which tallies were footed up in lead-pencil on said tally-sheet.

That the footings on said tally-sheet marked in lead-pencil shows that in the vote for county judge the figures 107 were written over the figures 100. In the footing of the votes cast for J. B. Chapline for that office, when we severally and jointly counted the votes for said Chapline for said office of county judge, the tally showed that one hundred and seven were the proper figures; that in the footings in the poll-books for the several candidates voted for on that day at that election they, the footings, were all in figures, and that none of the figures for any of said offices were scratched, interlined, obliterated, blurred, or written over in any manner whatever, and said footings in said poll-books were all in ink, and were, or appeared to be, duly certified to by the officers of said election.

In witness whereof we have each hereunto severally set our respective hands and seals the day and year first above written.

P. W. FOSTER, J. P.

MONROE COUNTY, Arkansas:

I, P. W. Foster, a duly qualified and active justice of the peace, in and for Monroe County, and State of Ark., do hereby certify that I have this day counted the votes for W. M. Mayo, candidate for representative in the Legislature of said State for said county, and the tally-sheet shows that he received one hundred and thirteen votes for said office at the election held in said county in Jackson Township on the 6th day of Sept., 1880, and that J. K. Whitson received ninety-five votes for the same office at said election; and that T. W. Hooper, candidate for the office of county and probate judge of said county, received ninety-six votes, and that J. B. Chapline, candidate for said office of county and probate judge, received one hundred and seven votes, as shown by the tally on said tally-sheet, which votes I severally counted.

And I also certify that the poll-books showed that the totals of the votes for each of said offices, candidates for each of said offices, were as follows: W. M. Mayo, one hundred and thirteen votes; J. K. Whitson, ninety-five votes; J. W. Hooper, ninety-six votes, and J. B. Chapline, one hundred and seven votes, and that each of said totals in said poll-book were written in figures and were not blurred, interlined, erased, or written over in any manner whatever. In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and seal this seventeenth day of September, 1880.

P. W. FOSTER, J. P.

Monroe circuit court, September term, 1880.—J. B. Chapline, plff., vs. T. W. Hooper, deft. Complaint at law.

J. B. Chapline complains of T. W. Hooper and allies; that he is a citizen of the United States and of the State of Arkansas, and for five years last past has been a resident and citizen of Monroe County, in the State of Arkansas; that he is more than twenty-five years of age, a man of upright character, of good business education, and a resident of the State of Arkansas on the 6th day of September, 1880, and for more than two consecutive years prior to said 6th day of September, 1880, and a resident of Monroe County for said time last mentioned; that on the 6th day of Sept., 1880, in the State of Arkansas there was held a State, county, and township election, and at said election J. B. Chapline, the plaintiff, and T. W. Hooper, the defendant, were both candidates for county and probate judge for the county of Monroe, in the State of Arkansas, at the election held according to law on the 6th day of September, 1880, to which office some one was by law elected to fill; that at said election, in the township of Montgomery, J. B. Chapline received for the office of county and probate judge for Monroe County, Arkansas, two hundred and thirty-nine (239) legal votes and T. W. Hooper received ninety-nine (99) legal votes, and the same was so counted and returned by the judges of election; that at said election J. B. Chapline received for the office of county and probate judge for Monroe County, in the State of Ark., in the township of Cache, in said county, one hundred and twenty-nine (129) legal votes and T. W. Hooper received for the same office one hundred and fifty-four (154) legal votes, and the same were counted and returned by the judges of said election; that at said election in the township of Pine Ridge, J. B. Chapline received for the office of county and probate judge for Monroe County, in the State of Arkansas, thirty (30) legal votes, and T. W. Hooper received for the same office one hundred and twenty (120) legal votes, and the same were so counted and returned by the judges of said election; that at said election, in the township of Cypress Ridge, in said county, the plaintiff, J. B. Chapline, received for the office of county and probate judge for the county of Monroe, in the State of Arkansas, seventeen (17) legal votes, and said defendant, T. W. Hooper, received for the same office forty-five (45) legal votes, all of which were counted and returned by the judges of said election; that at said election, in the township of Brinkley, in said county, the plaintiff, J. B. Chapline, received for the office of county and probate judge of Monroe County, in the State of Arkansas, one hundred and forty-four (144) legal votes, and T. W. Hooper received for the same office one hundred and sixty-one (161) legal votes, all of which were counted and returned by the judges of said election; that in the township of Richland, in said county, J. B. Chapline received for the office of county and probate judge for the county of Monroe, in the State of Arkansas, ninety (90) legal votes, and T. W. Hooper, defendant, received for the said office one hundred and twelve votes, all of which were counted and returned by the judges of said election; that at said election, held in the township of Duncan, in said county, the plaintiff, J. B. Chapline, received for the office of county and probate judge for Monroe County, in the State of Arkansas, two hundred and sixty legal votes, and said defendant, T. W. Hooper, received for said office (99) ninety-nine legal votes.

Notwithstanding that the plaintiff received one hundred and sixty-one more legal votes than defendant in said Duncan Township, still two of the judges of said election took the ballot-box away from the place of voting twice during the day of said election, and fraudulently and illegally took out or permitted some one else to take out of the ballot-box fifty-eight (58) legal votes cast for said J. B. Chapline, and substituted therefor fifty-eight ballots that were never cast for T. W. Hooper. And after said fraudulent change was made, said judges of election counted the ballots and declared that said J. B. Chapline received two hundred and two (202) legal votes for the office of county and probate judge for said county, and T. W. Hooper received one hundred and fifty-six legal votes; whereas in truth and in fact two hundred and sixty (260) legal voters cast their votes for said J. B. Chapline for the office of county and probate judge, and only ninety-nine (99) legal voters cast their votes for T. W. Hooper for said office. Said fraud was so apparent that one of the three judges told, in substance, the said judges of election that the ballot had been changed, that the unnumbered ballots and the ballots numbered on this white paper were ballots that were never voted, and he refused to sign the election returns on account of said fraud. The law requires each ballot to be numbered and the party that changed said ballots failed to number seven of the ballots put into the ballot-box as a substitute for the ballots actually voted by the voters of said township, and the remainder of the ballots substituted were upon thin white paper, different from any ballots that were voted at said precinct. Said party also put into the ballot-box six more ballots than were voted, and the judges of election, or a majority of them, counted for the State officers six more ballots than were voted. All of which action in changing ballots and counting the substituted ballots was illegal and a fraud upon the rights of the plaintiff as well as upon the rights of the legal voters of Monroe County.

That at said election in the township of Jackson in said county there were one hundred and seven legal votes cast for said plaintiff, J. B. Chapline, for said office of county and probate judge for Monroe County, Arkansas; and for said T. W. Hooper, for the same office, ninety-six legal votes were cast, and the votes were so counted and announced by the judges and clerks of said election before they dispersed from the place of voting; but after said votes had been so announced one of the judges took the ballots and returns to the county seat of said county and kept it there until all the rest of the county could be heard from, and when all the county was heard from it was found that the frauds in Duncan Township were not sufficient to defeat complainant, so said judge changed or permitted to be changed said returns so as to make it appear that complainant only received ninety-four votes and T. W. Hooper received one hundred and nine votes; whereas in truth and in fact J. B. Chapline received one hundred and seven votes and T. W. Hooper only received ninety-six votes. The returns from Jackson Township show upon their face that they have been "doctored." The clerk of the county, who was in collusion with these fraudulent transactions, neglected to summons the judges of election for Duncan and Jackson Townships to explain the changes and discrepancies in their return, but went ahead and canvassed the same as fraudulently changed and returned and declared that T. W. Hooper had a majority of eleven votes for the office of county and probate judge, whereas in truth and in fact J. B. Chaplaine received for said office one thousand and sixteen legal votes and T. W. Hooper received only eight hundred and six legal votes for said office, which gave J. B. Chapline, the plaintiff, a majority of one hundred and thirty legal votes for said office; so he says by law he is entitled to the office of county and probate judge for the county of Monroe, in the State of Arkansas; and he brings this his action to recover the same.

Wherefore he prays judgment of austere against T. W. Hooper, and that J. B. Chapline, complainant, was elected and is entitled to the office of county and probate judge for Monroe County, in the State of Arkansas, and for damages to the amount of the salary that T. W. Hooper may receive up to the day of trial, and for all other proper relief.

W. S. DUNLAP, Clerk.

State of Arkansas, County of Monroe.—J. B. Chapline, plff., vs. T. W. Hooper, deft.

In the circuit court of Monroe County. In the matter of contested election for the office of county and probate judge.

The depositions of J. R. Whitson, Calvin Green, and Charles Smith, taken on the 25th day of September, 1880, at the store-house of J. B. Chapline, in the county of Monroe, Ark., to be read as evidence in an action between J. B. Chapline, plaintiff, and T. W. Hooper, deft., pending in the circuit court of Monroe County, Arkansas. The witness, J. R. Whitson, after being duly sworn, deposes and says as follows, to wit:

My name is J. R. Whitson. I am forty-four years old. I live in Brinkley Township, Monroe County, Arkansas. I was the Republican candidate for the office of representative from Monroe County, in the State and county election which was held in said county on the 6th day of September, 1880. I was also the Republican candidate in said county two years previous for the same office, and believing that fraud had been perpetrated against me at that election, two years ago, in Duncan Township, in said county, I determined to be present at the election in said Duncan Township, held on the said 6th day of September, A. D. 1880, and accordingly was at the place of voting in said township at said last mentioned time before any votes had been polled; and myself and two friends of mine kept an account of the blue tickets that were voted that day at that Duncan Township; said blue tickets were all Republican tickets, of which the following is a true copy of the printed letters and words on said ticket: [ticket not furnished:] and according to said account there was two hundred and fifty of said blue Republican tickets voted at said precinct on said last election.

There was, in addition to the above-described blue tickets, a number of Republican tickets voted at said precinct on said day, of which the following is a facsimile of all the printed letters and words on said ticket: [ticket omitted:] but no account was taken of the number of said last-described white Republican tickets that were voted that day at said precinct.

There was 359 votes cast at said election in said township; of this number I observed but two different prints being voted by the Democrats—one on yellow, cream, or buff colored paper, and the other on thick white paper, some one-half inch wider than the white Republican ticket, pasted on this sheet above.

The judges closed the polls at sundown, certified to the number of votes cast, and went to Jacob Johnson's for supper, and returned to the place of voting after about one hour's absence. Then the key to said box was handed to Mr. Jacob Johnson, one of the judges, by one of the other judges, whereupon he put the key in the key-hole to said ballot-box and turned it, and then tried to open it, but found that he could not do so until he turned the key back as it was when first inserted, when the box-lid was raised without any further trouble, and he began to take the tickets out of the box one by one, and called off the names on each that had been voted for the various offices, and handed them to Mr. Coak, who handed them to Mr. Kelly, who strung each ticket as it was handed him, and as the tickets were thus called off the two clerks, Mr. Herring and Roberts, recorded one mark on each tally-sheet opposite each as it was announced by the judge, and when about ten or fifteen tickets had been thus announced and recorded, Mr. Johnson remarked that there was a lot of tickets he had just called off that had never been voted, assigning as a reason of said conclusion that he would swear that each ticket that had been voted that day had been numbered, but that there was no sign of any numbers on the back of those tickets just referred to.

I then requested the judges to let me count said unnumbered tickets; and as there was no objection Mr. Kelly laid the bunch on the table, when I counted, in presence of the three judges and clerks and several bystanders then present, just seven unnumbered straight Democratic tickets printed on yellow, cream, or buff colored paper, without a single printed name on said ticket being erased or scratched. Mr. T. W. Hooper's name was on each of said tickets and was scored seven times by each clerk, for the office of probate and county judge, as said tickets was called off by the judge; and notwithstanding my earnest appeals to said judges not to count tickets that they knew had not been voted, yet, nevertheless, these unnumbered tickets were each counted, and by two of the judges were certified up to the clerk as having been cast for the various names thereon, amongst which was the name of the said T. W. Hooper, defendant herein, for the office of probate and county judge, (see poll-books on file in clerk's office, wherein said two judges, Kelly and Coak, certified that the said T. W. Hooper had received one hundred and fifty-six votes;) whereas had they counted only such tickets as had been numbered, they would have been compelled to certify that the said defendant had only received one hundred and forty-nine votes. The following is a fac-simile of the printed letters and words on said unnumbered tickets: [Ticket not furnished.]

The count then proceeded, and occasionally Mr. Johnson would call out the number on the back of certain Democratic tickets, printed on very thin white paper, and would set the number down on paper and remark that he wanted to see who that fellow was who voted "against license;" and as these numbers were called out I observed numbers that were down below number twenty called out before fifty votes had been counted, and numbers over three hundred were found down in the bottom of the box, and less than two hundred of the blue tickets were found in, and counted out of, said box.

J. R. WHITSON.

Calvin Green, being duly sworn, deposes and testifies as follows, to wit:

My name is Calvin Green; I am thirty-one years old; I am a legal voter of Cache Township, Monroe County, Arkansas. On Sunday morning, the 19th day of September, 1880, I was at the plaintiff's house, and I saw in front of the plaintiff's residence a coffin with a paper pinned on it, which had written on the as follows, to wit: "J. B. Chapline take timely warning; thus to all damned rascals." I think I have seen the same coffin in Clarendon before that time, under B. F. Johnson's store. I know that a similar looking coffin remained under the said store for several months previous. Myself and others tracked the vehicle which was supposed to have brought the coffin to plaintiff's house very early on that morning while the dew was yet on the sand and dust in the road, and at that time only two vehicles had passed over the road from Clarendon; one was a buggy going into Clarendon and the other was the mail hack coming out. I carefully measured the track of wagon or vehicle, and noticed very carefully the tracks of the horses attached thereto.

The tracks of the horses were plainly seen and easily recognized. One of the horses made a track a good deal larger than the other; one of the horses made a small round track, the other track was larger, and easily traced and recognized by a kind of scrape or scratch with one of his feet. We traced the track of the wagon and team from plaintiff's house to the lot of Parker C. Ewan, in Clarendon. We measured the track of the wagon-tire and the track of the horses' feet before we left the plaintiff's house, and after tracing them to Ewing's lot we measured the tire of the wagon and feet of the horses, and the measurements all corresponded exactly. We traced the tracks until we found the wagon in Ewing's lot, and saw the tracks of the horses where they had been taken from wagon. The tracks of the horses corresponded with the tracks made by the horses that drew the wagon to and from plaintiff's yard. It was a two-horse wagon. Ed. Lenox, and James Lenox, and Mr. Charles Smith were with me and assisted me in tracing the wagon and team and measuring the tracks. This examination was made at the time, and at the request of the plaintiff, J. B. Chaplain. I suppose there were as many as one hundred persons examined the coffin that day. There was considerable excitement in the neighborhood in regard to it.

By JOHN HALLUM, His Atty.

In the circuit court of Monroe County, Arkansas—J. B. Chapline vs. T. W. Hooper.

In the matter of contested election for county and probate judge of said Monroe County.

The depositions of W. H. Lugwell and Dr. L. A. A. Doberty and G. W. L. Kanawah, taken in pursuance of the notice hereunto attached, and to be read or used in evidence in the circuit court of Monroe County, Arkansas, at its ensuing October term in an action to contest the election of county and probate judge, held on the 6th day of September, 1880, wherein J. B. Chapline is plaintiff or contestant and T. W. Hooper is defendant, on behalf of said plaintiff, on this 20th day of Sept., at the office of P. W. Foster, a justice of the peace, in Jackson Township, Monroe County, Arkansas:

G. W. L. Kanawah, being duly sworn, deposes as follows: I am 34 years of age; my name is G. W. L. Kanawah; I live in Jackson Township, Monroe County, and State of Arkansas; I was a resident of said township on the 6th day of September, 1880, and acted as one of the clerks of an election held in said township on said 6th day of Sept., 1880, for State and county officers; Rome Cleere acted as the other clerk, and W. H. Lugwell, W. C. Swift, and Richard Miles acted as the judges of said election.

That after the polls at said election were closed deponent proceeded to foot up the tally-sheet kept by him, and Mr. Cleere, the other clerk, proceeded to foot up the tally-sheet kept by him.

That the tally-sheet kept by this deponent showed that at said election T. W. Hooper, candidate for the office of probate and county judge of said county, received ninety-six votes in said township, and that J. B. Chapline, candidate for the same office, received at said election in said township one hundred and seven (107) votes.

That deponent thereupon wrote in the margin of the tally-sheet kept by him, opposite the names of said candidates, in figures, the number of votes cast for each of said candidates as aforesaid, T. W. Hooper having received at said election for said office ninety-six votes and J. B. Chaplain received one hundred and seven votes at said election.

That said figures and tallies were in ink. That after deponent had footed up the tallies kept by him Mr. Cleere, the other clerk, requested deponent to finish footing up the tallies on the sheet kept by him, and to look over his footings as far as made and see if they were correct, as his eyes were weak and he could not finish the footings. Deponent did as requested by said Cleere, and proceeded to finish making the footings on the sheet of tallies kept by said Cleere, and in reviewing the footings on said sheet kept by said Cleere deponent found that said Cleere had only footed up one hundred (100) votes for said J. B. Chapline for said office, while his footings for T. W. Hooper for said office were ninety-six, the same as on the sheet kept by this deponent, making a discrepancy in footings on the respective tally-sheets of said poll of seven votes for J. B. Chapline. Thereupon deponent called the attention of said Cleere and also of W. H. Tugwell, one of the judges aforesaid, to the discrepancy between said footings in the respective tally-sheets; whereupon deponent, in the presence of said Cleere and said judge, compared the tallies as found on each of said sheets, and the tallies on the sheet kept by said Cleere showed that J. B. Chapline had received one hundred and seven votes for said office, instead of one hundred votes, and the discrepancy was owing to an error in the footings as made by said Cleere, and not one of a discrepancy in the tallies; whereupon deponent, in the presence of said clerk and said judge, wrote the figure (7) seven over the last cipher in the number (100) one hundred, which was mutually agreed was the correct number of votes cast for said Chapline. Thereupon both tally-sheets showed that the true number of votes cast at said election for said candidates for said office were ninety-six for Hooper and one hundred and seven for J. B. Chapline.

That the footings made by Clure on his tally-sheet were made in lead pencil and not in ink, and that in the correction of said footings as aforesaid, instead of erasing or rubbing out the cipher in units place in the number (100) one hundred, deponent simply made the (7) seven over the cipher. That the tally-sheet kept by deponent and the footing thereof were made in ink taken out of the same bottle, and was a part of the same ink as is used in writing this deposition, and that in addition to said tally-sheets being ruled horizontally, they were also ruled perpendicular, and after light rulings perpendicularly for twenty five tallies, there were heavy perpendicular lines, and that by some attention to keeping the tallies in the ruled spaces (perpendicular spaces I mean) it was an easy matter to foot up the tallies by twenty-fives. That deponent kept the tallies of twenty-fives within said heavy perpendicular lines, and none of said tallies of twenty-fives overrun said heavy perpendicular lines, while the tallies kept by Mr. Clure were kept in an irregular manner without any special reference to the perpendicular lines of his tally-sheet, and were in a pale and watery ink. That neither of said tally-sheets were scratched in any manner whatever. That after said footings of the votes had been made, I transferred the same to the poll-book kept by myself, showing the exact number of votes cast for each candidate for each of the offices to be filled at said election. That said poll-book kept by myself showed that ninety-six votes had been cast at said election for said T. W. Hooper for said office, and that one hundred and seven votes had been cast for said J. B. Chapline for the same office.

That said footings in the poll-book were made in figures; that none of the figures were written over, blurred, altered, scratched, or erased in any manner whatever; and that Mr. Clure, the other clerk, asked me to transfer the footings from his tally-sheet to his poll-book, which I did in like manner as I had transferred them from my own tally-sheet, that is in figures only; and that footings in his poll-book were not altered, written over, scratched, or blurred in any manner whatever. That the total footings in both of said poll-books were in the handwriting of deponent and were made and written out of the same ink as is this deposition. That after said poll-books had been compared, showing the foregoing facts, they were both duly attested by the officers of said election, and James Hughes, the peace officer of said election, announced the vote to the public from the door of the house wherein said election was held, about one-half past five o'clock on Tuesday morning, Sept. 7th, 1880, it having taken all the night preceding to count said votes. That thereupon Mr. Lugwell, one of the judges, asked me to put my poll-book and tally-sheet into the envelope provided for said purpose, and seal the same and address it to the clerk of said county, which I did in the presence of the officers of said election, whereupon Judge Lugwell delivered the same to W. C. Swift, one of the judges, to carry to the clerk of said county. Mr. Lugwell aforesaid took charge of the poll-book and tally-sheet kept by said Clure and took them to his house. I never saw said poll-book and tally-sheet taken by Judge Lugwell after leaving the polling-place aforesaid on the morning of the 7th of Sept., 1880, until I saw them in the hands of J. W. Langston at the house of said Lugwell on the 15th day of Sept., 1880, and did not then have possession of them. I again saw them at Mr. Lugwell's house on the night of the 17th of Sept., 1880, when Judge Lugwell, his wife, Dr. L. A. A. Doberty, John Lugwell, James Lugwell, Jno. A. Wilhite, and Squire P. W. Foster were present, at which time said poll-book and tally-sheet kept by said Lugwell, in charge, were unchanged, unaltered, and unscratched in any particular, and at that time showed the same state of facts as above enumerated.

I again saw said duplicate poll-book and tally-sheet kept by said Lugwell as aforesaid in the hands of Mr. Lawrence Mayor on Sunday morning, Sept. 19, 1881, at the house of Judge Lugwell, who called at his house and requested to see them. I again saw said duplicated poll-book closed in the hands of Judge Lugwell on Sunday night about twelve o'clock and fifty minutes, (12.50 p. m.,) when an armed mob of about 10 or 12 men, masked, surrounded the house, aroused me by calling for Lugwell and demanding the poll-book and tally-sheet which he had, when I arose and called Mr. Lugwell and told him of the mob and advised him to give them the book. He was somewhat reluctant about surrendering it, whereupon one of the number outside the house said: "Put it out, Lugwell, God damn it, put it out." Lugwell then had the book in his hand, and was near the front window of his house inside, and told the man to come and get it. The man again said in a coarse, harsh voice: "Put it out of the window, God damn it, put it out and don't be long about it. Throw it out." Whereupon Lugwell laid it on the window-sill, (the window being partly raised,) and the person demanding it came and got it. The night was cloudy, with the moon nearly full; about an half hour after this occurrence it commenced raining. I have not seen the duplicated poll-book or tally-sheet so carried away since that time. This deposition is in my own handwriting.

W. H. Tugwell, being duly sworn, says as follows:

My name is W. H. Tugwell, aged near forty-eight years. I live in Jackson Township, Monroe County, and State of Arkansas. I have lived in said county for the past twenty years. I was one of the regularly appointed judges of an election held in said township, on the 6th day of September, 1880, for State and county officers. I noticed the keeping of the poll-books and tally-sheets very closely. I know that J. B. Chapline received one hundred and seven votes at said election for the office of county and probate judge of said county, and that T. W. Hooper, a candidate for the same office, received ninety-six votes, and no more. Mr. Canawah was one of the clerks of the election, and Rome Cheere was the other clerk. Each of said clerks kept a tally-sheet. After the votes had all been counted, J. B. Hughes announced the result of said election publicly from the door of the building wherein said election was held. The separate poll-books and tally-sheets were compared with each other before said result was announced, and they corresponded in the result of said votes. I was an eye-witness of the count and comparison. After the poll-books and tally-sheets had been compared and the result of the election announced, I directed Mr. Kanawah, one of the clerks, to take the poll book and tally-sheet kept by him and put them in an envelope and address them to W. S. Dunlap, county clerk, at Clarendon, Arkansas, which he did in my presence. The poll-book and tally-sheet that were kept by Mr. Kanawah were not scratched, erased, blurred, or written over in any particular whatever at the time of the enscaling of the same as aforesaid. As soon as they were sealed in the envelope I delivered them to Mr. W. C. Swift, one of the judges of the same election, to carry to Clarendon and deliver to the county clerk. I delivered them to W. C. Swift on the morning of the 7th of September, 1880, about 7 o'clock a. m.

I took charge of the duplicated poll-book and tally-sheet kept by Mr. Cleere, the other clerk, and carried them to my residence, being glad to get away. I put them in a trunk. After I had eaten my breakfast that morning I showed the tally-sheet and poll-book, which I had taken charge of, to my wife, and in her presence showed my wife at that time how the vote stood. Among the votes I showed her the statement of the votes which had been cast for T. W. Hooper and J. B. Chapline, candidates for probate and county judge of said county. I distinctly remember that the poll-book showed that T. W. Hooper received ninety-six votes for said office, and that J. B. Chapline received one hundred and seven votes for that office. No one but myself had been in possession of said poll-book or tally-sheet from the time I left the polling-place until I had shown the book and tally-sheet to my wife as aforesaid. After I and my wife had examined them I put them away, and did not see them any more or again until the 15th day of the month. On that day Mr. J. B. or J. W. Langston, one of the candidates for assessor at said election, came to my house about noon and asked if I had possession of one of the poll-books and tally-sheets. I told him I had, and he asked to see them a few minutes. I showed them to him. I was present when he was examining them. He made no marks nor alterations of any kind in them, he never even made a remark about them. He handed them back to me and I took them and put them in my trunk, and then locked them up. On that day Mr. Swift, one of the judges of said election, called at my house and got the poll-book and tally-sheet, and kept them until the next morning, when I sent for them, and on their return I examined them, and found that no alterations of any kind had been made in either of them.

On the night of the 17th of September said tally-sheet and poll-book were compared at my house in my presence, Dr. Doberty, my wife, my two sons and a colored man on my place, 'Squire P. W. Foster, and Mr. Kanawah being present at the time, and the votes for said candidates for said office of county and probate judge were counted in the presence of myself and the other persons named, as recorded on the tally-sheet which I held, and said tally-sheet, kept by said Cleere, then showed that T. W. Hooper had received ninety-six votes, and that J. B. Chapline had received one hundred and seven at said election, and on comparing the tallies with the as recorded in the poll-book the poll-book showed the same fact, and that neither said poll-book nor tally-sheet had been altered in any manner since the election, and they were not scratched nor altered in any respect. I have not the poll-book nor tally-sheet at this time. They were delivered by me to an armed mob, who came to my house last night and demanded them in a violent manner, saying, "Hand them poll-books and tally-sheet out here, and be damned quick about it, too; we want them damned quick, too." That was on Sunday night, (last night,) I think near one o'clock. It was a moonlight night. I have not seen nor heard of them since. They were not altered, erased, changed, or in any manner defaced at the time I surrendered them as aforesaid. This deposition was written by G. W. L. Kanawah.

L. A. A. Doberty being first duly sworn, deposes and says: I am a practicing physician, my name is L. A. A. Doberty, M. D. I am about 32 years old. I live in Jackson Township, Monroe County, Arkansas, and board with W. H. Tugwell. I was living with him at the time an election was held in said township for county and State officers on the 6th day of September 1880. I saw the duplicate poll-book and tally-sheet kept by him as one of the judges of said election, on Tuesday afternoon, September 7th, 1880. I noticed some of the votes cast for different officers at that election, Mr. Tugwell was present. I remember having seen among other votes to have seen also those cast for T. W. Hooper and J. B. Chapline, candidate for probate and county judge of said county, as contained on said poll-book and tally-sheet. The number of votes cast for T. W. Hooper for said office were ninety-six, and for Chaplain, for the same office, one hundred and seven. The talleys on said talley-sheet were not scratched, written over, nor erased in any manner at that time. On the night of the 17th of September, 1880, I again saw the same tally-sheet and poll-book at the house of W. G. Tugwell aforesaid, and in the presence of G. W. L. Kanawah, W. G. Tugwell, his wife, his two sons, and Squire W. P. Foster; I saw the vote as recorded on the tally counted, and the count then and there made showed ninety-six votes for T. W. Hooper for the office of probate and county judge, and that J. B. Chaplain, a candidate for the same office, received one hundred and seven votes, and the poll-book on being compared showed the same result, neither one being altered or changed in any particular since the time I first saw on the next day after the election. On last night a mob came to Mr. Tugwell's house, all that I saw of them being armed. I saw seven of the party—they were masked or faces blackened, I could not tell which. They demanded the poll-books and tally-sheet, saying, "Put them out damned quick, throw them out of the window," and after they had got the books they said, "We've got all we want." This was Sunday night, September 19th, 1880, about one o'clock in the night.

L. A. A. DOBERTY, M. D.

Sworn to before me this 20th day of September, 1880.

P. W. FOSTER, J. P.

STATE OF ARKANSAS, County of Monroe:

I, P. W. Foster, a justice of the peace in and for said Jackson Township, Monroe County, and State of Arkansas, do hereby certify that the foregoing depositions of G. W. L. Kanawah, W. H. Tugwell, and Dr. L. A. A. Doberty were taken before me and well read to and subscribed by each of said persons in my presence at the time and place named and in the action mentioned in the caption; the said G. W. L. Kanawah, W. H. Tugwell, and Dr. L. A. A. Doberty each having been by me first duly sworn that the evidence they should each severally give in the action should be the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, and each of their several statements having been and were reduced to writing by G. W. L. Kanawah, at my request and in my presence, the plaintiff above being present by his attorneys at this examination.

Given under my hand and seal this 20th day of September, 1880.

P. W. FOSTER,
Justice of the Peace, Monroe County, Arkansas.

J. B. Chapline vs. T. W. Hooper.

In the circuit of Monroe Co., Arkansas, to Sept. term, 1880. In the matter of contested elections for county and probate judge.

To T. W. Hooper, defendant in the above-styled case. Take notice:

That I will on Monday, the 20th day of Sept., 1880, at the residence of Foster, in Jackson Township, Monroe County, Arkansas, and before him or some other justice of the peace in and for said county of Monroe, and at the residence of said Foster, proceed within lawful hours to take the depositions of G. W. L. Kanawah and others, to be used as evidence in behalf of the plaintiff or contestant on the trial of the above-styled cause, when and where you may attend and cross-examine, if you choose to do so.

This Sept. 18, 1880.

J. B. CHAPLINE,
By JOHN HALLUM,
His Attorney.

STATE OF ARKANSAS, Monroe County, ss:

This day personally appeared before me, H. B. Bateman, a justice of the peace in and for said Cache Township, Monroe County, Ark., A. J. Light, who deposed and said, that on the 18th day of Sept., 1880, he delivered a true and perfect copy of the within notice to the within-named T. W. Hooper.

A. J. LIGHT.

Subscribed and sworn to before me on this the 18th day of Sept., 1880.

H. B. BATEMAN.

Monroe circuit court, September term thereof, 1880.

J. B. Chapline vs. T. W. Hooper.

Know all men by these presents that J. B. Chapline, as principal, and H. B. Bateman and G. A. Garrett, as sureties, are held and firmly bound unto T. W. Hooper in the sum of five hundred dollars, for the payment of which we each firmly bind ourselves, our heirs, and administrators to faithfully pay.

Conditional, however, that whereas J. B. Chapline has commenced a suit to contest the election of county and probate judge for Monroe County, State of Arkansas, as between J. B. Chapline and T. W. Hooper. Now, if J. B. Chapline and his securities shall pay or cause to be paid to T. W. Hooper, contestee or defendant in this action, and the officers of the court such sums of money as shall be adjudged against him in the court in which the trial shall be brought, or in any other court to which it shall be carried by appeal or otherwise, then this bond shall be void, otherwise, it shall remain in full force and effect.

J. B. CHAPLINE.
H. B. BATEMAN.
J. A. GARRETT.

[During the delivery of the above speech, the hour having expired, Mr. MOORE'S time was extended until he had concluded.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced the passage of the following bills without amendment:

A bill (H. R. No. 813) to amend section 5254, title 63, Revised Statutes of the United States, concerning the use of piers and cribs in the Mississippi River; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1712) for the relief of Chaplain M. J. Kelly and others.

It also announced the passage of the following bills and joint resolution; in which concurrence was requested:

A bill (S. No. 1093) for the relief of George W. Saulpaw;

A bill (S. No. 1477) to empower the Secretary of War to audit the claim of the State of South Carolina for rent alleged to be due for the use and occupation of the Citadel Academy at Charleston; and

A bill (S. No. 1478) for the relief of the Albemarle and Chesapeake Canal Company.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted in the following cases:

To Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania, from to-morrow until Saturday.
To Mr. STEELE, until Saturday.
To Mr. BRUMM, until Tuesday next.
To Mr. DEZENDORF, until Saturday.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. ALDRICH, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. No. 813) to amend section 5254, title 63, Revised Statutes of the United States, concerning the use of piers and cribs in the Mississippi River; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1712) for the relief of Chaplain M. J. Kelly and others.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York, by unanimous consent, was granted leave to print in the RECORD some additional remarks on the subject of American citizens in British prisons. [See Appendix.]

BOUNTIES TO FARRAGUT'S FLEET.

Mr. DEZENDORF, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 4738) to provide for the payment of bounties due to the officers and sailors of United States vessels under the command of Flag-Officer D. C. Farragut; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

And then, on motion of Mr. HOLMAN, (at five o'clock and fifty minutes p. m.,) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and other papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. WILLITS: The petition of Oscar Bliss and 42 others, of Rider Post No. 12, Grand Army of the Republic, of Lenawee County, Michigan, in relation to repeal of arrears-of-pension act—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, April 27, 1882.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

MILEAGE OF ARMY OFFICERS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair laid before the Senate yesterday a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to a resolution of February 28, 1882, a report from the Paymaster-General and accompanying papers giving an itemized statement of how, by whom, and under what exigency the $200,000 appropriated for mileage of officers for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, will be exhausted before the end of February, &c., which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed. As the Chair did not know that the bundle of papers now before him was attached to the communication, he asks that the motion to print be reconsidered, and that the matter be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. ANTHONY. I make that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There being no objection, the order to print will be reconsidered, and the papers will be referred to the Committee on Printing. The Journal will be corrected in that respect.

Mr. BECK subsequently said: A communication has been received from the Secretary of War, I understand, of which I was not advised until this moment, relative to mileage, and a bag of books or papers has been sent here with it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order to print has been reconsidered, and the papers have been referred first to the Committee on Printing to determine whether they should be printed.

Mr. BECK. I do not desire the printing of such a large amount of documents or papers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The matter is referred to the Committee on Printing now.

Mr. BECK. I should like an early report for the printing of an abstract, because it seems to me there was no occasion to send a bag of paper of that sort here, when that Department has plenty of clerks not very busy, and plenty of officers who might perhaps be better employed than they are. I do not understand why they could not have sent an abstract of the papers.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But it is probable, I will say to my friend from Kentucky, that the Secretary of War felt that he was obeying a requirement or a direction of the Senate in sending everything he had.

Mr. BECK. Perhaps he did. I merely mean to say that the only object I have had in view is to get at the facts to see whether the large deficiency was created for legitimate mileage or not. I have had nothing else in view.

Mr. ANTHONY. If the Senator from Kentucky would be kind enough to indicate the portion of the papers which he desires to have printed, it would aid the Committee on Printing very much.

Mr. BECK. There is a mail-bag full, I understand, which I take it for granted are vouchers merely. What I desire to do is to give the Army all they need, but if they are going to send officers down to Yorktown, and if they are going to have grand dress parades all over the country and invite officers all about and pay them mileage and then come here with a deficiency of $52,000, having spent the whole $200,000 we allowed them in eight months instead of twelve, I think they might tell us how they spent it, without going into great detail as to where it went. It was a legitimate inquiry and not intended to embarrass anybody; but I desired to get at the facts.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator make a motion in regard to the matter?

Mr. BECK. No, sir; I do not really know what it is; let it go to the Committee on Appropriations. I call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Printing to the matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary can show the Senator the bag of documents which has been referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. BECK. It is absurd to send a bag like that here.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was referred to the Committee on Printing in order to decide what should be printed. The Chair supposes there is no other way. That is what ought to be done.

Mr. BECK. I have no doubt that it is a sort of threat to show the amount of idle printing that we are required to do, and it is sent here as an evidence of that fact. I simply asked for a single, plain, legitimate fact that a hundred lines can give.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I feel it to be a duty toward the Secretary of War to say that I do not agree with the Senator from Kentucky, and that I do not think he is justified in saying that the Secretary of War intends it as a threat or intimation or anything else, but only a justifiable and lawful obedience to the direction of the Senate of the United States to send this information. If the Senate calls for universal information he must send it if he is an upright officer. He has sent it, and it is not his fault that it is much or little. Perhaps the bag ought to have been silk, or something of that kind.

Mr. INGALLS. In view of the imputation made by the Senator from Kentucky, it seems to me to be reasonable that the resolution of the Senate should be read, that we may know whether the action of the Secretary has been in obedience to it or not. If it appears on the files I should like to have it read by the Chief Clerk.

Mr. BECK. So would I.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Secretary of War does not print the documents; he sends the papers here by our order, and we print them or not, as we see fit. He is not responsible for the expense of printing.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senate has already referred the matter of printing to the Committee on Printing; and that was the proper thing to do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The Acting Secretary read the following resolution, adopted by the Senate February 28, 1882:

Whereas the Secretary of War has officially advised Congress in the estimates for deficiencies that the $200,000 appropriated for "mileage to officers of the Army" for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, "will be exhausted before the end of February," and that "much inconvenience may be caused by the inability of the (this) Department to reimburse officers for expenses incurred while traveling under orders after that date," and asks an appropriation of $52,000 to meet the deficiency: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish to the Senate as soon as practicable an itemized statement of how, by whom, and under what exigency or orders the $200,000 aforesaid has been expended in eight months, and whether the estimate of $52,000 will be sufficient for the remaining four months, stating his reasons for assuming that $52,000 will suffice to complete the service for the fiscal year.

Mr. BECK. I do not think that resolution calls for any such voluminous bag of papers as was sent to us. I merely wanted the estimates, the orders given, and how the money was expended. I supposed an itemized statement in a single column would answer every purpose. I do not mean to reflect on the Secretary of War or anybody else. I mean to call the attention of the Committee on Printing, not to print that bag of documents, but merely to print enough to enable us to know how the money has been expended and the reasons why it was so expended, which can be done in a very few minutes, I suppose, instead of sending us a mail-bag full of miscellaneous documents.

Mr. EDMUNDS. You do not know what is in the bag. They may be the very itemized statements the Senator desired.

Mr. BECK. I hope the Committee on Printing will look into it carefully, and give us the information at the least possible expense.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Senator will notice that his resolution calls for an itemized account. If he had simply asked the Secretary of War to give a general statement of the extra expenditures, of the unusual causes for the expenditures, then what he suggests would have answered, but he calls for exactly what I suppose the Secretary of War sent, an itemized account of the expenditure of $200,000.

Mr. INGALLS. What does the bag contain?

Mr. HAWLEY. What I suppose to be an itemized account, which the Senator called for.

Mr. INGALLS. The matter had better be postponed until we know what the bag contains.

Mr. HAWLEY. As stated by my colleague on the committee, [Mr. ANTHONY,] it does not follow that we are going to print all that matter. It may be examined by the clerk of the Committe on Printing in two hours so as to give all the information requisite.

Mr. ALLISON. I think the resolution also calls for the orders under which the expenditures were made. I have no doubt if we were to investigate the bag of documents we should find that it contains all the orders with reference to mileage accounts.

Mr. BECK. I have no doubt that it contains all the vouchers given by the officers, and that they are all regular. I have no idea that the money was stolen by any one, or that anybody was getting more than he had a right to receive, under the appropriation; but what I wanted was simply what the resolution shows on its face, an abstract of the orders to show where the officers were sent, what they were doing, what duty they were performing, so as to enable us to see whether this money was spent in executing the necessary orders of the Army or whether it was spent in junketing. If it was so spent, then I propose before new appropriations are made to seek to limit the right of that Department to make such expenditures. I believe, for example, and I may be wrong, that $20,000 or $30,000 of that money was spent by officers to go to Yorktown for the Centennial celebration. I deny the right of the Secretary of War to send his officers there at public expense. If I am wrong in that, then I am so far wrong. If, in other words, the orders under which the money was spent were in connection with Army affairs, all right; if not, then let us see if we cannot prevent a repetition of that condition of things.

That is all I want, and a single page or two would give it all. I had no idea that a bag of books would come here, and I am amazed that we are asked to print any such mass of papers.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a communication from James B. Eads, a member of the Mississippi River commission, dissenting from portions of the report of that commission; which, on motion of Mr. COCKRELL, was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

FOURTEENTH STREET EXTENSION, WASHINGTON.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the commissioners of the District of Columbia, transmitting, in response to a resolution of April 14, information concerning the action taken by them for widening the extension of Fourteenth street, with plans and estimated cost of the proposed improvement. The communication will be referred to the committee on the District of Columbia, and be printed. There are plats accompanying the communication. Shall the plats be printed?

Mr. EDMUNDS. No; that is pretty costly business. I think they had better not be printed, without some investigation.

Mr. INGALLS. The printing of the plats is essential to the correct understanding of the report of the commissioners and to the preparation of an intelligent public document. The plats accompany the statement and ought to be printed. I understand they can be reproduced at a very small expense.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not object to it. Probably they may be.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The plats will be printed also, there being no objection.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. DAWES. I present the petition of John Miller & Co. and a large number of other firms and merchants in Massachusetts, in support of House bill No. 5656, providing that all distilled whisky in bond on the date of its final passage shall remain in bond for an indefinite period, instead of being subject to withdrawal within three years. I understand that the bill has been reported. If I am mistaken, I ask that the petition be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is before the Committee on Finance, and the petition will be referred to that committee.

Mr. SLATER presented the petition of H. H. Wheeler, of Wasco County, Oregon, praying compensation for carrying the mails between The Dalles, Oregon, and Canyon City, Oregon, during the years 1864, 1865, and 1866; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. MORGAN presented a petition of citizens of Colbert County, Alabama, praying for an appropriation to be distributed to the common schools of the States and Territories on the basis of illiteracy; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. HALE presented a petition of citizens of Machias, Maine, praying that an increase of pension be granted to Lieutenant James P. F. Toby, late of Company B, Thirty-first Regiment Maine Volunteers; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. ROLLINS, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2871) to provide for the extension of the Capitol, North O Street and South Washington Railway, reported it without amendment.

Mr. COKE. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1609) making an appropriation for continuing work on the jetties in Charleston Harbor, to report it without amendment. I ask, in view of the importance of the bill and the urgency for its immediate passage, that it be acted upon now.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I must ask that it be printed and go over. We can take it up to-morrow morning.

Mr. BUTLER. I hope the Senator from Vermont will not put the bill upon the Calendar. It is an extremely important matter, and a very urgent one.

Mr. INGALLS. To what does it relate?

Mr. BUTLER. It makes an appropriation of $150,000 in advance of the appropriations to be realized from the river and harbor bill for the jetties in Charleston Harbor, upon the urgent request of the Engineer's Department. Of course the appropriation to be made for that work in the river and harbor bill will be charged with this appropriation. That we expect. We only want it to be available immediately inasmuch as the contract under which the parties have been working is about to expire, and the Engineer Department are of the opinion that if they do not have money to go on the Government will lose very seriously and the work will be very seriously jeopardized. The bill simply makes an appropriation of $150,000 in advance of the money to be realized under the river and harbor bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. A delay of twenty-four hours will not hurt it much in order that the bill may be printed, and we have time to look at the report of the engineers. I shall not object to the bill being taken up out of order to-morrow, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. BUTLER. I have no objection to that in the world. I did not want the bill to go to the Calendar and away down at the bottom of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SHERMAN asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1797) to regulate the coinage of the standard silver dollar; which was read the first time by its title.

Mr. ALLISON. I should like to hear the bill read at length.

The bill was read the second time at length, and referred to the Committee on Finance, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That so much of the act passed February 28, 1878, entitled "An act to authorize the coinage of the standard silver dollar and to restore its legal-tender character," as directs the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase from time to time silver bullion, at the market price thereof, not less than two million dollars' worth per month, and to cause the same to be coined monthly into standard silver dollars, be, and the same is hereby, repealed, and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to purchase, from time to time, silver bullion at the market price thereof, and to cause the same to be coined into such dollars only when in his opinion a further coinage of said dollars is demanded for public use and convenience; and a sum sufficient to carry out the provisions of this act is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. COCKRELL asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1798) to quiet titles to lands in Missouri entered under the graduation act; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. FERRY asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1799) for the relief of Oliver H. Greenfield; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1800) for the relief of Mary A. Lee; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1801) for the relief of Patrick Casey; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CALL asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1802) to allow all homestead settlers who have entered only eighty acres of land to homestead eighty additional acres; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1803) granting a pension to P. B. Perry; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

CHILI-PERUVIAN INVESTIGATION.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask leave to offer the following privileged resolution, and I ask for its immediate consideration:

Resolved, That HENRY W. BLAIR, a member of the Senate, have leave to testify before the Committee of the House of Representatives on Foreign Affairs in the Chili-Peruvian investigation now being made by that committee.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

APACHE INDIAN OUTRAGE.

Mr. CALL. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the murders and outrages lately committed on citizens of the United States in Arizona by the Apache Indians demand that the entire military power of the United States shall be used, if necessary, for the punishment of the perpetrators of these outrages and for the protection and security of our people in future.

Mr. INGALLS. Let the resolution be printed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I object to the resolution. Let it go over.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President——

Mr. EDMUNDS. We passed a law, I will say in explaining my objection, a few years ago, in spite of my opposition and that of my Republican friends, which it was thought by some prevented the President from using the Army for any such purpose. I do not say that it did, but I think we had better consider a little before we try to pass a resolution which may fly in the face of the law.

Mr. CALL. I ask that the resolution lie on the table, and I will call it up for consideration to-morrow morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be printed and lie on the table.

HILL'S TARIFFS OF THE WORLD.

Mr. MORGAN submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was read:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That 2,000 copies of The Tariffs of the World and Analyses Thereof, prepared by Charles S. Hill, and published by D. Appleton & Co., of New York, be purchased at the publishers' rate of $5 per copy, to be distributed as follows: 300 for the use of the Senate, 1,200 for the use of the House of Representatives, and 500 to be used at the discretion of the Secretary of State for the benefit of the consular and diplomatic service of the United States.

Mr. MORGAN. I move that the resolution, with the accompanying papers, be referred to the Committee on Finance, because it is a subject they ought to consider, and afterward it can go to the Committee on Printing.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 4680) to repeal discriminating duties on tea and coffee, the products of the possessions of the Netherlands.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 1598) to authorize the Secretary of War to donate to the Ladies' Soldiers' Monument Society of Portsmouth, Ohio, four condemned cannon.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 570) to extend the limits of the port of New Orleans;

A bill (H. R. No. 707) to amend section 4233 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, in relation to danger signals;

A bill (H. R. No. 869) for the relief of Thomas J. Wharton; and

A bill (H. R. No. 5387) providing for the pay of Rear-Admiral Roger N. Stembel.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. No. 813) to amend section 5254, title 63, Revised Statutes of the United States, concerning the use of piers and cribs in the Mississippi River; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1712) for the relief of Chaplain M. J. Kelly and others.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate proceed to consider the resolution I had the honor to submit yesterday touching the special rule of the Senate known as the Anthony rule.

Mr. BECK. Will the Senator allow me to say a word?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly.

Mr. BECK. I thought yesterday morning, when I had the bill (S. No. 976) to punish the unlawful certification of checks by officers of national banks taken up, and had all the documents published in the RECORD this morning, it measurably made it the unfinished business for this morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would state to the Senator from Kentucky that there is this provision in the Anthony rule:

That at the conclusion of the morning business for each day, unless, upon motion, the Senate shall at any time otherwise order, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the Calendar of bills and resolutions.

The words are "unless the Senate shall otherwise order," and the Senator from Vermont asks that the matter to which he has referred be taken up.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will state to the Senator from Kentucky that in order to relieve ourselves from the embarrassment we were under yesterday as to the meaning of the Anthony rule, I wish to take that subject up and get the conclusion of the Senate upon a proposed amendment, which I think will satisfy everybody.

Mr. BECK. I beg the Senator's pardon. I was not aware that he wished to call that matter up. The papers relating to the bill to which I refer are printed in the RECORD this morning, and I should like to get the action of the Senate upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further routine morning business, the morning hour is closed, and the Senator from Vermont has the floor.

THE ANTHONY RULE.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to take up the resolution I offered yesterday in relation to the Anthony rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution is before the Senate, there being no objection. It will be read.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the special rule of the Senate for the consideration of matters on the Calendar under limited debate be, and the same is hereby, abolished.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I offered the resolution in that form in order in the shortest way to get the question in a shape in which the Senate could consider it to-day. I now move to amend the resolution by striking out the word "abolished" and inserting—

Amended by adding thereto the following words:

"But if the Senate shall proceed with the consideration of any matter, notwithstanding an objection, the foregoing provisions touching debate shall not apply, but the subject shall be proceeded with under the standing rules of the Senate."

Mr. HOAR. I should like, then, to be permitted to withdraw my resolution; the Senator has expressed so much better what I desire to express in mine.

Mr. PENDLETON. I desire to ask a question for information in regard to the proposed amendment. I understand the Chair to have decided that immediately upon the conclusion of the routine morning business, under the Anthony rule the Senate may proceed on motion to take up any other bill, and that business proceeds then without the limitation of debate. I think that was the ruling made by the Chair the other day. ["No," "No."] Gentlemen around me say that was not the interpretation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is under that ruling that the resolution to amend or repeal the Anthony rule is now taken up.

Mr. PENDLETON. I understand the Chair to have decided that immediately after the conclusion of the routine morning business the Anthony rule goes into operation, but the Senate may on motion take up any bill or resolution and proceed with its discussion under the five-minute rule, before proceeding with the Calendar under the rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No, not under the five-minute rule.

Mr. PENDLETON. Without the limitation of the five-minute rule at that time?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without the five-minute rule.

Mr. PENDLETON. Then, after the Senate shall have begun to put into operation the Anthony rule, if an objection is interposed and the bill is taken up, the Chair decided yesterday that the debate then proceeds under the limitations of debate; and now the Senator from Vermont desires that the rule shall stand in full effect except that in the event the objection is overruled the limit upon debate shall not apply. We shall then be able, as I understand it, before the Anthony rule goes into effect, to take up by a majority of the Senate any bill or resolution and proceed without limitation; and if afterward, when in regular order upon the Calendar, any bill is reached under the Anthony rule, then if the Senate, notwithstanding objection, determines to proceed with it, it proceeds under the ordinary rules of debate and without limitation, giving the Senate entire charge, therefore, of its own business.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That states the case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the resolution of the Senator from Vermont.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then I may as well now, to save time again, ask leave to withdraw the appeal I took from the decision of the Chair yesterday, because this supersedes the matter.

Mr. INGALLS. I should like to have the rule as amended read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The rule will be read as now modified.

The Acting Secretary read the rule as modified, as follows:

Resolved, That at the conclusion of the morning business for each day, unless, upon motion, the Senate shall at any time otherwise order, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the Calendar of Bills and Resolutions, and continue such consideration until two o'clock; and bills and resolutions that are not objected to shall be taken up in their order, and each Senator shall be entitled to speak once and for five minutes only upon any question; and the objection may be interposed at any stage of the proceedings unless upon motion the Senate shall otherwise order; and this order shall commence immediately after the call for "concurrent and other resolutions," and shall take precedence of the unfinished business and other special orders. But if the Senate shall proceed with the consideration of any matter notwithstanding an objection, the foregoing provisions touching debate shall not apply, but the subject shall be proceeded with under the standing rules of the Senate.

CERTIFICATION OF BANK CHECKS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first case in order on the Calendar is the bill (S. No. 976) to punish the unlawful certification of checks by officers of national banks, which the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] calls up for consideration.

Mr. ALDRICH. I will state to the Senator from Kentucky that the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD,] who is not in his seat this morning, is desirous of being heard upon the bill, and I suggest to him that it go over without prejudice until the return of the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. BECK. I was not aware of that. I understood that the Senator from Delaware did not care to be heard upon it.

Mr. ALDRICH. He informed me that he was anxious to be heard upon it. Possibly the Senator may have some more recent information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What is the pleasure of the Senator from Kentucky in regard to the bill? Will he call it up now?

Mr. BECK. I desire to call it up. I have been waiting more than two weeks, first upon one Senator and then upon another. The Senate can do as they like about it.

Mr. ALDRICH. I do not think that the bill ought to be considered under the Anthony rule. In its form as reported by the Committee on Finance it is unobjectionable, but in the form suggested by the Senator from Kentucky it is liable to serious objection. It seems to me that it would be impossible for the Senate to consider the bill under a five-minute rule. So I hope the Senator will consent that the bill may go over and be taken up at some time by a vote of the Senate.

Mr. BECK. Yesterday I laid before the Senate the laws, orders, and reports upon which the bill is based, and the Senator from Rhode Island also laid some papers before the Senate, all of which are in the RECORD this morning. They show upon their face the exact facts. I do not think there can be any trouble in discussing the bill under the five-minute rule or any other rule. The only amendment of which the Senator complains is that I seek to strike out of the amendment of the committee the word "fictitious" before the word "obligation" and the word "pretended" before the word "collateral." That is all that would create any debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kentucky ask that the bill be passed over without prejudice until the Senator from Delaware returns?

Mr. BECK. I would rather not have it passed over at all, if I can possibly help it.

Mr. INGALLS. I suggest to the Senator from Rhode Island that under the modification of the Anthony rule which has been adopted this morning all he has to do is to object to the consideration of the bill. The Senator from Kentucky can then move to take it up, and if the majority agree with him, the five-minute rule is abrogated and debate is unlimited.

Mr. ALDRICH. I was aware of that fact, but I disliked to suggest that course. I made the suggestion I did in the hope that some arrangement might be made by which the bill could be taken up in some other way except by a displacement of business under the Anthony rule. The amendment to which the Senator has alluded changes the entire nature of the bill from an unobjectionable bill as it came from the committee to what seems to me to be a very objectionable bill, affecting the entire banking interests of the country in a very serious way. I hope the gentleman will consent to have the bill go over.

Mr. BECK. I desire to proceed with the bill, and if objection is made I shall endeavor to ask the Senate to consider it. It is a very important bill.

Mr. INGALLS. Then, in order to put the amended rule in operation, I object to the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. BECK. I move to proceed to the consideration of the bill, the objection notwithstanding.

Mr. INGALLS. That is right. That is what I wanted done.

Mr. ALLISON. I hope the Senator from Kentucky will not press the bill until the Senator from Delaware returns; which will be in a day or two. I think the Senator from Kansas will withdraw his objection, and there will be no objection made to the consideration of the bill early next week. I think the Senator from Delaware would like to be here when the bill is considered, and he will only be absent for a day or two.

Mr. BECK. I waited some time for the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] to get his papers ready. Then I waited for the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] who was absent. We shall never get the whole Committee on Finance here, in my opinion, at one time. It is a bill that anybody can understand on one side or the other. It is merely to enforce the law of the land; no more, no less. A bill passed the House of Representatives unanimously ten years ago word for word like this measure. The Comptroller of the Currency certified that the passage of that bill even by the House had for years prevented this illegal action by officers of banks. He reported in 1879 that the whole proceedings were illegal. The Secretary of the Treasury says that such a law ought to pass in some form; that there is no check; that the open certification of checks is a plain, palpable violation of the law, and he was amazed to find nobody was punished under it.

Mr. ALLISON. But the Senator from Kentucky will remember, if he will allow me one moment, that his amendment is the bone of contention.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This debate is out of order on both sides.

Mr. ALLISON. I know it is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators cannot argue the merits of the bill on a motion to proceed to its consideration.

Mr. BECK. All the papers are in the RECORD this morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate is proceeding under the Anthony rule, and the debate is against the rule.

Mr. ALLISON. I was only endeavoring to persuade the Senator to postpone the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from Kentucky agree to have the bill postponed?

Mr. BECK. No, sir, I will not; I desire a vote now on taking it up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky, notwithstanding the objection of the Senator from Kansas, moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. In the absence of the Senator from Delaware I do not think we ought to take the bill up, although I am perfectly willing to do so at any other time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky has been appealed to on that point, the Chair will inform the Senator from Ohio. That matter has been discussed for five minutes.

Mr. SHERMAN. I would not like to take up the bill in the absence of the Senator from Delaware.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] to proceed to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. BECK. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Will not this supersede the Calendar?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will, if taken up, supersede everything. The call will proceed.

The Principal Legislative Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HARRIS, (when Mr. JACKSON'S name was called.) My colleague [Mr. JACKSON] is absent from the city. He is paired with the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. MCDILL.]

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. MCDILL, (after having voted in the negative.) I desire to withdraw my vote. I am paired with the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. JACKSON.]

Mr. ALLISON, (after having voted in the negative.) I am paired on political questions with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. BROWN,] but I voted "nay" with a view of waiting for the return of the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD.] If it is a political question I withdraw my vote.

Mr. BECK. The Senator can vote if he likes. The Senator from Delaware, when I assured him time and again that I was waiting for the Senator from Ohio and then another, said he cared nothing about it.

Mr. ALLISON. I withdraw my vote.

Mr. BUTLER, (after having voted in the affirmative.) I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON.] I did not recollect it at the time. I feel bound to withdraw my vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would have supposed there was no politics in this question, but it seems to have been made a political question by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. MCDILL] withdrawing his vote and two or three others following his example.

Mr. HARRIS. I do not think there is any politics in this question, yet the Senate has divided almost, if not entirely, by party lines.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. So it appears.

Mr. HARRIS. And if I was the Senator from South Carolina I would not vote, and I think the Senator from Iowa does the right thing in not voting.

Mr. BUTLER. I expect I had better withdraw my vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The vote of the Senator from South Carolina is withdrawn.

Mr. RANSOM, (after having voted in the affirmative.) I am paired, Mr. President, as you know, with your colleague, [Mr. LOGAN,] on party questions. I do not so regard this, and I cast my vote without reference to my opinions on the bill itself, simply to let the Senator from Kentucky get up his bill. I withdraw my vote.

Mr. ANTHONY, (after having voted in the negative.) I am paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] on political questions. I did not regard this as a political question, and so voted, but I see it has the Senate divided pretty much by party lines. I withdraw my vote.

Mr. ALDRICH. I am paired on political questions with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. GORMAN,] but after consultation with his colleague, not deeming this a political question, I have voted.

The result was announced—yeas 26, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—26.

Beck,	Garland,	Jonas,	Saulsbury,
Call,	George,	McPherson,	Slater,
Cockrell,	Groome,	Maxey,	Vance,
Coke,	Grover,	Morgan,	Vest,
Davis of W. Va.,	Hampton,	Pendleton,	Walker.
Fair,	Harris,	Plumb,
Farley,	Ingalls,	Pugh,

NAYS—27.

Aldrich,	Edmunds,	Lapham,	Rollins,
Blair,	Frye,	McMillan,	Sawyer,

ABSENT—23.

Allison,	Cameron of Pa.,	Jones of Florida,	Mitchell,
Anthony,	Ferry,	Jones of Nevada,	Ransom,
Bayard,	Gorman,	Kellogg,	Saunders,
Brown,	Hill of Georgia,	Lamar,	Voorhees,
Butler,	Jackson,	Logan,	Williams.
Camden,	Johnston,	McDill,

So the motion was not agreed to.

L. MADISON DAY.

Mr. JONAS. The bill (S. No. 73) for the relief of L. Madison Day was passed over without prejudice the day before yesterday. I ask for its consideration now.

Mr. INGALLS. I object to the consideration of that bill. The Senator can move to take it up.

Mr. JONAS. The bill was up for consideration a few days ago and was laid over on the objection of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] that he desired to refresh his memory and prepare himself for the discussion of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] objected also, the Chair thinks.

Mr. CONGER. I did not object. I reported the bill myself.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from Louisiana can move to take it up.

Mr. JONAS. I move to take up the bill notwithstanding the objection.

Mr. SHERMAN. That postpones the whole Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas objects to the consideration of the bill called up by the Senator from Louisiana, and the Senator from Louisiana moves, notwithstanding the objection, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. JONAS. I withdraw the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first case on the Calendar will be called.

DR. A. SIDNEY TEBBS.

The bill (S. No. 296) for the relief of Dr. A. Sidney Tebbs was announced as first in order on the Calendar.

Mr. GARLAND. That is the case to the consideration of which objection was made yesterday.

Mr. SHERMAN. It was objected to yesterday by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] withdrew his appeal from the decision of the Chair and objected to the consideration of this bill, and the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] moved to take it up notwithstanding the objection. The yeas and nays were called for on that motion.

Mr. SHERMAN. I appeal to the Senator from Arkansas and other Senators whether it is advisable for us to constantly thwart the operation of the Anthony rule by attempting to take up bills out of their order?

Mr. GARLAND. My motion is in order.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is in order now, because the rule has been amended so that a single objection puts it over, unless the Senate for the day abandons the Anthony rule. I hope we shall go on regularly. I shall vote against taking up every bill that is objected to until we go on under the Anthony rule and dispose of those cases on the Calendar which are not objected to.

Mr. GARLAND. That is the Senator's privilege, but this motion was made yesterday, and stands now. I am content to have the Senate vote upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] called for the yeas and nays yesterday. The Secretary informs the Chair that they were not ordered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then I call for them again.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Principal Legislative Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BUTLER, (when his name was called.) I am paired on all political questions with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON.] I presume this is one, and therefore I withhold my vote.

Mr. FRYE, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. HILL,] though he generously allowed me to vote when I pleased. I think in this case he would prefer to have the pair operate, and therefore I shall refrain from voting.

Mr. HARRIS, (when Mr. JACKSON'S name was called.) I announce once for all the pair between my colleague [Mr. JACKSON] and the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. MCDILL.] My colleague, if he were here, would vote "yea."

Mr. RANSOM, (when Mr. LOGAN'S name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] on all party questions. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] is paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN] on all party questions. The Senator from Illinois and the Senator from Georgia are both absent. The pairs have been transferred so that those two Senators are paired on this question.

Mr. SAULSBURY, (when his name was called.) If this is a political question, I am paired with the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. FERRY.]

Mr. SAWYER, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] on this bill. If he were here, I should vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. ALLISON. I am paired with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. BROWN,] but, as was stated by the Senator from North Carolina, that pair has been transferred to the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN.] I therefore feel at liberty to vote, and vote "nay."

Mr. ALDRICH, (after having voted in the negative.) As this seems to be a political question I withdraw my vote. I am paired with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. GORMAN.]

The result was announced—yeas 28, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—28.

Beck,	Farley,	Ingalls,	Pugh,
Call,	Garland,	Jonas,	Ransom,
Cameron of Wis.,	George,	McPherson,	Sewell,
Cockrell,	Groome,	Maxey,	Slater,

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 296) for the relief of Dr. A. Sidney Tebbs.

The bill was read.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That section 1218 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask for the reading of that section which it is proposed to repeal.

The Acting Secretary read as follows:

SEC. 1218. No person who had served in any capacity in the military, naval or civil service of the so-called Confederate States, or of either of the States in insurrection during the late rebellion, shall be appointed to any position in the Army of the United States.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I move, as this bill is now understood, to make this radical change in the laws, and as three or four bills on this subject are pending in the Committee on the Judiciary covering not only this point but various others that enter into this question, to refer the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary in order that the whole subject may be treated of together.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. GARLAND. Ordinarily I should not object to the motion made by the Senator from Vermont; but if the Senate will consider the condition of affairs in reference to this question, I think it will at once see the necessity of taking some general definite action on the subject. I have not looked to refresh my mind, but I do not think there has been a session of Congress since I have been in the Senate that we have not relieved some person from disability under this section of the statutes; and whenever the question comes up in that shape it is suggested by some Senator that we had better pass a general bill. Heretofore I have made an effort to have a general bill passed repealing this section. This is the second time that this effort has been made, and made each time in response to a suggestion that we had better pass a general bill and not do this work piecemeal.

I do not know that any committee can throw any light on the subject, because of the fact that we have legislated from session to session in reference to special cases. We relieved at the last session, or the session before the last, Mr. Heiskell, of Maryland, from the difficulties and troubles of this very section.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What was the name, may I ask the Senator?

Mr. GARLAND. J. Monroe Heiskell. When that bill came from the Committee on Military Affairs a suggestion was made by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] that we had better do this work as an entirety and not legislate by piecemeal for special cases. Concurring in that suggestion, I offered an amendment in the nature of a substitute, identical almost with the proposition now reported. That remained to be considered before the committee, and at the urgent solicitation of the then Senator from Maryland, Mr. Whyte, I did not insist on the amendment, and the original bill was passed for the relief of Mr. Heiskell. Then came a bill exactly of the same character, and I made the same motion to amend that by repealing section 1218, which we do repeal to some extent at least, in each one of these special bills. It certainly seems to me that it is time, and we have sufficient advice upon it, to legislate generally on the subject. And if any Senator knows of any one unworthy, who should not be embraced in the relief, that would make a different case. But we have not failed yet to relieve any person applying. So if we are going to relieve by name in individual cases, I think we might as well adopt a general bill and repeal the statute at once.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, the Senator from Arkansas is undoubtedly correct in his idea that all legislation ought to be made as general as possible. Individual legislation is too often favoritism, influence, contrivance, arrangement, and log-rolling—all that is evil in a law-making and law-abiding community, undoubtedly. This section of the statutes, therefore, that he proposes to repeal comes directly into consideration.

In 1866, after a somewhat serious period in our history the Congress of the United States declared that people who had been engaged in attempting to overthrow the Government should not be employed in the Army of the United States. That was in the light of an experience which had shown that from West Point and Annapolis where officers had been educated and trained at the expense of their country for its service, they had taken the earliest available opportunity to turn their skill and knowledge to the destruction of the Government that had reared them and taught them in its most honorable and trusty service. That was rather a bitter experience. I am not proposing to go into a discussion of the political considerations that led to it; but it is bitter for any country that is a country to have the men, in whatever part of it they may live, whom it has reared to defend its flag, desert it and undertake to overthrow it. It matters not how good the motive may be of the man who feels it his duty to do it, for I do not wish to excite any bitterness in this debate; but for the country that feels it, as we still have a country that did feel it, it is rather a heavy and a bitter experience. Accordingly the United States having in despite of these desertions from the Army, these leavings of it—I do not mean desertion in the sense in which the term is ordinarily understood—been able to preserve the existence of the country through the officers and the soldiers who did adhere to what they had sworn to stand by and defend, Congress provided that those who were engaged in the rebellion should not re-enter the Army of the United States.

Now repeal this section, and it is within the competence of the President of the United States and of the Senate, a vacancy occurring, to appoint Mr. Jefferson Davis (and I only speak of him as the representative man of this great disturbance) to be a brigadier-general and commander-in-chief, if there were a vacancy suitably occurring, of the Army of the United States. It may be that Mr. Davis would now prove perfectly true to the flag, and that no temptation of a new rebellion could seduce him into leaving it and setting up another; but what sort of a lesson would such a spectacle be to the future? What sort of an instruction would it hold out to people who are to be taught to love their country and to stick to it through thick and thin, if they were to see hereafter that the only hazard and risk in going into a rebellion against your country is the chance of being kept out of the fat places and good offices that you left before, just long enough to have your political friends or somebody else get an opening and put you back again?

I think that the rebellion being over, and over for good, it is better to preserve some everlasting monument that there was a right side and a wrong side to it. And I think inasmuch as the Government of the United States turned out to be on the right side and to preserve itself, it is well to teach all future generations that the moment the struggle was over we did not forget that there was any distinction in the right and the wrong of that contest. I do not think you can preserve a republican government or any other in any other way; and I say that without any reflection upon the individual motives or careers of persons who may have been on the other side. But there cannot be two right sides to such a question; and as the Government turned out to be on the right side, I think it better that this perpetual statute-book should hold some unextinguished memorial that we knew the difference between one side and the other.

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President, the section referred to, 1218, in effect declares that no person who held an office, civil, military, or naval, in the late Confederate States, shall be qualified to hold a position in the Army of the United States. The Military Committee have on mature deliberation deemed it to be wise to repeal that section. It was properly committed to that committee because the persons named in that section were proposing to receive an office and were to receive it in the Army alone, and it was presumed that the Military Committee ought to have something to say in respect to the character of men who should go into the Army.

I have no bitterness in regard to this matter. I have no bitterness whatever toward any man in the North who in good faith, honestly believing that he was right, pursued the right as he understood it; and I cannot follow the Senator from Vermont in that portion of his argument or appeal or whatever you may think proper to call it. There are some relics of the war left on the statute-book which in my judgment had better not be there. One is the absurdity that the Senator from Vermont, who I have no doubt was truly loyal and patriotic to the Federal Government as any man in the Union, is bound to take an oath that he was remarkably loyal, extraordinarily true to the flag of the Union, when I do not pretend to have been so, and I am excused from taking that oath which he is required to take. That occurs to me to be a supremely ridiculous statute.

The war has been over for seventeen years, and a man who served in the confederate army or in the civil employment of the confederacy in any capacity whatever or in its navy is declared by this statute to have committed the unpardonable sin. "Stand by thyself, come not near to me; for I am holier than thou." I do not like that sort of sentiment. I do not believe in it. I do not think I am any holier than the gentlemen who saw proper to support bravely and truly the flag which they believe to represent the Union. I do not believe in that kind of thing. It is putting the brand of Cain upon every man who ever served in the confederate army or navy or in civil service of the confederacy during the war, in so far as holding a position in the Army of the United States is concerned. It goes no further. He can be a Senator, he can be a Representative, he can sit in Cabinet council, and hold the most important positions connected with the conduct of this Government; he may be the law officer of the Government, and give his statements in regard to the laws which are to control the entire country; that is all right. He may control the postal affairs of this country; that is all right. He is competent to be President of the United States under the law, or to preside over the Senate, or to hold any position whatever save a position in the Army.

I remember a case which came up from my own State, sent here by General Mackenzie, and I think he is a reasonably loyal man. He is certainly so regarded. A bill was introduced and referred by the Senate to the Committee on Military Affairs. Its examination disclosed that a young man who had entered the confederate army when sixteen or seventeen years old, and served through the war, acquired a fondness for military life, and entered into the United States Army in the cavalry. On account of his soldierly demeanor he was promoted first to be a corporal and then to be a sergeant. Then it was ascertained that that was in direct conflict with this section 1218, and he had to be reduced to the ranks because he could not hold a position in the Army. He was competent, he was qualified to stand on guard; he was competent and qualified to wear the uniform of a soldier, but he was not competent to be a non-commissioned officer; in other words, he could go into the Army, and however good a soldier he might be, however true to the flag he represented, he was not entitled to have that promotion which is the pride of every man, private or officer, in the Army who is worthy to wear the uniform of the Army of the United States.

It occurs to me that that is unwise, and, as was said the other day by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] you might take a page who served in one of the Legislatures, and under this section he would be disqualified from holding any position in the Army. This bill confers no appointment upon anybody, but it simply says to the President of the United States, if upon a full investigation and a hearing of the character of a citizen of the United States, who pays his taxes and who is as liable to be called into service as anybody else, if the President believes that man to be qualified for a position he shall have the right to put him there, notwithstanding this section 1218. That seems to me to be a fair and just view of the case.

If this discrimination is to be kept up to the end of all time, no man who served in the civil employment of the confederacy, as the honorable Senator from Arkansas on my left [Mr. GARLAND] did, or who served in the military service, as a good many of us did, or in the confederate navy, can hold the most humble position in the Army. If that is to be the sentiment, if it is to be held out to the world that we are so untrue, so disloyal, so much to be feared by the Government that we cannot be intrusted in any position, then let us know it, let us understand it, be fair about it, be candid about it, and let us understand where our people stand in regard to this matter.

I cannot understand that character of speech which tells us, "We do not want to bring up these old things; we do not want to say anything to arouse feeling," and yet do it and refuse to repeal a section of the law which in its very nature has that effect.

Mr. BECK. Allusion has been made by the Senator from Arkansas to the fact that unless we dispose of this matter in this way there is very little opportunity or prospect of receiving any report in regard to it from the Committee on the Judiciary. I have endeavored for a long time to have this section repealed, because of its flagrant injustice and inherent meanness. I hold in my hand three Senate bills, one dated December 11, 1878, introduced by me, to repeal section 1218 of the Revised Statutes, simply quoting the act it seeks to repeal. It was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. Another was introduced by me on the 21st of March, 1879, which was read twice and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, in the same words, and again on the first day of this session, on the 5th day of December, 1881, I introduced a bill to repeal this section, which was again referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. None of these bills have ever been heard of. I introduced bills, as the Senator from Arkansas very properly remarked, persistently, and I intend as long as I am here to continue to introduce them, one to remove the political disabilities of all men, another to repeal the iron-clad oath, which General Grant urged should be done, and in his messages to the Senate denounced more than once as an outrage on American civilization, and bills, as I have said, to repeal section 1218 of the Revised Statutes whereby the young men of the South are sought to be branded forever, laws which are, as the Senator from Vermont said, to be maintained as a perpetual monument of the rebellion.

Why, sir, this is the poorest and most miserable piece of prejudice and injustice that remains on the statute-book. No young man is now authorized or allowed even to present himself before the President of the United States to ask for any position in the Army of the United States "who has served in any capacity in the military, naval, or civil service of the so-called Confederate States, or of either of the States in insurrection during the late rebellion."

Let me state a case that occurred under my own observation. My attention was sharply called to it, because I went to the Secretary of War with as intelligent a young man as I ever saw, from near Clarksville, Tennessee, some three years ago, who had as high qualifications as any person could well have; yet he could not be recommended nor his case considered, because he had served as a page in the Tennessee Legislature when he was a small boy, knowing at the time no more of the action of the body that he was serving than any page on this floor knows of our proceedings; he had been guilty of no act of rebellion, but he happened to be the son of a poor man, whose father could not send him off to college and educate him, as the sons of many Senators around me doubtless were, during the time he was working to make a living. He had to get him employment in the civil service of the State of Tennessee as a page in the Legislature; yet, forsooth, he stands to-day forbidden by our law even to apply for a place in the Army of the United States. What a burlesque it is that such a law should remain in force, in order to maintain and retain an everlasting monument of the rebellion. Shall we keep that discrimination up against boys, for there is no man who was old enough to take any prominent part in the war who is not over age to-day to apply for any position in the Army of the United States, or that the Senate would be likely to confirm if he should apply?

The statutes now provide that the common soldiers when enlisted must be between sixteen and thirty-five. I do not suppose any lieutenant would be appointed who was over that age. A man cannot be made a lieutenant, I am told, after he is thirty-five. There is no man who was over seventeen years when the war ended who could by any possibility be appointed; none of them could have held any position in the confederate army or navy; all older than that are ineligible, so that the only vengeance Congress can work and the only everlasting monument it can raise to perpetuate the vindictiveness of the spirit of the men who raise it is to erect it over the poor boys who were compelled to take service either under the Confederate States or under some State within the confederacy.

Why, sir, I suppose there are many Senators here who had boys of twelve or fourteen during the war who did not place them in any service, and they are eligible to positions in the Army. They held no office; they were not pages; they were not doing menial work; there was no other work during those years of the war except in the service of the Government. I think Southern men will all tell you there was no money to be earned, except either under the Confederate States or under some State connected with the confederacy. Private employment was out of the question. Every human being who could work, even down to the small boy, was either engaged in making powder, or manufacturing blankets, or doing something or waiting on somebody connected with the Army or with some of the States that were engaged in the war, and these are the only classes of persons section 1218 reaches. This fact, therefore, stands upon the statute-book to-day that, while the sons of Senators here who were educated without having to take employment, the sons of the men of wealth, the sons of the leading officers of the army and navy of the confederacy, the sons of the great politicians of the Southern States, all are eligible to Army positions, all can go to the President and perhaps get many gentlemen on the other side to go with them and recommend them for positions in the Army of the United States, and very properly. I am not finding fault with that. The sons of these distinguished gentlemen are beyond question as true men as any in all the country. I do not want to raise an everlasting monument even over them; but you only reach by this section and you only perpetuate by this section a disability upon the boys who were compelled to work for a living, whose fathers may have been conscripted, whose families might have been starving but for the little pittance they could earn by their labor during those years of strife; and now, forsooth, they and they alone are to be excluded from even presenting themselves and asking for a position in the Army of the United States. That statement of the case is a true one, and it is shameful; yes, disgraceful, that such a section should longer remain as a part of the laws of the United States.

Mr. HAMPTON. Mr. President, I reported this bill to the Senate from the Committee on Military Affairs, and I desire to state the history of the case.

The original bill was one for the relief of Dr. Tebbs. The same bill was passed with very great unanimity by the Senate at the last session of Congress and was lost in the House simply because it could not be taken up. Again this year the bill was brought up and reported favorably, and when it came before the Senate the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] put his amendment upon it and the Senate recommitted it to the Committee on Military Affairs. That committee after consideration reported back the substitute of the Senator from Arkansas favorably, and that is now before the Senate for consideration.

I need not say that I have no personal interest in the repeal of this section. It is scarcely possible that I should ever be called upon to enter service in another war, but I do think that the statute as it now stands on the book is a reflection upon our legislation. I think it is a relic of the war legislation. I think it should be repealed, because now, while some young men who were in the confederate army can enlist, and many have enlisted in the United States Army, they are precluded by the statute from any mode of acquiring promotion, though they may have been the most gallant soldiers in the service. I think, therefore, that it is eminently proper that we should wipe that law now from the statute-book.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator from South Carolina allow me to interrupt him for a moment for a suggestion?

Mr. HAMPTON. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON. The suggestion I desire to make to him is this: I have followed with some minuteness the case of Dr. Tebbs as stated by him before the Military Committee. If I recollect aright, it was the case of a young man who, when only fifteen years of age, went into the confederate service. Now, I suggest to the Senator that he allow the amendment of the committee to be disagreed to and pass the bill as it originally stood, and then let the subject which we are debating now, the proposition for a general modification or repeal of this law, to go back to the Military Committee.

For one I am in favor of amending at least the section which has been referred to. I do not think the subject had as careful consideration in the Military Committee as it ought to have had, and if the Senator will consent to allow the general subject go back we can pass the original bill. It may be, I think it is probable, that there should be some exceptions in this repeal. But by passing the particular bill which was originally introduced and referring the general subject to the Military Committee we shall get early action upon it and have it in a position in which any limitations or restrictions which ought to be imposed upon the repeal can be presented. I hope the Senator will consent to that disposition of the question.

Mr. HAMPTON. I have no authority to agree to any such proposition. I was merely the organ of the committee in presenting the report, and the substitute was offered by the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. GARLAND.] Of course it is competent for the Senate to make any disposition of the subject it pleases; but I can do nothing at all.

I was about to say that I regretted very much to hear the remarks of the Senator from Vermont. His reading of history certainly makes him know that in the old nations they never erected monuments to any one for triumphs in civil wars, and I was sorry to hear him say that he wanted a class of his fellow-citizens to stand as a monument forever of our unhappy war. Nor do I agree with him in assuming to myself what he has attempted to do—pronounce emphatically who was right and who was wrong. My convictions were as sincere as his, and I hope as honest; but I will recall to him an instance that happened during the war and commend it to his consideration. There was an old gentleman who had two sons, one in the Federal and one in the confederate service. In the providence of God they were both brought home to him dead at one time. He buried them side by side, and the only epitaph he put on their tombs was: "God alone knows who was right."

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, very likely the Senator from South Carolina is correct in his illustration. God alone knows who is right now. But men who have responsibilities must decide for themselves and their own actions who is right, for that is what God has made us for, as far as I understand it; and I have yet to learn that this Government stood as a common parent of warring States, children, indifferent a feeling for both sides, and when both sides came back the Government was to say "God forgive us all, nobody knows who was right." I had the impression that one or the other of the children, to use the illustration, was making war on his father and his mother and his creator, and under the Constitution his superior, and therefore there must be a right side and a wrong side.

To be sure the God of battles could only tell which was right and which was wrong, and the God of battles did tell; and the thing that astonishes me is that my good friends on the other side continually insist upon forcing us to say something or to unsay something that obliges us to admit that after all there was not any difference in the sides but that the winning side was just as wrong as the side that lost, and that nobody can tell which way the thing ought to have been determined after all. I cannot agree to that proposition. I do not think the Senator would have agreed to it if the stars and bars were now floating over the Capitol, instead of the Stars and Stripes; there would then have been a winning side and a side that would build its perpetual memorials of its success, not of personal disgrace to anybody—for I do not say that at all—but of the triumph of a government that was to preserve in its statutes somewhere and always that one great truth of the success of a government under a constitution in its own preservation.

It is not the person of this individual who seeks to be an officer, or of any Senator, or of any man anywhere, that I have anything to do with; but I cannot get it out of my mind that the future welfare of this country is in a large measure dependent upon our adhering now to the idea that the Government did achieve the success that it achieved, and that it achieved it upon the principles that it proceeded upon then, liberty and equality, and that are represented in the amendments of the Constitution that grew out of this success, and in the measures of legislation to enforce those amendments that Congress passed. And yet I am not able even to forget as to men these measures that we have taken and to forget the distinction between classes in this country, because year by year and month by month there is one party in this Chamber and in another to which I cannot allude, that whenever it has the power forces upon us and upon the President of the United States as it did three or four years ago measures to repeal and undo everything in the statutes of the United States that have grown out of success over the rebellion and these changes in the Constitution, putting upon appropriation bills riders and threats to the President of the United States that the Government should stop unless every act of Congress that defended civil rights, unless every act of Congress that defended political rights that the Constitution clearly gave, should be wiped out. Still Senators stand up and say how vindictive it is for gentlemen on this side of the Chamber to speak on these matters. If you do not wish these matters spoken of, leave these laws that under your Constitution have been passed to preserve and protect the liberty that the war and the Constitution have now achieved intact and alone, and do not bring forward every chance you have measures to wipe them off one by one or altogether, as you did three or four years ago, and when we resist say "Oh, you are vindictive about the rebellion; you do not allow us at last to win by voting here what we could not win with all our bravery by the sword, and undo everything that has been done."

There is the difference, Mr. President, it is the difference not of personal recollections or dislikes at all. Senators know that; they know that there is not the slightest personal prejudice or hostility on the part of any Senator on this side of the Chamber toward any gentleman who was in the rebellion or who sympathized with it. They know, if they think for a moment, that all we stand for is the doctrine that this Government did succeed upon principles of liberty, that it amended its Constitution accordingly, and passed laws to secure that liberty under that Constitution, and that when they are assailed we mean to defend them if we can. That is all. Is that vindictive? Is that unfair? Is that unkind? It is not, Mr. President. It is not, unless we undo everything and send down to posterity the word to all our children that after all this Union is nothing but what it was claimed to be by those who went into the rebellion, an aggregation of independent States who may separate when they will, and in respect to the citizens of whom even now, under the Constitution, the Congress of the United States has no right to pass laws for the preservation of their constitutional rights.

I am ready to face a question of that kind now and at all times; and my friend from South Carolina and my friend from Kentucky will not misunderstand me, I am sure, in what I am now saying.

I do not wish to take up your time, sir, upon a topic of this sort. I think, as I have moved, that as this measure opened these broad questions not only on this bill but on half a dozen others that are under consideration by the committee of which the Senator from Arkansas as well as myself is a member, it would be wiser to send this measure there for consideration, and I can tell the Senator from Arkansas that so far as I am concerned—and I think I can speak for all my political brethren—we shall be quite ready to meet the whole subject at any time that is agreeable to him.

Mr. HAMPTON. I would make a suggestion which I think will obviate some of the difficulties of the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] and perhaps meet those of the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. HARRISON.] The latter seemed to intimate just now that there was a possibility that, if this statute is repealed, some of those who have been educated at West Point or Annapolis might be restored to the Army. I, for one, am perfectly willing that a proviso shall be put in with regard to that. If it should be offered from the other side, I should have no objection to that.

Mr. MAXEY. I suggest to the Senator from South Carolina that, whatever may be his own individual opinion, that is not the action of the committee, and, as one member of the committee, I should regard it as unjust.

Mr. HAMPTON. I only speak my individual opinion, and not that of the committee, of course. I should have no objection to that, because those persons are all beyond the age for appointment to the Army.

I hope the Senator from Vermont will understand that I attributed no vindictive feeling to him. I thought that he was actuated, and very often is here, by rather a chronic habit of objecting. He remembers perhaps the poem of the great lyric poet of Vermont:

> Our vow is recorded, our banner unfurled:
> In the name of Vermont, we defy all the world.

[Laughter.]

Mr. VEST. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would state to the Senator from Missouri that it is within a minute or two of two o'clock. If he wants to speak longer, the bill had better go over until to-morrow.

Mr. VEST. I do not want to detain the Senate. I simply want to say, as one of the class that comes within the ban of the law that is proposed to be repealed, for I served in the military and civil service of the late confederacy, that I do not believe, and I am glad to say that I do not believe that the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] voices the sentiment of the American people upon this question. I am glad to believe, sir, that the people of the United States, the great body of them, are anxious to obliterate every mark and monument of the late war between the States or between the Government and certain States. I do not believe that the people of the United States in this age and with our civilization desire to erect any monument of that occurrence. Recent events have shown, if they show anything, that the great body of the people of this country, north, south, east, and west, desire, above all things, material advancement and material prosperity without going back to the obsolete ideas of sectional hate and sectional strife.

Mr. President, the Senator from Vermont says that the Government must keep before the people the evidences of its triumphs, that the Government must preserve the fruits of the war. Does that Senator mean to say that this statute is necessary to preserve the fruits of the war, to keep before the people the successes of the United States in that war? Your flag, our flag, waves in triumph in every township of this broad Union. From one end of the Union to the other not one man, woman, or child disputes the national supremacy. Your taxes are collected; your national name is respected. Sir, do the people need anything else to recollect that war except the graves of our common dead and the common gallantry of the soldiers of both sections? Will any Senator on the other side of this Chamber tell me that this statute, conceived in the bitterness of the strife that came just after the war when men's passion were aflame, as sword and bayonet had been aflame throughout the land, is necessary for any purpose except to voice and express the hate that ought to have died with the success of the national Government? Now, I say to the Senator——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Two o'clock has arrived.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope the Senator will be allowed to proceed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be unanimous consent, the Senator from Missouri may proceed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is no objection.

Mr. HAWLEY. The regular order will be resumed at the close of the Senator's remarks

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Certainly, unless the Senate order otherwise.

Mr. VEST. Now I will say to the Senator from Vermont, for one, speaking for myself, why I object to this statute.

When we were received back into the Union—although I believe the dogma of the Republican party is that we were never out of the Union—we came back upon the express terms of equality before the law, or else a fraud was practiced upon the country and upon its history. You meet us to-day as coequals here, representing sovereign States. I ask the Senator from Vermont, if a war should be flagrant now with a foreign nation, would you accept our blood and our arms in defense of this country or not? I ask now the Senate of the United States to say would you expect or would you desire or would you even permit the confederates that fought you in the late war to fight for the country to which they have sworn allegiance or not? If you would, then you should not exclude from the Army and Navy of the United States those whose blood and whose arms are ready for the defense of our common country.

Sir, I do not propose to mince words in regard to this subject now, but I say to the Senator from Vermont that it is useless for him to tell me that he believes my professions of loyalty to this country when he heaps upon my brow the ban of proscription and of hate. It is useless for the Senator to say that he has no personal feeling of unkindness to any Senator on this side of the Chamber, when in the same breath he says, "You are not the equals of the other citizens of the United States; although you say that you are loyal to the Government, we are not willing to trust you."

As I said once before on the arrearages of pensions bill when pending in the Senate, I ask and those who were with me ask nothing from this Government except the simple concession that we were honest in our devotion to the confederate cause and honest when we swear that we accept all the legitimate results of defeat: and to those who risked all and lost all, every just and generous mind should concede that much.

Sir, to-day the people of the United States want peace, not in terms, but peace in fact. They want the material prosperity of the country advanced. They want the past put behind them, except in so far as it may bind the Union closer between the sections by demonstrating in that great war the gallantry of the common American name and the common American lineage. The Senator asks why revive this question? Sir, we simply ask for the legitimate consequences of what the Senator and his colleagues say when they profess to believe that we are worthy to represent sovereign States upon this floor as Senators of the United States. What inconsistency is it when we are admitted here, and our brain, such as it is, is given to the public service, and yet we are told that our hearts, our blood, our arms are unfit for the military or naval service of our common country?

That is the reason why we object to this statute. I object to it because while the profession is that we are believed to be sincere in our professions of loyalty to the Union, this statute says in so many words, "You are unfit to be trusted in the common defense of this whole Union of which you profess to be loyal citizens."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time for the consideration of the unfinished business has arrived. The Chair will, however, take occasion to lay before the Senate some House bills for reference.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Commerce:

A bill (H. R. No. 570) to extend the limits of the port of New Orleans; and

A bill (H. R. No. 707) to amend section 4233 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, in relation to danger signals.

The bill (H. R. No. 869) for the relief of Thomas J. Wharton was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

The bill (H. R. No. 5387) providing for the pay of Rear-Admiral Roger N. Stembel was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

CHINESE IMMIGRATION.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 5804) to execute certain treaty stipulations relating to Chinese.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] to section 15.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I withdraw that amendment, as I was under a misapprehension when I offered it. I thought that the section stood in the bill, but I understand it was stricken out in Committee of the Whole, and therefore I withdraw the amendment so as to leave the question pending on agreeing to the amendment made in Committee of the Whole striking out that section.

Mr. ALLISON. Was the skilled-labor section agreed to in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. MILLER, of California. Just the reverse; it was disagreed to. The fourteenth section was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. That is very remarkable.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The section in regard to skilled labor was stricken out by a vote of 29 to 28.

Mr. MORRILL. I now move a reinsertion of the fourteenth section.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. An amendment of the Committee on Foreign Relations was to strike out the fifteenth section, and that was agreed to in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to strike out the fourteenth section.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is, Will the Senate concur in the amendment of the Committee of the Whole striking out the fifteenth section?

Mr. EDMUNDS. The amendment of the committee having been to strike out the fifteenth section?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes, sir; that was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole striking out section 15?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is the way I understand it, and therefore I withdraw the amendment I offered to section 15, because that section is already stricken out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The vote is to be taken on that question.

Mr. HOAR. The Committee of the Whole have merely proposed to the Senate to strike that out. The section is still in the bill. In the Senate it has not been stricken out.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It was stricken out in committee, and if we agree to what the Committee of the Whole has done, it is out.

Mr. HOAR. Certainly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Will the Senate concur with the Committee of the Whole in striking out section 15.

Mr. HOAR An amendment to the section is still in order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But if the Senate will agree to the amendment made in committee there will be nothing to amend, and if the Senate does not agree to the amendment striking it out, I can then move my amendment.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I intended this morning to call up another matter; but this bill seems to be of considerable importance, and I give way for this bill until it is disposed of.

Mr. FARLEY. Mr. President, I was addressing the Senate yesterday in reference to the amendment that had been reported by the committee in regard to skilled and unskilled labor. I had occasion to remark that the interpretation given by some Senators who had spoken upon that question, and by the President of the United States, and by the Chinese minister, was that that provision in the bill was in violation of the terms of the treaty. Now, sir, I am not disposed to take up the time of the Senate in discussing the proposition as to whether that amendment ought to be adopted by the Senate or not, further than to say that the general sentiment on the part of those on our side of this question, those who are in favor of this bill is that unless that provision is retained in the bill, which has been proposed to be striken out by the Committee on Foreign Relations, the bill will be rendered ineffective for the purposes for which it was introduced. I confess, taking the whole history of the legislation upon this subject, that the party upon whose votes depends the passage of this bill have had very little to do with the preparation of this legislation. In other words, this side of the Chamber, the members of the Democratic party on this side of the Chamber, who have been unanimous in their support of this measure, have not been called into private council to examine or prepare the legislation that was supposed to be necessary in the passage of a law on this subject.

I have been disposed from the outset, I am disposed now, to entirely ignore and lay aside all party considerations in order to obtain this relief which our people so much need. I have not been governed in my action in support of this bill by any party consideration. I have advocated the passage of this measure because I believe that the best interests of the people of the Pacific coast would be subserved by some legislation that would prohibit the further immigration of this element that we complain of as being a curse to our best interests. I, for one, am disposed to ignore party considerations so far as this bill is concerned. But notwithstanding it was a well-known fact that upon this side of the Chamber, so far as this body is concerned, depended the success of this measure, we were not even called into private consultation to determine the character of the bill that might be introduced here; the matter seems to have been conducted in a close corporation; and I am free to confess that there are many defects in this bill, which at this time perhaps it is too late to remedy. On this side of the Chamber there are four Democratic Senators from the Pacific States, neither one of whom has even been consulted as to the character of the bill or its provisions.

Mr. WINDOM. I should like to ask the Senator a question, with his permission.

Mr. FARLEY. Certainly.

Mr. WINDOM. Did not the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations specially invite the Senator to come and be heard on that subject?

Mr. FARLEY. I was about to come to that.

Mr. WINDOM. Did not the Senator appear before the committee and express his views? I am surprised at the statement of the Senator that no one had been consulted.

Mr. FARLEY. This will explain what I meant by saying what I did: I did receive a letter from the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations to appear before that committee upon—what? There were two bills presented which were before that committee for consideration. One was the bill introduced by my colleague before the veto message had been passed upon, which was in fact a notice—not intended so by my colleague; I am not calling in question his good motives—to those on the opposite side of the Chamber who were opposing the bill and who were disposed to advocate and stand by the President's veto that another bill would be introduced before a vote had been taken on the vetoed bill in this body to determine whether or not we could pass it over the veto.

After the vote had been taken here, and the veto of the President had been sustained, I introduced a bill asking for a limitation of fifteen years on the immigration of Chinese. My colleague had introduced a bill for ten years. Although there was nothing said in the message of the President that indicated that he would sign any bill fixing any number of years as the period of limitation contained in it, yet I supposed information might have been received by those who pretend to know that such a bill would meet the approbation of the President. I have no authority for so stating, but that bill introduced by my colleague has never been reported back to the Senate. A similar bill was introduced in the other branch of Congress, and was put through that body in a manner that gave to those upon whom depended its success a chance to say, if they had been so disposed, "We have not had an opportunity even to give the reasons why we support this bill, or why we opposed certain provisions of it; therefore, if the bill shall turn out to be defective, if it shall fail of its object, if it shall fail to accomplish that which we desire it shall accomplish, upon the heads of those who have taken it into this close corporation to determine its character let the responsibility rest."

Mr. MILLER, of California. Will my colleague yield to me for a moment?

Mr. FARLEY. Certainly.

Mr. MILLER, of California. If the Senator sees any defects in this bill, will it not be his duty to move amendments to cure those defects?

Mr. FARLEY. I am aware of that right which I have.

Mr. MILLER, of California. If the Senator fails to move any amendments and the bill should be inoperative or defective, I think he will be liable to responsibility equal to that of anybody else.

Mr. FARLEY. In answer to the suggestion of my colleague, I want to say that this bill seems to have been considered by the Committee on Foreign Relations, which is composed of very able Senators, and they have given it investigation in such a way that no one on this side of the Chamber has had an opportunity to consider it, unless he was on the committee, beyond a general review of the bill. It is now perhaps too late to secure amendments that might be introduced to make the bill in better condition than it is.

The honorable Senator from Minnesota, who is chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, has suggested that I was called before that committee. I understood that I was called there for the purpose of presenting my views in regard to the two bills that were then pending before that committee. I did go before the committee in response to the invitation given by the chairman of the committee. The morning that I was there, there was no quorum present, and no transaction took place; no consideration of either of the bills was taken by the committee, because there was no quorum of the committee present. I received no further notice, and therefore did not again appear before the committee. I learned afterward that the bill was going to be pressed through the House by the gentleman who had assumed or taken control of it, and I saw by the newspaper reports from the Pacific coast that an honorable gentleman in the other branch of Congress [Mr. PAGE] made his report on this bill, and his colleagues from the State of California, two Democrats and one Republican, were not consulted or talked with at all about its provisions, and were not permitted to say one word in reference to its character.

Mr. WINDOM. I want to say, if the Senator will allow me, a single word. The committee traveled out of its usual course in this matter, in order to give to the Senator, who was understood to have a great deal of information on this subject, full opportunity to be heard. I wrote him a general invitation to appear before the committee to give us his views, and to inform the committee as he might think best; and certainly the committee would have been glad to have heard anything he desired to say. We did hear all that the Senator presented that day; and having once invited him to express his sentiments, (and committees do not usually send around to inquire the views of Senators, having traveled out of the usual line of duty,) it seems to me the Senator can hardly complain that he had not full opportunity to be heard before that committee.

Mr. FARLEY. I am not complaining of any want of courtesy on the part of the committee. I hope the Senator from Minnesota, if he so understood me, will take what I say in reference to that matter as being true.

Mr. WINDOM. Certainly.

Mr. FARLEY. I received that courtesy which the Senator has suggested, and I am not particularly complaining of any other proposition, except this, that I took up the Pacific coast papers, some of them, a very small part of them, in which I find dispatches from Washington stating that there is a disposition on the part of the Democrats here to retard and prevent legislation upon this subject. How those dispatches found their way into the press of the Pacific coast States I am unable to say. It is a well-known fact, and known to my colleague, that no Democrat on this side of the Chamber has done any act or attempted to do anything that looked like retarding action on this measure. On the contrary, on the Democratic votes in the Senate depends the success of this measure. I simply say this in answer to these small attempts on the part of a portion, and a very small portion, and not a very highly respectable portion of the public press on the Pacific coast to make party capital out of this question.

Mr. President, I appeal for the support of my statement to the three Democratic Senators from the Pacific coast, who are here and have sustained action in the legislation proposed on this question. The two Senators from Oregon, the honorable Senator from Nevada, [Mr. FAIR,] and myself have never been in any private consultation with either one of our colleagues from the Pacific coast to be advised with as to what legislation was actually necessary on this subject.

While, as I said a moment ago, I do not attach to my colleague any improper motive, I simply say that the action of my colleague in introducing the bill before there was a final vote had upon the vetoed measure, while not so intended, in fact had the effect to mortify those who were disposed to sustain the veto of the President that another bill had already been introduced which might be changed to give them entire satisfaction if the veto should be sustained.

Now, I come to the question of skilled labor, and I wish to notice some remarks of the honorable Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] whom I do not see in his seat, made when an effort was made to refer the bill vetoed by the President to the Committee on Foreign Relations for consideration. What object the honorable Senator could have had in making that motion I was unable to perceive. I am yet unable to perceive the object, unless it was for the purpose of preventing a vote in this body upon that question—to prevent votes from going upon the record showing how gentlemen stood in reference to that vetoed bill—when there was another bill then pending, and that would have been the excuse, I doubt not, of the Committee on Foreign Relations for not reporting the vetoed bill had it ever gotten into the folds of that committee. I noticed that the honorable Senator from Ohio, in speaking of skilled labor, used this language in his speech made on the 5th of April, found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 2609:

> Here is a treaty yielded to us by China for our benefit, not for theirs—they do not claim anything from it—by which they agree that the importation of Chinese laborers shall be suspended for a time in this country.

Yielded to us by the Chinese! They had nothing to gain by it! The honorable Senator forgot to take into consideration that there was also a commercial treaty entered into between the two governments at that time, by which we agreed so far as we could agree to suppress the opium trade. There was a benefit that the Chinese Government claimed to have received; and both treaties that were entered into by the two governments were reciprocal and beneficial to both parties, as was supposed by those who entered into the treaties.

Then said the honorable Senator in that same speech:

> Then you make the word "laborers" embrace a class of people that in no country in the world are classed by the term "laborers."

Let us see.

> A merchant who manufactures and sells his own wares, a mechanic, a blacksmith, the shoemaker at his last who manufactures shoes that he sells himself, the hatter, described by Benjamin Franklin, who makes hats to sell, are included in the term "skilled labor."

The Chinese minister, who objected to the passage of this bill—and his objections were made known to the President, and they seemed to be of so much importance in the view of the executive department that the objections made by the Chinese minister were embodied in the President's veto message—goes to the extent of saying that the laundry business, the cigar business, the shoemaking, the tailoring, the blacksmithing, and all that kind of work is not to be considered as common labor but skilled labor. Now, I say that if that definition is not given by the provisions of this bill as to what skilled labor is or what is intended by the provisions of the bill, we might as well have no bill at all, because every Chinaman that may be shipped to California or to Oregon or Nevada will come as a skilled laborer. That will be the result of it. Therefore I say that the amendment reported by the committee to a very great extent would destroy the effect of this bill. That section was proposed by the honorable Senator from Oregon, [Mr. GROVER,] and it passed and was one of the provisions of the bill that has been heretofore vetoed by the President. It is in the bill of the House, but the committee propose to strike it out.

The honorable Senator from Ohio goes on after referring to this class of laborers, the blacksmith, the shoemaker, the hatter, the tailor, and says:

> I ask if that is a fair construction of the treaty? Is it right? I say it is not, and that some provision ought to be made which would enable Chinamen—

I call attention to the language of the honorable Senator upon this question, and I shall ask the people of the State I have the honor in part to represent and the people of the entire Pacific States to pay attention to the language used by that honorable Senator in favor of referring this bill to the Committee on Foreign Relations—

> I ask if that is a fair construction of the treaty? Is it right? I say it is not, and that some provision ought to be made which would enable Chinamen who are skilled men to come; Chinamen who have a family and have a home and children, educated as many of them are, and we know that some of them are educated as highly as the most refined in our favored land. Why should they be excluded? When they wish to come here as skilled artisans and laborers, wonderfully skilled in certain branches of manufacture, and contribute their labor and mingle with others, why should they not come? All the reasons against cooly immigration cease when you speak of these men. The immigrants that we want to exclude are those men who have no wives, children, or homes, who are mere pauper laborers, who are worse than pauper laborers, who are contract laborers, coolies, a class of men who tend to degrade all labor, who can live so cheaply that no man, white or black, can compete with them. That is the mischief to be guarded against; that is the object to be sought; but now, because we have by the kindness of the Chinese Government—> made a treaty which enables us to limit the importation of laborers into this country, we declare that all Chinese shall be considered laborers except, forsooth, those described in the thirteenth section of the bill.

If the main portion of that language should be inserted into a bill allowing the entrance of the classes of people mentioned by the honorable Senator from Ohio and the classes mentioned in the memorandum which the Chinese minister sent to the President and which was made a part of his veto message, then I say we had as well have no law at all. The objections made by the Chinese minister in this memorandum which was a part of the President's veto message were:

> II. The inclusion of "skilled labor" in the bill is an addition to the words and intent of the treaty. It will operate with harshness upon a class of Chinese merchants entitled to admission to the United States under the terms of the treaty. The shoe merchants and cigar merchants of China manufacture the goods they sell at their places of business, and to shut out the "skilled labor" they need would practically shut them out as well, since it would prevent them from carrying on their business in this country. The laundryman who keeps his shop and has a small capital with which to prosecute his trade cannot in any just sense be included in the class of "laborers," and the merchant tailor comes in the same category.

The laundrymen, as I said yesterday in the few remarks I submitted to the Senate, are a class of people against whom the most bitter prejudices exist in our State. They have monopolized the laundry business in the State of California. There is much feeling on the part of those who have been driven from that employment on which depended the support of themselves and their families. Pass through any city or any village throughout the State of California, and I apprehend it is so in Oregon and Nevada but more so in California because we have more Chinamen, and you will find the laundry notice on all their little huts—"Washing." The men and women, mostly poor widows having families dependent upon them for support, who were formerly in that business have been driven out of employment so far as that branch of labor is concerned by the invasion of the Chinese.

Mr. President, I apprehend that it is hardly necessary to say anything further upon that point. I come now to the ten-year clause of this bill. I introduced a bill immediately after the veto of the President, fixing the limitation at fifteen years. I have no disposition, nor do I intend by any act of mine, to prevent legislation on this subject. I am informed, I do not know that the authority is good, that the President would not sign a twelve or a fifteen or a sixteen year bill, but that he would sign a ten-year bill. I do not know who has authority to say that, but I have heard the rumor that the President would sign a ten-year bill, but would not sign a fifteen-year bill. I introduced the fifteen-year bill in good faith, believing that as it had been intimated that the idea of the President was that the twenty years' limitation was too long, and ten years would meet with his approbation, a division would be advisable. In other words, as we say out West, we might split the difference with him, and give him a fifteen-year bill instead of a ten-year bill; but after introducing that bill, finding that my colleague and others were persistent in their ten-year bill, I have not pressed the fifteen-year bill, nor do I intend to do so now. I intend to yield that point, believing, however, as I do believe, that the ten years' limitation will be inadequate to accomplish the objects that we seek by reason of passing a limitation in reference to Chinese immigration. It will leave it an open question, a question to be agitated from now until the expiration of the ten years, upon the Pacific coast, and it will more or less find its way into partisan politics. It will be so not only on the Pacific coast, but I want to assure my friends on this side of the mountains that it will be so here. I notice large meetings of people in Philadelphia, in Chicago, in New York, and other portions of the States on this side of the Rocky Mountains, that are expressing their sentiments on this subject, who do not desire to see this cheap labor brought into our country to come in competition with those who are already struggling for a maintenance for themselves and their families. Even in the old State of Massachusetts, I find to-day in picking up the newspapers, and for the last two or three weeks, accounts of strikes among the common laborers who are engaged in the manufacturing business in some portions of that State. You find them in other States. Why? Because of the very low rate of wages there paid for their services, and the inadequacy of the amount which they receive to support themselves and their families in their every-day life.

I had occasion yesterday to refer to the character of the Chinese, and it came in the line of my thought at the time to refer to a colony that had been sent up to Massachusetts some years ago to engage in the business of manufacturing shoes. The senior Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] whom I do not now see in his seat, undertook to give me the history in reference to that colonization. I stated that they were the cause of riots even in that staid old Commonwealth. The Senator said that I was mistaken; that I was totally ignorant as to the cause of their going there and the cause of their leaving. He afterward attempted to enlighten me upon that subject. I had not the immediate data before me, but I assert now—I see the junior Senator from that State in his seat—that the presence of those Chinese in the State of Massachusetts, the object of their coming there being known to the people of the town where they were to be employed, had the effect to congregate around the depot where they landed a crowd of people, and that stones were used against those Chinamen, and they had to be protected by the police in marching them to their quarters.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from California will permit me to say——

Mr. FARLEY. I want any information I can get. If I am incorrect I wish to be corrected.

Mr. HOAR. I do not know what the Senator refers to. Very likely the presence of this oriental colony attracted a crowd, such as would be attracted by Barnum's museum, and such as I think would be attracted by the presence of that very distinguished gentleman, the Senator from California himself, whom our people would be curious to hear——

Mr. FARLEY. Would they be likely to throw stones at me?

Mr. HOAR. I was about to make an observation on that point. Whether any boys in the crowd may have thrown stones at those Chinese I do not know; but that any injury was inflicted upon them, that there was anything in the nature of such mobs as were described in the testimony of the witnesses before the Congressional committee having attacked them in California, I utterly deny. They went peaceably and quietly to their work, they remained at their work, visited freely by all classes of citizens. They came and went undisturbed, unmolested, perfectly protected by law for years in that manufacturing village, and I do know that there was not a tithe or a hundredth part of the violence used toward them which I have known used more than once by Democratic ruffians against Republican torchlight processions in our manufacturing villages in heated political campaigns. And in saying that I do not wish to be understood in the least as imputing to the Democracy in my State any more than to any other class of citizens any remarkable or undue violence or outrage. In England and in Ireland everybody knows that at almost every heated contested election the mob on one side or the other will indulge in some violence and outrage of this kind. It has happened in my own State more than once. While I do not know whether it be true or be not true that from the crowd which assembled from motives of curiosity to see these Chinese men stones were thrown, I do know, I think——

Mr. FARLEY. That they were not? Is that what you mean?

Mr. HOAR. The Senator perhaps had better wait and hear what I was about to say.

Mr. FARLEY. I will wait.

Mr. HOAR. I do know that there was nothing which could properly be described as a mob, mob violence, or endangering those people, or as amounting to a very serious and important molestation.

Mr. FARLEY. Were not the police called into requisition to see that the Chinamen were marched to their quarters?

Mr. HOAR. I do not know whether they were or not. I think it very likely.

Mr. FARLEY. If it was necessary to call out the police to see that these people were safely escorted to their place of abode, there would seem to have been some serious molestation to them.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the honorable Senator from California a question.

Mr. FARLEY. The Senator must excuse me. I asked him a question.

Mr. HOAR. Well.

Mr. FARLEY. Now he turns around and wishes to ask me one. That is the difficulty with a great many of us, I admit. I refuse to answer the Senator's question until he answers mine.

Mr. HOAR. I think I have answered the Senator's question. I do not know whether that particular thing be true or not.

Mr. FARLEY. The question I put to the Senator was this: Was there not apprehension of danger; and if there was no apprehension why call the police into requisition?

Mr. HOAR. I dare say it may have been done; I do not know. I never have heard that the police were called out or were not called out, and I cannot answer; but I am willing, if the Senator has any information to that effect, to assume it to be the case. Now, the question I want to ask the Senator from California is this, if he will permit me to ask him——

Mr. FARLEY. With pleasure.

Mr. HOAR. Does he want the truth about this matter, or does he want to get a perverted statement?

Mr. FARLEY. I want the truth.

Mr. HOAR. Now, does the Senator from California want to know himself the fact which he is asking about? If he does, I can tell him it was just this: when these strange people first arrived from the ends of the earth, there was a crowd assembled at the depot in a thickly settled manufacturing village in Massachusetts, and out of that crowd some two or three boys may have thrown some stones, so that the police attended them to the place where they were to live. Does the Senator want to stop at that, or is he willing also to state to his people and put into his speech the fact which I affirm of my knowledge, and affirm with my colleague who has just come in, now sitting by my side, to whom I might more properly have left this colloquy, that those men dwelt in that town thereafter for years as undisturbed, as unmolested, as safe, as much respected as any other citizens of the place in all their legal rights, earning their wages, raising their wages, and staying in their employment until such time as they could do better elsewhere? Now, will the Senator be kind enough to put that into his speech?

Mr. FARLEY. It is not necessary for me to put it there. The Senator has put it there. Why should I go on and put it there now?

Mr. HOAR. Will he be kind enough to take it into his comprehension?

Mr. FARLEY. I will try as far as I am able to comprehend it, but the Senator has put it into my speech, and therefore it will be unnecessary for me to do so.

The Senator asks me if I wish to know the truth. I have gotten from that Senator and from his colleague their statements, and I must accept what they say as being true. I suppose they were both present and know what took place at that time. That being the case their statement will stand with me; but if there are records that show a different state of facts, while I still would be disposed to take the word of either one of those Senators upon any question, the records perhaps would need to be explained away.

Mr. DAWES. If the Senator has any records I should like to see them.

Mr. FARLEY. I have not myself. I understand that there are records which show that when those people landed at the depot a mob of persons, learning what they had been brought there for, to enter into the business of manufacturing shoes, which would be in competition with those who were engaged in that employment, assembled around the depot, and that the Chinamen were stoned and the police were called into requisition to protect them; but the honorable Senator from Massachusetts says that was a mistake.

Mr. HOAR. No, sir, I did not say so.

Mr. FARLEY. What did you say?

Mr. HOAR. I asked the Senator if he would not take into his comprehension what I said.

Mr. FARLEY. The Senator says so many things and sometimes contradictory(as I suppose is the case with myself) that it is hard to comprehend him.

Mr. HOAR. What I said was exactly this: that that crowd very probably may have collected from motives of curiosity, but I can neither affirm nor deny——

Mr. FARLEY. Then it is an open question.

Mr. HOAR. Let me finish my sentence. I can neither affirm nor deny whether some boys or mischievous persons in that crowd threw stones and whether the police came and conducted these people; but I am prepared to affirm that if that happened (which I neither affirm nor deny) there was no riot equal in extent or in danger to what frequently occurs in regard to the political processions of one party at the hands of the other party in ordinary excited campaigns. It was a stone-throwing of the most trifling character. It did not endanger the men; it did not affect their moving about those streets in as much safety as my honored colleague who lived in that town formerly would have moved if he had continued to live there. That is what I said.

Mr. FARLEY. Having got to the point that stones were thrown, now we will leave it at that point.

Mr. HOAR. I only said in regard to that that I did not know whether they were or not. Now, what does the Senator from California mean by saying that he has got to the point where stones were thrown?

Mr. FARLEY. The Senator says that perhaps stones were thrown.

Mr. HOAR. I said I did not know.

Mr. FARLEY. Then the Senator does not know but that a number were thrown, and that the Chinamen were in great danger.

Mr. HOAR. Does the Senator mean to affirm from my saying that I did not know what happened, and then taking what I said might have occurred, that I said it did happen?

Mr. FARLEY. You said you were not there?

Mr. HOAR. Yes.

Mr. FARLEY. You said stones were perhaps thrown?

Mr. HOAR. I do not propose to pursue a colloquy with the Senator in that style.

Mr. FARLEY. The statement amounts to this, that the honorable Senator knows nothing about what took place there. He says they lived there afterward. Let that be so. Suppose they did. I understand the reason of their being there in peace was that they were receiving the same rate of wages that white persons were receiving, and, therefore, there was no occasion for the mob to rise. But I should not have referred——

Mr. DAWES. Will the Senator allow me a word?

Mr. FARLEY. Certainly.

Mr. DAWES. I was not in when this discussion arose. I resided in the town where this took place till within a few years, and I now reside within twenty miles of it, and the trains run a dozen times a day between my own residence and that place. The gentleman who employed those Chinamen was a personal friend of mine and my near neighbor for twenty years; he is now my personal friend, and was here in Washington when this discussion arose in the House, and when for the first time in my life I saw upon the RECORD that a Representative stated that there was a riot when these Chinamen arrived there. The first time I ever heard of it was when I saw in the RECORD of the next day that statement by a Representative from Kentucky. The Representative from that district, my successor, was not present in the House at the time, but in a few days afterward he corrected that statement. When the bill was up here originally the Senator from California made some allusion to it, and I corrected it then. Yesterday I told the Senator, so as I am aware, all I knew about the story.

Mr. FARLEY. I have not referred to what the Senator said.

Mr. DAWES. I will state it, then, myself. The Chinamen came to North Adams under these circumstances: a shoe manufacturer there who employed a large number of men, a good many of them, a large proportion of them, a controlling proportion of them, being precisely that kind of men in reference to whom the Senator expressed apprehension here yesterday that they would commit violence in San Francisco, against whose violence the best people were struggling to maintain the peace very properly in San Francisco, men who go by the name, among shoe manufacturers, of Crispins. They had combined and prescribed terms to this manufacturer, upon which alone he was permitted to manufacture shoes, whom he should employ, and whom he should not employ, and how long he should work them. After taking some advice—I will not say how much; I knew what his purpose was myself—he went to San Francisco and engaged some fifty Chinamen, made a personal engagement with each individual Chinaman to come to North Adams and take the place of those men. Those men were not aware of what his business there was, nor was anybody in North Adams; and nobody in North Adams that I know of ever had seen a Chinaman before. When they arrived at the depot all manner of curiosity seized the people of the town, and they rushed down to the depot in crowds. When the Crispins, who had undertaken to prescribe the terms upon which, and upon which alone, this manufacturer could hereafter manufacture shoes, were aware of what the Chinamen came for, they were angry, just as a certain class of people are intensely angry in San Francisco to-day, and they used violent language all around there; and I can tell the Senator that I heard that one or two of them threw a stone into the crowd, but the police—the ordinary police who are about the town and about their business—interfered, and there was not the slightest trouble after that. The Chinamen went in peace through the streets, a sight the people had never seen before, to their quarters, and went about their work, attracting great crowds day after day from different parts of the county to see these Chinamen work. There never was, with the exception of perhaps a stone or two that I told the Senator of, the slightest violence used toward those people. They adapted themselves with wonderful facility to the new work to which they came. The Crispin idea that they could dictate terms faded out in Massachusetts. These fifty Chinamen were indirectly a great blessing to the other laboring-men in Massachusetts and to the capitalists who employ labor in Massachusetts. The time came when, by their adaptation to work, they were able to produce as much as any other workmen, and they demanded an equivalent for it, and then competition in labor had to settle the question. It was either competition in skill or competition in compensation, one or the other, that determined who should be hired. They were hired on the same terms; they worked on the same terms; they continued on the same terms; they accomplished the same results as others, and the foreigners who came from the east, and the foreigners who came from the west, the Europeans and the Asiatics——

Mr. FARLEY. I did not yield for a speech, but the Senator may go on.

Mr. DAWES. If the Senator does not like to have this kind of a speech, be it so. These workmen understood that there was a public sentiment that was stronger than anything else, that upheld every man, wherever he was born, in the right to compensation for his labor, and to the application of that compensation as he pleased; and that was the end of the experiment.

Mr. VEST. May I ask the Senator from Massachusetts a question?

Mr. FARLEY. If Senators will not take up all my time, I can soon get through.

Mr. DAWES. I was called out of a conference committee to listen to the Senator's repetition of that violence in the town that I lived in so long, and I felt it my duty to vindicate history.

Mr. FARLEY. All right.

Mr. VEST. Of course I know nothing about it personally; but I call the Senator's attention to the fact that the New York Tribune, which was then a leading Republican paper as it is to-day, contemporaneously with the occurrence at North Adams, to which he refers made the statement, as will be seen by reference to its files, that Mr. Sampson, the employer of these Chinese, seventy-five in number—the Senator spoke of them as fifty—was compelled for weeks, if not for months, to employ a guard on the premises to protect them from violence, to put up reflectors so that no one could approach the buildings without being seen by night, and that he expressed his determination, and published it, to spend $50,000, if necessary, to have these Chinese stay in Massachusetts.

Mr. DAWES. Have you the files?

Mr. VEST. Yes, sir.

Mr. DAWES. Suppose you put that statement in the RECORD.

Mr. VEST. This is taken from the New York Tribune of June 18, 1870:

> Mr. Sampson determined to sink $50,000, if necessary, in carrying the thing through. He doubles his night-watch, illuminates the grounds about his building by powerful reflectors, laughs at the threats of the Crispins, and is confident of success as of the rising of the sun to-morrow.

In this same connection, in order to vindicate the truth or to demonstrate the falsehood of history, I call the Senator's attention to the further fact that in the New York Herald of June 26, 1870, are the proceedings of a public meeting, said to have been composed of 4,000 citizens of North Adams, Massachusetts, in which resolutions of a very violent and inflammatory character were passed against the importation of Chinese to that community or that State, and that Mr. Henry Wilson, then a Senator of the United States from Massachusetts, afterward Vice-President, introduced about the same time in the Senate a bill prohibiting the importation or the immigration of Chinese to the State of Massachusetts or to the United States. This history, whether false or veracious I know not, goes on further to say that at the meeting referred to—

> Mr. Troup made an enthusiastic speech and suggested the sending of an influential man to Washington to urge Congressman DAWES to look after their interests and hasten the consideration of Wilson's bill.

Whether the messenger arrived or not is within the consciousness of my friend from Massachusetts; but such is the history and I put it in for what it is worth.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President——

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask Senators to give way in order that I may request the Chair to lay before the Senate a message from the President of the United States.

Mr. FARLEY. Wait until I get through.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is as to violation of law in Arizona.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from California give way?

Mr. FARLEY. I yield.

AFFAIRS IN ARIZONA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which will be read.

The Acting Secretary read as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

By recent information received from official and other sources, I am advised that an alarming state of disorder continues to exist within the Territory of Arizona, and that lawlessness has already gained such head there as to require a resort to extraordinary means to repress it.

The governor of the Territory, under date of the 31st ultimo, reports that violence and anarchy prevail, particularly in Cochise County and along the Mexican border; that robbery, murder, and resistance to law have become so common as to cease causing surprise, and that the people are greatly intimidated and losing confidence in the protection of the law. I transmit his communication herewith, and call special attention thereto.

In a telegram from the General of the Army, dated at Tucson, Arizona, on the 11th instant, herewith transmitted, that officer states that he hears of lawlessness and disorders which seem well attested, and that the civil officers have not sufficient force to make arrests and hold the prisoners for trial, or punish them when convicted.

Much of this disorder is caused by armed bands of desperadoes, known as cowboys, by whom depredations are not only committed within the Territory, but, it is alleged, predatory incursions made therefrom into Mexico. In my message to Congress at the beginning of the present session, I called attention to the existence of these bands, and suggested that the setting on foot within our own territory of brigandage and armed marauding expeditions against friendly nations and their citizens be made punishable as an offense against the United States.

I renew this suggestion: to effectually repress the lawlessness prevailing within the Territory, a prompt execution of the process of the courts and vigorous enforcement of the laws against offenders are needed. This the civil authorities there are unable to do without the aid of other means and forces than they can now avail themselves of. To meet the present emergencies the governor asks that provision be made to Congress to enable him to employ and maintain temporarily a volunteer militia force to aid the civil authorities, the members of which force to be invested with the same powers and authority as are conferred by the laws of the Territory upon peace officers thereof.

On the ground of economy, as well as effectiveness, however, it appears to me to be more advisable to permit the co-operation with the civil authorities of a part of the Army as a posse comitatus. Believing that this, in addition to such use of the Army as may be made under the powers already conferred by section 5298 of the Revised Statutes, would be adequate to secure the accomplishment of the ends in view, I again call the attention of Congress to the expediency of so amending section 15 of the act of June 18, 1878, chapter 263, as to allow the military forces to be employed as a posse comitatus to assist the civil authorities within a Territory to execute the laws therein. This use of the Army, as I have in my former message observed, would not seem to be within the alleged evil against which that legislation was aimed.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, April 26, 1882.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is it the pleasure of the Senate that the accompanying papers be read?

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, sir; let them all be printed and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The message and papers were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had yesterday approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. No. 26) to amend section 2326 of the Revised Statutes, in regard to mineral lands, and for other purposes;

An act (S. No. 361) for a public building at Frankfort, Kentucky; and

An act (S. No. 1677) to amend the act donating public lands to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 1049) to promote the efficiency of the Life-Saving Service and to encourage the saving of life from shipwreck.

CHINESE IMMIGRATION.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 5804) to execute certain treaty stipulations relating to Chinese.

Mr. FARLEY. Mr. President, I do not intend to take up the time of the Senate for more than a very few moments longer, and I hardly deem it necessary to do so, for I do not know that I can throw any further light on the proposition I have been discussing than I have already attempted to present.

Very strange arguments have been made on the floor of the Senate in reference to this proposed legislation. I find the honorable Senators from Massachusetts, both of them, and the distinguished Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] asserting doctrines that if carried out according to their views, so as to prevent legislation on this subject, would force on us the evils that would necessarily flow from a continuation of the immigration of those people not only to the Pacific coast but to other portions of the United States. In my opinion those evils would be almost incalculable. Look at the very case cited, and admitted so far as the two Senators from Massachusetts are concerned, though neither of them was present. Take the newspaper reports, which were read by the honorable Senator from Missouri, the Tribune and the Herald reports of those meetings. The point has suggested itself to me that if it took seventy-five men for a month or two months to guard and protect those people at North Adams, would it not require the Army of the United States to protect the people in Boston against a proportionate number there?

Mr. DAWES. There is no such statement as that. Seventy-five men!

Mr. FARLEY. The Senator from Missouri referred to a resolution passed.

Mr. DAWES. About seventy-five men in a town of 4,000.

Mr. FARLEY. It required that many policemen to protect seventy-five Chinese. How many men would it take to protect 100,000 in the city of Boston?

Mr. HOAR. How many men would it take to protect a class in school?

Mr. FARLEY. I do not know the number.

Mr. HOAR. I am afraid it would be hard on the masters of the district schools.

Mr. FARLEY. I do not know what the Senator means by class. The Senators from Massachusetts are in the habit of referring to classes. The Senator used an expression which called forth what I have had to say in reference to North Adams, speaking of sand-lotters and the danger of violence in California. Why, sir, I want to say to the Senator from Massachusetts that this question of agitation and danger to the Chinese is not confined to what he terms sand-lotters.

The honorable Senator a few moments ago took occasion to refer to the throwing of stones, and said that at Republican processions stones were thrown by Democratic ruffians. I want to say to that honorable Senator that I suppose there are ruffians in the Democratic party, but I think when you come to number the ruffians you will find as many in the Republican party as you will find in the Democratic party. That is not an expression which I would have used, but it has been used; it is before the country; let it go for what it is worth.

The cry in opposition to this legislation, that it is instigated by the rough elements of California, is without foundation. We have rough elements there as you have everywhere else, but that is not the element that prompts this legislation; it is not the element that is now seeking relief at the hands of Congress. It is the producing element of that country, the manufacturers, the merchants, the farmers, the every-day laborers, the very men who make capital and make wealth, that are the very foundation of wealth. The common laborers are the men who are complaining against this immigration. Why should they be termed "sand-lotters?" I know there were men in that organization who were looked upon as a class of agitators, that were bad men, but in that very organization there were a number of good men. There were some bad elements in it, I admit, but you did find some of the best class of citizens who, feeling that they were suffering wrongs at the hands of the Government without protection of law, entered into that organization for the purpose of relieving themselves from the difficulties and embarrassments by which they were surrounded. The manufacturers and layers of brick and the builders of buildings were members of what was called the sand-lot organization, and some of them are as good men, as I said a moment ago, as you will find in any other portion of the United States of America.

The reason why I referred at all to the North Adams matter was to show that even in Massachusetts you were not free from riot. I did it in answer to the continuous charge that this kind of legislation is only desired by that class of men known as sand-lotters and common agitators in the State of California. I thought that had been effectually answered when it was announced in the Senate in the debate on the passage of the bill which was vetoed by the President, by the statement that out of 161,000 votes polled in the State 154,000 votes declared openly against further Chinese immigration. Yet were they all "sand-lotters?" Are the people of California to be termed a lot of ruffians, Democratic ruffians, who would stone Republican torch-light processions, according to the idea of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts?

The honorable Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY,] in his remarks yesterday, which I hoped to have found in the RECORD this morning, took occasion to refer to this proposed legislation in the most detractory manner. He asked day before yesterday that we proceed to the consideration of this measure in silence and in mourning. Yesterday he referred to the character of the legislation as being that of the dark ages, going back thirty years to pick up a statute which was then passed and quoting that as being a sample of legislation of which this was a piece, and said that that was enacted in the dark ages. It was a statute passed thirty-odd years ago in accordance with a provision of the Constitution of the United States, a statute which had been voted for by Daniel Webster and the great statesmen of that day, and yet the honorable Senator from Connecticut held up that statute as one that would be fit for the dark ages. He drew a picture of those who were violating the law and trampling upon the Constitution, and undertook to show that this character of legislation would be read in the future side by side with that legislation which he termed to have been passed in the dark ages.

Mr. Pfesident, if these are the sentiments of the Eastern people, the sooner the Western people know it the better for themselves. No people can afford to suffer the evils that we are suffering by reason of this immigration without the appeals which their representatives are making for them in the Congress of the United States. We are a law-abiding people on that coast. We have never violated the law as a whole. There are persons there who violate the law, as elsewhere, but the better class of people stand by the law and by the Constitution of the country. Such assaults upon legislation of this kind are calculated to irritate and agitate the public mind throughout the country, particularly where the evil exists of which we are to-day complaining.

I do not know that I have anything further to say in reference to this matter. I am anxious to have this legislation enacted as soon as possible. I do not know what the President of the United States will do; I do not suppose anybody else does; but if he will sign this ten-years' bill I am willing to take it. I shall not be the cause of defeating any legislation here that will have the effect to bring about the result which we seek. I believe that the ten-year limitation is too short a time; I believe it ought to be put at twenty years. One of the commissioners who negotiated this treaty with China has publicly stated, and it is published in the press of the country, that while the negotiations were being carried on by the Chinese diplomates the understanding was that the limitation should be thirty or thirty-three years. That is what one of the commissioners appointed for the purpose of negotiating this treaty says. Another commissioner differs with him in reference to that statement of fact. I refer to the statement of Mr. John F. Swift, of California, a gentleman who was appointed one of the commissioners for the purpose of negotiating the treaty, in which he says that the Chinese people would not have complained, notwithstanding the protest of the Chinese minister which the President of the United States sent to the Senate in his veto message, if the limitation had been fifty years; that he fully expected it to be not less than thirty years. Yet the President of the United States, perhaps not knowing the views of the commissioner, took the views, I suppose, of the Chinese minister to justify the veto which he sent to this body.

Mr. VEST. Here is the statement.

Mr. FARLEY. The honorable Senator from Missouri has handed me the statement which was made by Mr. Swift, one of the commissioners, which I will read:

The Call——

The Morning Call, of San Francisco, a leading paper of that city—

The Call publishes an interview with John F. Swift, ex-treaty commissioner to China, who says, regarding the twenty years' suspension clause of the Chinese bill, that the commissioners of both countries contemplated a considerably longer period when discussing the terms of the treaty. The Chinese commissioners understood even better than we did the problem of the competition in labor, and were willing to agree to a means of relief. The time of suspension was thoroughly discussed, and it was agreed that a suspension of thirty-three years, or one generation, would be necessary to remedy the evils complained of. "I fully hoped that a suspension would have been proposed for thirty years. The Chinese Government would not have considered the faith of the treaty impaired if it had been for fifty years or more."

Such is the language of one of the commissioners who negotiated this treaty, but it seems that the statement of the Chinese minister had its influence. I do not say that it controlled the action of the President of the United States, for I am very far from desiring to say anything that could be considered improper about the President. I am not one of those who are disposed to assail the President, because it is his right to veto a bill, and he may have acted, and I am willing to concede that he did act, according to his views of propriety, but I think he acted under a mistaken idea. I think it was a misfortune to the country, a misfortune to the entire people, that the veto was ever made of the twenty-years' limitation bill. Be that as it may, we have to meet the exigencies that now present themselves before us. That being the case, I shall ask my friends, I shall ask every Senator here, to vote for the ten-years' bill without any additional time. I believe that we ought to pass a fifteen-years' bill; but rather than jeopardize any legislation on this subject I will consent, and now ask every Senator who has been in favor of passing any bill here to vote for the bill as it now stands, unless other alterations can be made which will improve the bill in many other respects.

I insist and hope that when the vote comes to be taken upon the clause which was originally put in the first bill by the honorable Senator from Oregon, [Mr. GROVER,] the provision defining skilled and unskilled laborers, it will not be stricken out, and that the amendment proposed by the committee striking it out will not be concurred in.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, I stated yesterday what I repeat to-day, that I did not intend to trouble the Senate upon this bill. I had submitted the reasons why I could not support the bill when it was up before, and I was willing to rest there and leave the measure, if it must pass, without any embarrassment consequent upon anything I might say. I am on my feet only because of what seems to me to be a very strange effort to involve a portion of the people of Massachusetts in that wild and what appears to me to be mad excitement against the Chinese laborer out of which has come this legislation. Had there been no allusion to those people, I should not have said a word.

To my surprise, and in my absence, the whole matter is renewed again to-day. I desire nothing but the truth in the case, but I desire the truth to go upon the record as far as my own State is concerned; I desire it not only for my State, but for my neighbors, with whom I have lived a great many years, and who would justly hold me accountable if I sat here quietly and heard them slandered as they have been to-day.

I do not know but that the Senators from California and Missouri, having what I have now before me, may have been to some extent justified in some of their remarks, but I come back to reiterate the statement that the charge made is wholly without foundation; that there was in fact no more than what I have stated once here to-day; and that what the Senators from those States have supposed sustained the allegation is, when you come to look at even that, an utter failure. It is based upon two statements reproduced here from newspapers, the New York papers of the time. The first of them is what is said to be a letter from North Adams to the New York Tribune of that day. Who the letter-writer is does not appear. Whether he was sent there to produce some sensation that would excel the accounts in the Massachusetts papers of this novel proceeding does not appear. I assume that the gentleman who used this article in support of the bill in the other branch has selected out of the letter the very worst phrase he could find; and it is this:

Mr. Sampson determined to sink $50,000, if necessary, in carrying the thing through. He doubles his night-watch, illuminates the grounds about his building by powerful reflectors, laughs at the threats of the Crispins, and is confident of success as of the rising of the sun to-morrow.

That does not relate any violence, not enough to disturb a leaf. It relates that Mr. Sampson thought the threats of the Crispins that they would do him some injury justified him in taking unusual precaution, just as when there have been incendiary fires in the community a man feels justified in doubling the watch of his private property. It does not show that the slightest piece of violence was inflicted or the hair of a man's head disturbed. It does show that Mr. Sampson was very calm and very confident, as confident of success as he was of the rising of the sun to-morrow. That is all that it relates, except the fact that these Crispins were put out of employment after having dictated the only terms upon which this manufacturer could proceed, themselves having only a residence in this country by virtue of that generous indulgence which they failed to appreciate when they met a foreigner from another shore. That is all there is to that. Then there is an editorial in the New York Tribune. Lord save us from editorials either in the New York Tribune or the Herald. The next extract is from an editorial in the New York Tribune. The editor I do not think knew any more about it than I do. This is the sum-total of that editorial:

The demonstration of the Crispins, whose strike has compelled manufacturers to import these cheap cooly laborers, was serious at first, but having dwindled to mere threats, will result in nothing else.

It was a serious demonstration. I understood always that they were a good deal ruffled, and that although there were no sand-lots upon which they could gather and harangue the people, they were serious, and there never was a more serious sight taken of their way of improving labor in Massachusetts than that sight presented by seventy-five freemen, not bound by any order or secret association, willing to work where they could get the most and for employers who would pay them the most. It was a serious question at the time, but it did not involve any violence. The editorial goes on further to say:

We are glad to have this experiment tried, but we don't like to see crowded New England made the scene as long as unpopulated and just as rich districts are groaning for laborers.

That is not any very strong evidence of violence in North Adams as I understand testimony. I am not a good hand at weighing testimony, but as I understand it, to the best of my ability, this statement of the New York Tribune, the worst that they could find in the whole editorial, is that when the Crispins saw that their plans were being defeated they were serious about it; and while the New York Tribune was glad the experiment was tried it was sorry it was not tried where laborers were more needed. Then the gentleman who uses this in the other branch and who is called in here to aid this matter goes on further and tells the House what he might do. He does not tell what he does do, but what he might do, and I want to read what he says he might do:

I might also have given the details of an indignation meeting held on June 23, 1870, at North Adams—

I wish he had—

in which, as I find from the New York Herald of June 26, three or four thousand people were assembled and to whom fiery and inflammatory speeches were delivered.

The men, women, and children, all told, in that village are about four thousand. There is not a hall there that will hold one thousand.

Mr. VEST. They might have held the meeting out of doors.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator from Missouri is equal to the occasion; they might have held it out of doors. But this is the trouble:

Among others "Mr. Troup made an enthusiastic speech and suggested the sending of an influential man to Washington to urge Congressman DAWES to look after their interests and hasten the consideration of Wilson's bill."

That man Troup is a new character. I never heard of him before. No such man lives in that town. How he came there I do not know. There is no one in the community that I ever heard of by that name. The distinguished Senator from Louisiana [Mr. JONAS] came to my rescue a moment ago and stated that Mr. Troup was a distinguished Greenback speaker from Connecticut or somewhere else.

Mr EDMUNDS. And he has troops of friends. [Laughter.]

Mr. DAWES. He has troops of friends, my friend from Vermont on my right says. He never got as far as Washington. If he did he never introduced himself to me, and I never heard of that meeting before. That is about equal to Falstaff's army, and about as efficient an army, and about as respectable an army, allow me to say.

Mr. Wilson did introduce a bill in the Senate to make the importation of immigrants under labor contracts unlawful. That is the bill which ultimately, as I understand it, became the law punishing the cooly trade. That did not have anything to do with these seventy-five persons who came from San Francisco to North Adams, for I know about them. I not only know Mr. Sampson, but I know in San Francisco the men who engaged these men. I saw them myself in San Francisco, and I know that they made individual contracts with each of these men as a contract is made with day-laborers everywhere in Massachusetts, and having no other element in it; and they came to North Adams upon an agreed price with their employer and went away after they had fulfilled their agreement and he had fulfilled his.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question for information?

Mr. DAWES. Yes, sir.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I ask the Senator whether the contract with those Chinese in San Francisco to come to North Adams was at a less rate of wages than were paid to ordinary operatives in those mills in Massachusetts?

Mr. DAWES. The Senator asks me if Mr. Sampson went to San Francisco and engaged men who had never learned the shoe trade at all, men who were not acquainted with the language, to come to North Adams to learn that trade, and if he agreed to pay them just as much as he would pay a skilled man who had already learned it. That is the interrogatory. I do not think he did. I think he provided in the contract that until they learned the trade and were able to make shoes as well as those Crispins who had undertaken to prescribe terms, he would not pay them so much as after they had learned.

Mr. FARLEY. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DAWES. Certainly.

Mr. FARLEY. Do I understand the Senator to say that the contract was made with those Chinamen individually?

Mr. DAWES. I trust the Senator understood what I said.

Mr. FARLEY. I say I so understood the Senator. I want to say to the Senator that such contracts in the State of California are unprecedented, for the reason that where that number of Chinamen are hired to do any kind of work they are hired through the Six Companies, or the head of the company to which they belong.

Mr. DAWES. There is a good deal in California that is unprecedented, and a good deal that is more remarkable than this constantly happening in California unprecedented, and which would seem to us unsophisticated Eastern men as wonderfully unprecedented. I do not mean to say that Mr. Sampson himself went individually to each one of these men, of whose language he was entirely ignorant. I do say that he employed a man in San Francisco who did understand their language to make contracts with them. Each individual man had his contract with Mr. Sampson, through his agent, to perform in Massachusetts a particular kind of work described, and it was made as fairly and as openly and above reproach as Mr. Sampson ever made a contract with any other man, and no man ever was fairer than he.

Mr. President, I hope this is the last of this North Adams riot or of Henry Wilson's name being brought in here as attempting to keep an honest and free man from an opportunity upon the soil of the United States of earning his livelihood without legislative hinderance.

One word, and only one word, about some other matters said by the Senator from California. He has cited here in defense of a twenty-year bill to-day the statement of one of the commissioners, whose name he gave, that in his opinion a bill prohibiting the immigration of Chinese for thirty or thirty-five or forty years would not be in conflict with the treaty as it was understood by the Chinese. Alongside of that should be the statement of President Angell, one of the commissioners, that they never dreamt of any seclusion that would exceed more than five years.

Mr. FARLEY. They are both leading Republicans, and it is a question of veracity as between the two.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator is not a Republican.

Mr. FARLEY. No, sir; I am not.

Mr. DAWES. And the Senator's use of it is what I complain of. I do not mean to intimate by that that the Senator is not entitled to credit, he will understand me, because of his politics. I do not mean to intimate that.

Mr. FARLEY. I said it was a question of veracity between those two men.

Mr. DAWES. I do not think the question whether those two gentlemen are Republicans or not has anything to do with the statement the Senator made. The statement is made of the opinion of one of them, and the statement is made of the declaration of the other. I desire to have that go into the RECORD along with the declaration which the Senator makes.

One word more. The Senator complains of the allusions to what are called the "sand-lotters" so frequently here. So far as I have used them I want the Senator to understand that I do not mean to say that the Senators who have advocated this bill from the Pacific coast are of that character, or that the majority of the people of those States are of that character, or that any large number of them are of that character, but what I meant to say when I used the term first, and the only use I desire to make of it, is that the best people of the Pacific States—and I know they are a large majority of those people—the law and order loving people of the Pacific States, the intelligent, generous, enterprising people of those States who have built them up and made them what they are, have surrendered to these few persons. At first they resisted, denounced their agrarianism, denounced their violent speeches, resisted them for a while, but they have gradually yielded to their influence. When I have used that term I have not used it, I trust the Senator will understand, as descriptive of the Senators and others who now are supporting this measure, but I use it as descriptive of the source from which has come this measure, out of which it is born, and to express the regret that these good men, in whose keeping ultimately must be the character and the future and the power and influence of the Pacific slope in this Republic, (they must take care of it,) have not succeeded, as I believe they did try to do in the beginning, in putting down this violent agrarianism, and instead thereof have left themselves under its influence, and have been led themselves into these violent measures because they do not see now how they can rescue themselves from the grasp of this violence. That is the only use I have desired to make of it, and by no means to charge the Senators or anybody here advocating this measure with any such disposition or any such character, but to complain of them that they have not controlled themselves rather than to have been controlled by this element.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, as this debate seems to have risen to the dignity of a historical discussion as to the public feeling in the State of Massachusetts in 1870, and as I have the greatest respect for that historic State and the greatest unwillingness to do any injustice either to its people or to their honored representatives, I propose, notwithstanding the request of my friend from Massachusetts, to continue the discussion for a moment or two in order to ascertain whether the strictures upon the sand-lotters of California and the people of California are deserved in the light of events that have come down to us by testimony which would be convincing, I think, to any jury of ordinary intelligence, and whether the same feelings, the same opinions, the same prejudice, if the Senators from Massachusetts so term it, exist even in the God-fearing and law-abiding dominion of Massachusetts itself.

With all due deference to the Senator, [Mr. DAWES,] he has not made out his case that the coming of seventy-five Chinese to that State's domain was not the occasion of great excitement, of indignation meetings, of precautions to prevent attacks upon them, and, as I shall undertake to show by the political history of the Commonwealth, the formation of political parties and the enunciation of political platforms based upon the distinctive feature of opposition to Chinese immigration.

I do not know, except from what my distinguished friend from Massachusetts has said, what his idea is of a state of profound popular tranquility and peace. In my State, accused of being given over to border ruffianism, to the James brothers, to mail robbing and murder upon the highway—even there when a gentleman employing seventy-five laborers of any sort finds it necessary to use bull-dogs, policemen, and reflectors, and says he will spend $50,000 in order to carry out the experiment, we assume that there is not a state of profound tranquility such as the Senator said existed then in the State of Massachusetts.

More than that, if the testimony, the contemporaneous testimony, I may say, of the newspapers of that time were manufactured by these editors with mendacious foresight and prophetic lying, and they made the statements as to the Chinese at North Adams knowing at the time that the occasion would afterward arise when it would become pertinent to a discussion in the Senate of the United States, even then, if that be the case, still contemporaneous history shows that there was political excitement in Massachusetts over Chinese immigration, because, as can be found by reference to any political text-book in the same year, in 1870, two conventions were held, and so great was this issue, so salient was this angle in popular opinion which the leaders of those parties sought to reach, that in the two platforms of the two parties were incorporated the planks of opposition to the further immigration of Chinese into the State of Massachusetts.

Aye, sir, more than that; at the following elections the two candidates standing upon these platforms received one-half of the votes of the State of Massachusetts. What other issues were in those platforms it matters not now to inquire; there stood the distinctive issue, because a new issue, not the tariff, not the distribution of the proceeds of public lands, not the United States Bank, none of the stale, flat, and unprofitable issues of the past created excitement and popular feeling, but a new issue, an issue that in all ages of the world has aroused the passions and inflamed the blood of men, right or wrong, beyond all others, the issue of race.

Sir, is it necessary to go back in history to find how violent is the feeling thus engendered? Look at our steady forefathers of England. When upon the accession of James the First to the English throne his countrymen, the Scotch, came in hordes to partake of his new-found honors, the literature of the day is full of the abuse and even of the proceedings of meetings to denounce the Scotch who were coming to take possession of the fair fields and the wealth of England, and that in a nation proverbial for its law-abiding, conservative spirit, and against a people of the same race, the countrymen of Scott and Burns. No wonder that in Massachusetts there existed feeling and excitement against a race so utterly dissimilar and foreign to the people of New England as the Chinese.

But more than this: to establish the fact that my friend from Massachusetts, and I say it respectfully, is mistaken as to the public feeling in his own State, besides these platforms, besides these votes, the great leader of the Republican party of that day in his State, notwithstanding my friend's request I dare to mention his name again, Henry Wilson, saw proper to come to the Senate of the United States and introduce a measure which prohibited the introduction of cooly labor, my friend says. But he expounded that bill and gave his opinions in a speech which he delivered in 1870 upon this floor; and what said Mr. Wilson then?

I think the time has come when we should have some action upon this subject—

Referring to the Chinese question——

Mr. DAWES. What is the Senator reading from?

Mr. VEST. I read from a speech delivered by Mr. Wilson in the United States Senate on the 23d of June, 1870.

Mr. DAWES. In what number of the RECORD?

Mr. VEST. It is found on page 40 of number 66, the RECORD of March 17—not the one from which the Senator quoted, but another. This was when Mr. Stewart attempted to call up his anti-Chinese bill, Senate bill No. 973. Mr. Wilson said:

I think the time has come when we should have some action upon this subject; for it does seem to me at the present day that there is a conspiracy of capital in this country to cast a drag-net over creation for the purpose of bringing degraded labor here to lower and degrade our laboring-men. And I think it is time to meet that question.

The then Senator from Massachusetts, accurate in the use of language, a statesman who weighed well his words because he was one of the great leaders of the Republican party, does not say cooly labor, but he says degraded labor brought to this country for the purpose of competing with the labor of citizens of the United States. Even if the bill introduced by the Senator from Massachusetts at that day, Mr. Wilson, applied only to cooly labor it established the general principle and was in accordance with the feeling of the people of his State that the Chinese should not come to this country to compete with the laboring classes of America. I stand here to-day to announce that doctrine and to advocate it, and to cast my vote for it. When the junior Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR,] for whose learning and eloquence I have the greatest respect, (and I read his speech last night, for I was detained from the Senate at the time it was delivered; I read it with great pleasure and great attention,) declares that this country is to become the great missionary station of the world, that the Declaration of Independence meant that our institutions were made not for Americans and for their descendants, but for the whole world to come here and take possession of this continent, bought with our blood and our treasure and that of our fathers, I deny the doctrine, æsthetical as it may be and much as it appeals to the feeling of missionary Christianity among our people.

Sir, this is a question of practical statesmanship. I am first for my own people against the world. I am first for the American system, which protects the labor and the interests of the American people before all others.

What is this Chinese immigration? Are they citizens of the United States? Do they come here to meet the reciprocal obligation between our people and the Government to which they owe allegiance? I understand the doctrine of government is that government protects the citizen in life, liberty, and property, and the citizen assumes the responsibilities and the duties of allegiance to the government and a part in the government of the country itself. The greatest responsibility and the greatest duty of any dweller in these United States is his share in the Government and the legislation of this great country. Do the Chinese come here to share these responsibilities? They are parasites, like those insects which fasten themselves upon vegetables or upon animals and feed and feed until satiety causes them to release their hold. They come to this country not to partake in the responsibilities of citizenship; they come here with no love for our institutions; they do not hold intercourse with the people of the United States except for gain; they do not homologate in any degree with them. On the contrary, they are parasites when they come, parasites while they are here, and parasites when they go.

But a few weeks have elapsed; a few days I might say, since the velvety ears and silken consciences of gentlemen in this Chamber were lacerated and torn over the crime of polygamy, and we passed a bill of attainder, as I honestly believe, to strike down polygamy upon the plains of Utah. There must be but one wife in our God-loving and God-fearing civilization. Break through the Constitution, tear down its prohibitions, for a man shall have but one wife and one concubine in this God-fearing, God-loving country of ours. But to-day these same gentlemen are here exhausting logic, beggaring rhetoric, tearing the language to tatters to tell you that these Chinese whose religion is polygamy, whose religion it is to have all the wives they can buy and all the concubines they can barter for, shall be permitted to come in hordes to this country. More polygamy in the shape of Chinese, but none for white men who are our citizens. That is the doctrine which is preached to-day.

The Chinese are not only practical polygamists, but it is their religion. There is not an American instinct among them. The emperor is the head of the church and the head of the state, and despotic in everything, both as to church and as to state. They come among us and are fungi upon our body politic, and they take from California $45,000,000 annually to be carried back to the celestial kingdom. Even when dead—as part of their contract and part of their religion—the dead-cart comes to carry back their polygamous ashes to the graves of their polygamous sires.

Yet we are told that the Congress of the United States must legislate to strike down polygamy by means outside of the Constitution even, but the Chinese, the almond-eyed idols of the Senators from Massachusetts, are as sacred as the holy elephants of Siam!

Mr. President, for one I am for my own people first. The adult male population of California to-day is, I believe, some two hundred and sixty thousand. Seventy-five thousand adult Chinese are now in the single State of California alone. Put that proportion of Chinese in Massachusetts, and Mr. Troup's eloquent stump speech made at North Adams would not amount to the first letter in the alphabet compared to the vehement eloquence of my distinguished friends from Massachusetts. Put the same proportion of Chinese at Plymouth Rock and what would avail the memory of the illustrous men who brought with them civil and religious liberty to those historic shores? Resolutions and stump speeches and appeals to Congress would take the place of the æsthetic harangues which we hear to-day.

I say there is not one State in this Union that would not rebel against a population like that inflicted on California. But a few short years or months ago, when the negroes, allied to us by a thousand acts of kindness, mingling with the American people, (a dependent race, gentle, amiable, I shall not say and could not say one word against them, for every tie of infancy, every memory of childhood, is mingled with recollections of that race,) under some strange and phenomenal excitement, undertook to find a new home in one of the great States of the Northwest I well remember the people of that State rose upon the borders where they were about to land and prohibited the steamers from putting them upon their soil. It is true that afterward they went into the back counties, and I trust to-day are peaceable and prosperous citizens; but I mention this to show that the people of California are not alone in their belief that this is under God a country of Caucasians, a country of white men, a country to be governed by white men.

As the Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES] said, rising above party, your experiment in the Southern States of putting the negro above the white man is a miserable failure, and it stands to-day a monument to the fact that the intellect of the Caucasian race, bayoneted to the earth, plunged into blood up to the chin, will yet rise to the full height of the destiny which God has placed before it. The brains, the energy, the intellect, the sinews and nerves of the race to which we belong will never be trampled under foot by Mongolian, or African, or mixed or Indian blood. Nothing except its own blood, coming with superior force and equal brain, will ever be able for a single instant to make it lower its lofty crest.

Sir, I had not intended to discuss this question. I only wished to emphasize what in my judgment is the great key-note to the whole of it. Not in the learned and eloquent speech of the junior Senator from Massachusetts does he meet the proposition as I have put it. Nowhere in this whole debate in either House of Congress has the evidence been brought that the Chinese come here for any other purpose but to fatten upon the people of the United States and carry their plunder back with them. They are not of us; they are not with us. They cannot be made American citizens by any process known to our laws or even to the laws of God himself. They are made for a different destiny. They are crystallized in their habits and their opinions.

In this morning's paper I saw, copied from a San Francisco journal, that now upon the boisterous waves of the Pacific rocks a vessel filled with Chinese women, brought to this country for what? Brought here to dispense the smiles of wife and mother over happy homes? Brought here in order to be the conservative influences of a healthy civilization? Brought here in order that woman may be elevated and become the great center of all that is holy and refined and loved among men? Oh, no; brought here for the single and sole purpose of ministering to the lust and appetite of those who come here to make money to buy women with. And still our statesmen gagged at polygamy in Utah!

Strike down white polygamy in Utah, but let in the tawny curse through the Golden Gate!

Mr. President, for myself, when my people of the Pacific States, blood of my blood and bone of my bone, call to me, "Deliver us from the body of this death, deliver us from this incubus and these fungi which are fastened upon us," I shall not be deaf to the appeal. As Prentiss, of Mississippi, said once, "I am first for my own hearth, then for my county, then my State, then for the Union, and then for the world." Sir, in the concentric circles of the human heart comes at last the formation of a great Government and a great State. Take away the individuality, the home feeling, the home love of a man, and what is he? I oppose woman suffrage because it brings down the deity of home, woman, as wife and mother. I oppose it because it destroys all that is conservative and sacred in society.

For the same reason, among others, I oppose Chinese immigration. They have no homes with us; they come here to carry back $45,000,000 annually from the people of California, and leave behind them only the memory of their vile habits and their most infamous doctrines.

To the thrifty German, the generous and gallant Celt, the hardy Scandinavian, to all who come to share the responsibilities and work out the problem of our civilization and destiny, to all who seek home and shelter in our vast domain, fling wide the portals; but to the people that come not for homes or shelter but only for gain, who have no share in our destiny, no love for our institutions, no reverence for our religion, we have the right to say, and do say, "You have no lot or part in this great matter."

Sir, I have no stings of conscience when I am told that I violate the Declaration of Independence. It says that the enjoyment of life, liberty, and property are inalienable rights; but the Constitution of the United States, which I have sworn at that desk to support, says that, in order to form a more perfect Government, we make this Constitution for ourselves, not the Chinese—for ourselves and our children after us. I desire for myself to leave no better legacy than that I have voted for a bill which says to all the world, "if you desire to partake of the blessings you must partake of the responsibilities of American citizenship; but if you come only to prey upon the people of this country without assimilation, without homogeneity, then we say to you in the holy duty of protecting our own rights, our own people, our own industries, go back to the country to which you rightly belong and to the institutions which you prefer to our own."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, striking out the fifteenth section of the bill.

Mr. GROVER. There was an amendment offered to that amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has been withdrawn.

Mr. GROVER. I will just say one word upon this question. The President has not opposed this clause in the bill, but approves it, so that I will say to the Senate in voting to retain this section they will not vote against the objections of the President.

Mr. HAWLEY. Is there any such expression as that in the message?

Mr. GROVER. There certainly is.

Mr. HAWLEY. That the President approves that section? I ask not that I care, not that it is my duty or business to know anything about it or as affecting my vote at all.

Mr. GROVER. He states as a proper construction of the treaty that we can reject all except those named as permitted. I will call for the reading of that clause of the message of the President.

The Acting Secretary read as follows:

> As to the class of persons to be affected by the treaty, the Americans inserted in their draft a provision that the words "Chinese laborers" signify all immigration other than that for "teaching, trade, travel, study, and curiosity." The Chinese objected to this that it operated to include artisans in the class of laborers whose immigration might be forbidden. The Americans replied that they "could" not consent that artisans shall be excluded from the class of Chinese laborers, for it is this very competition of skilled labor, in the cities where the Chinese labor immigration concentrates, which has caused the embarrassment and popular discontent. In the subsequent negotiations this definition dropped out, and does not appear in the treaty. Article II of the treaty confers the rights, privileges, immunities, and exemptions which are accorded to citizens and subjects of the most favored nation upon Chinese subjects proceeding to the United States as teachers, students, merchants, or from curiosity. The American commissioners report that the Chinese Government claimed that in this article they did, by exclusion, provide that nobody should be entitled to claim the benefit of the general provisions of the Burlingame treaty but those who might go to the United States in those capacities or for those purposes. I accept this as the definition of the word "laborers," as used in the treaty.

Mr. HARRISON. I only want to make a suggestion. In the treaty the word "laborers" is used. I take it that it is not in the power of Congress to enlarge the meaning of that word. Whatever it meant in the treaty it would mean the same thing as used in the law; we cannot make it mean more than that. Therefore, why not let it stand in the law as in the treaty, and let the use of that word include what it will?

Mr. GROVER. I object to the proposition of the Senator from Indiana for the reason that the word can be defined in different ways, and if it is left to be construed by those who administer the law they will have to determine it either one way or the other, or we shall lose the beneficial effects of the law.

Mr. HARRISON. It is possible that the Senator is right in saying that the word may be construed differently; but can we enlarge the meaning of it as it is used in the treaty? That is the question I present. If we use the same word in the law that is used in the treaty we are going as far as we can go, for we cannot enlarge the word as it is used in the treaty.

Mr. GROVER. Then I ask that we put a legislative interpretation upon it to enable those who are unlearned in the law to know what they are doing when they are administering the law.

Mr. MILLER, of California. In the original draft of the bill there was no such provision as this. There was nothing in the bill to define what the word "laborers" meant, it being supposed by the framers of the bill that whatever interpretation might be placed by the courts upon the word "laborers" as used in the treaty would govern, notwithstanding a definition might be given by Congress. In other words, even if we undertook to define the meaning of the word "laborers," that definition would be construed with the treaty by the courts in such a manner as to harmonize the treaty with the act of Congress. We start out with the presumption in the beginning that Congress will not legislate to violate a treaty, so that in fact it is probable that the words of the treaty would govern unless there was a plain intent manifest that Congress intended to violate the treaty or legislate in conflict with it. That intent appearing, there is no question that a subsequent act of Congress would override a former treaty.

These were the reasons why there was no attempt at a definition of the word "laborers." I do not believe that the amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon, which constitutes the section now contended for by him, does enlarge the meaning of the word as used by the treaty. I do not know but that it restricts the meaning. I had no objection to it, because I believe that finally the words of the treaty will govern, but there is the fact to be considered in reference to it that we can arrive very nearly at a definition of what is a skilled laborer. It means, I apprehend, an artisan, a mechanic, or a laborer who is skilled in his employment, whose skill or knowledge or use of his faculties forms the most important factor in his labor. What is an unskilled laborer? An unskilled laborer, I suppose, is one who is totally without skill. I suppose that the man who shovels earth or carries a burden would be called an unskilled laborer. It is true that skill is an element perhaps in all labor, but men are skilled laborers in degree. Between the unskilled laborer who is a man totally or nearly without skill in his employment, and the skilled laborer who is an artisan or mechanic, there is an intermediate class who might be construed to be neither the one nor the other.

I do not say that such an interpretation would be given to this section, but it might be. I think it would be straining a point to do it. I have no objection to these words, because I apprehend that whether they do include all laborers, skilled and unskilled, and the intermediate class, the words of the treaty would finally govern. Our object, of course, is to include in this description all classes of laborers. The truth is, I suppose, that the word "laborers" is intended to be descriptive of a class of people perfectly well known in California and throughout the Pacific coast, and is not intended to include those of any other class, such as traders or bankers or professional men as lawyers or doctors. I imagine there would be no very great difficulty in arriving at what was meant by the commissioners on both sides when they used the word "laborers."

If any one can show a good reason for apprehension that skilled laborers, so called, would come into the country under this bill unless this section were adopted, I should certainly desire to have it adopted. Otherwise I should not care anything about it.

Mr. GROVER. I will read from a journal received this morning, showing the apprehension in California. I read from the Daily Record Union of April 22, which discusses the amendment made by the committee striking out the section when the bill was reported to this body.

Mr. BUTLER. Published where?

Mr. GROVER. Published in Sacramento, the capital of the State of California. Under the heading of "The Chinese Bill" the paper says:

> Among the amendments to the House Chinese bill in the Senate committee is the excision of a provision to the effect that the word "laborers" shall be held to include artisans and miners. * * * The word "laborers" may be construed to mean simply day-laborers or unskilled workmen. That, indeed, is its most obvious signification, and for that reason the addition of the provision struck out by the Senate committee is not only not a redundancy, but it is absolutely indispensable to the effectiveness of the bill. Should it be passed without that clause we are confident that a successful effort will be made to evade its provisions by pretending that all the Chinese who come here subsequently are not "laborers," but skilled workmen or something else which the law does not cover.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator from Oregon allow me to make a suggestion to him? He reads an extract from a paper to the effect that the word "laborers" as used in the treaty, or as used in the law, may be limited by a meaning applied to those who are unskilled. If the courts should so decide, giving that meaning to the word "laborers" as used in the treaty, would the Senator from Oregon be in favor of going beyond what we are authorized to do by our treaty?

Mr. GROVER. I will answer the Senator from Indiana in this wise: the commissioners on the part of the United States who negotiated this treaty are unanimous in their expression that this clause is properly in the bill.

Mr. HARRISON. It reminds me of a will case that I was once trying when the lawyer who drew the will was on the other side. There was a great deal of controversy about its meaning, and he undertook to settle it by saying that he wrote the will and knew what it meant. It seems to me that is a parallel case with our commissioners undertaking to say what the word means.

Mr. GROVER. I will add to what I remarked before that the President of the United States, after considering the protest of the Chinese embassador and reading what the American commissioners said, decided that this clause was correctly in the bill. Therefore, after those two authorities most nearly connected with the negotiations of the treaty have decided that this clause is correctly in the bill, and after the latest expression from California has decided that there will be an evasion if this clause is stricken out, I take the position that the law, if against the judgment of the empire of China, will stand notwithstanding the treaty. If any court should decide that there is a conflict between the law and the treaty, I think the treaty will go to the wall.

Mr. HARRISON. That does not answer my question. Is the Senator from Oregon in favor of driving the treaty to the wall by legislation here?

Mr. GROVER. I think I have answered that sufficiently in stating that the commissioners and the President have given their construction of the treaty. That is the American view of it, and I follow that.

Mr. HARRISON. That does not answer the question at all. The question I asked the Senator is whether if the treaty and the law in the section to which he has referred are in conflict, he still believes in passing the law and driving the treaty to the wall? or in other words trampling upon our treaty obligations?

Mr. GROVER. The Senator presumes a case which does not exist. The strongest authorities which we can cite—those engaged in making the treaty—decide that this is properly in the bill; and I stand by those authorities.

Mr. LAPHAM. Mr. President, I have been of opinion from the commencement of this discussion that the safer way is to use in this bill the language of the treaty, and not to undertake anything by way of change or of definition. That should all be left to the future determination of the two powers entering into the treaty, as will be obvious from a provision of the treaty to which I shall presently call attention.

My main object in rising at this time is to suggest that those gentlemen who have chosen in the course of this discussion to more than intimate that it was improper for the President of the United States to consult with the Chinese minister before determining his action upon the bill which was vetoed, have fallen into a great error with respect to the whole scope and object of the treaty. It will only be necessary for me to read the fourth article of the treaty to show that the action of the President was not only discreet and wise, but called for by the very spirit and language of the treaty itself.

Article 4 of the treaty is as follows:

> The high contracting powers having agreed upon the foregoing articles, whenever the Government of the United States shall adopt legislative measures in accordance therewith, such measures will be communicated to the Government of China. If the measures as enacted are found to work hardships upon the subjects of China, the Chinese minister at Washington may bring the matter to the notice of the Secretary of State of the United States, who will consider the subject with him; and the Chinese foreign office may also bring the matter to the notice of the United States minister at Peking and consider the subject with him, to the end that mutual and unqualified benefit may result.

It will be seen from the language of this provision of the treaty that the whole object of it was to prepare the way for arrangements between these governments which would in the end be mutual and satisfactory to both, and it was the very highest part of executive wisdom for the President to have gone to the Chinese minister or to have allowed the Chinese minister to come to him, and suggest with reference to the bill, before determining whether to affix his signature to it or not; it was within the spirit and scope and intent of the treaty, as understood mutually by the parties before it was agreed upon. This whole article clearly foreshadows that such was to be the policy.

Now, upon the very question of what is the definition of the term "laborer," if we follow the language of the treaty and use the term "laborer," that will be a subject for future consideration between the Chinese minister and the Secretary of State. We cannot here, without violating this treaty, fix an arbitrary definition beyond which we cannot go or behind which we cannot fall. If we do that, we do injustice to its very language and spirit.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I wish to call the Senator's attention to the language of the 4th article of the treaty, which he read, and to ask him whether that does not apply to a bill after it has become a law, of which the Chinese Government may complain? I have no disposition myself to criticize the action of the President, but I understand the Senator to justify the action of the President, before the bill which had passed both Houses of Congress became a law in consulting the Chinese minister to ascertain whether it would be in harmony with the will and wishes and pleasure of the Chinese Government. I understand that provision he has read from the treaty to apply to a measure of legislation after it has become a law, of which the Chinese Government may complain, and not to a law in embryo, which has not yet received the signature of the President.

Mr. LAPHAM. Literally it is true, as the Senator from Delaware suggests, that the specific terms of this section provide in relation to communications which are to take place after the enactment of laws by Congress; the Senator is right in that respect; but that is not the fair spirit and interpretation of this provision; that is adopting the letter which killeth and forgetting the spirit which maketh alive. The object of this provision was to have whatever legislation should take place between the two countries mutual and satisfactory to both, and therefore that action of the Executive, about which so much has been said, I beg to repeat again, and in regard to which it has been more than intimated that he acted unwisely and improperly, was not only wise, but prudent, in view of the provisions of the whole of this treaty.

My only object was to call attention to this by way of suggesting that if we are to have between the Chinese minister and the Secretary of State, or between the United States minister at Peking and the Chinese authorities there from time to time communications with the view of determining what is proper in this respect, for us to undertake here to say what the term "laborers" as used in the treaty shall mean, for us to undertake here in advance to give a definition to that term is an improper and unwise act of legislation on our part.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I concur thoroughly with the suggestion of the Senator from Indiana that we cannot enlarge the meaning of the term used in the treaty by our action here. The term "laborer," whatever it may mean, is used in the treaty, and I apprehend we cannot enlarge what is included in that term without doing violence to the treaty. But it has been shown by the Senator from Oregon that in the negotiations which led to this treaty the negotiators on both sides did understand that that term was to include not only the common laborer, but the skilled laborer, that might desire to come to this country; and the President of the United States, after having examined fully the negotiations between the negotiators, accepts the construction of the American negotiators, that skilled laborers were included in the term "laborers." If that is true, then it occurs to me that it is eminently proper in this bill that we should not only use the term "laborers," but use the term "skilled laborers," because this law is to be put in execution by agents, by some persons authorized by the Government of the United States to put it into effect, and we have provided specific penalties for parties who may be connected with the execution of this provision of law for a violation of it.

For instance, the owner or master of a ship may consider that if he brings skilled laborers to this country they are not included in this general term "laborers," and he becomes amenable to the penalties of this bill for acting upon his construction if he does so. So of custom-house officers or others who aid and abet the landing of persons who are obnoxious to the provisions of this treaty. While they might claim that they were acting under the idea that skilled laborers were not included in the term "laborers," putting their own construction upon the act, they might be subsequently held to the penalties provided in this bill for a violation of its provisions. I think, therefore, that it is eminently proper that in this bill, as it is to be executed by other parties before the action of the courts in the construction of this measure, we should advertise them at once what is meant and intended to be included in the terms employed in this legislation.

So I think it is not only right that we should do it, but it is proper and just to the men who will fall under the penalties of this law for a violation of it unless such a construction may be put upon it. I shall vote for it in the interest of such parties, not believing that it violates the provisions or intent of the general term, and I shall vote for it because I think it is in the interest of ship-owners and ship-masters and custom-house officers and others who will have to superintend the execution of this law, so that they shall be plainly instructed as to what is the intention of the act.

Mr. MORGAN obtained the floor.

Mr. PLUMB. Will the Senator from Alabama yield a moment until I present a conference report?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. PLUMB. I move, then, with the consent of the Senate, that the present order of business be laid aside.

Mr. HOAR. That is not necessary; a conference report is privileged.

Mr. PLUMB. There are some reasons why this report should be considered this evening if possible, which concern the convenience of the other branch of Congress.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is a privileged question. The report will be received.

THE POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PLUMB. I present the report of the conference committee on the Post-Office appropriation bill, and ask to have it read.

The Acting Secretary read as follows:

> The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3548) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:
>
> That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 2, 6, 11, 18, and 20.
> That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 14, 16, and 19, and agree to the same.
>
> Amendment numbered 15:
>
> That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 15 and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: Strike out all of said amendment and insert in lieu thereof the following: "For necessary and special facilities on trunk lines, $600,000; said facilities to be extended as far as practicable to the principal cities of the United States;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 17:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 17, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: Add at the end of the amended paragraph the following: "And the Postmaster-General is authorized to designate postmasters at Presidential post-offices as disbursing officers for the payment of the salaries of the officers and employés of the postal service concerned in the transportation of mails or in their distribution in transit, and for such other payments as they are now authorized to make from postal revenues;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 21:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 21, and agree to the same, with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed, insert "$1,902,177.90;" and the Senate agree to the same.

P. B. PLUMB,
W. B. ALLISON,
J. B. BECK,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

L. B. CASWELL,
J. G. CANNON,
E. JNO. ELLIS,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. PLUMB. I will briefly explain the provisions of the bill as now reported as compared with those as passed by the Senate.

The first amendment which was the subject of controversy was in regard to advertising in the District of Columbia. After consultation it was thought inadvisable to act on that question on an appropriation bill, as it seemed to present some matters of importance with regard to other localities as well, and it was not found practicable to meet the views of the Senate committee upon the question of local advertising without entering upon these other questions which are of larger scope. The Senate therefore recede from that amendment.

It also recedes from an item of $10,000 which was added to miscellaneous and incidental expenses of the office of the First Assistant Postmaster-General.

It recedes from an item in regard to contracts. The Senate provided by amendment that the Postmaster-General, as to contracts hereafter made, might in case the contractor sublet his contract declare the contract off and enter into a contract with the sub-contractor. The Senate recedes so far as that applies these provisions to contracts hereafter to be made, and does that in view of the fact that the amendment of the Senate, leaving the discretion with the Postmaster-General to do this whenever he sees that the interests of the service may require it, is agreed to by the House.

The next difference was in regard to the necessary and special mail facilities. The Senate added to the sum provided for by the House $150,000, making a total of $650,000. The House conferees have agreed to the sum of $600,000, with a change of the provision of the Senate amendment in regard to the distribution of that fund. The Postmaster-General seemed to think that under such construction of the language of the Senate amendment as he would be obliged to give he would not have authority necessarily to make such distribution of this fund as would make continuous service throughout the country, but would perhaps be liable to break up the continuity of the service, and therefore destroy measurably its efficiency. For the purpose of meeting that objection the conference agreed upon the following phraseology:

For necessary and special facilities on trunk lines, $600,000; said facilities to be extended, as far as practicable, to the principal cities of the United States.

After conference with the Postmaster-General, and very extended conference in committee, it was believed that this language would as fully accomplish the purpose had in view as that originally agreed upon by the Senate.

Mr. INGALLS. How much does that enlarge the amount provided for in the House bill?

Mr. PLUMB. It enlarges the amount provided by the House bill $100,000. It adds to the sum appropriated for this purpose last year $175,000, the amount last year being $425,000.

Mr. BECK. It reduces the amount agreed on by the Senate $50,000.

Mr. PLUMB. It diminishes the amount voted by the Senate $50,000.

Mr. BECK. And on the positive assurance that that was all that could be carried at the other end, we thought it better to do it.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I understand the Senator to say that the amount appropriated last year was $425,000.

Mr. PLUMB. Yes, sir.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. My understanding was that it was $500,000.

Mr. PLUMB. No, $425,000.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. It was stated here in debate, and I believe it to be a fact, that probably fully two-thirds of the sum that has heretofore been appropriated for fast-mail service has gone to the city of New York, and that all the rest of the country gets but one-fourth. I ask my colleague on the committee whether the Postmaster-General or the superintendent of the railway mail service made an explanation of why it was that such a large proportion of the sum appropriated for the purpose of hastening the mails should be given to one city? I understand it to be a fact that there is a train leaving New York and supplying the entire Southwest, going by way of Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, and thence to Cincinnati, Saint Louis, Louisville, Indianapolis, and all the Southwestern country, by which the mail can be actually carried several hours quicker than by the train receiving expedited pay. The train of which I speak gets no aid whatever from the Government, while other trains get probably from fifty to eighty thousand dollars for the purpose of hurrying the mail service to those very points. Was that fact, if it be a fact, discussed in committee with the Postmaster-General and the gentleman who has charge of the railway mail service?

Mr. PLUMB. The relative speed and time of trains between New York and Cincinnati over the Pennsylvania road and over the Baltimore and Ohio road was discussed before the committee. It was not developed, I think, that the Baltimore and Ohio trains made the trip to Cincinnati in less time than that made on what is known as the expedited trains of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company. The Pennsylvania Railroad expedited trains made the time between New York and Cincinnati about two hours less than the ordinary time of the Baltimore and Ohio trains, and that point of expedition enabled the mail so carried from New York to Cincinnati to be taken on board the Cincinnati Southern and its connections with the Louisville and Nashville, which would not have been the case if it was carried over the Baltimore and Ohio, though the time was only two hours different.

So far as the expenditure of this sum of money for the benefit of New York City is concerned, without responding directly to the question in that form, I will say that the theory upon which this money has been spent heretofore has been that there should be an initial point, a point from which the service should commence, and from which it should be extended to such portions of the country as could be reached with the money in hand. New York was deemed to be the proper place for that initial point. You must start somewhere. Naturally the expedited service would start from the sea-coast; naturally also, it would start from the principal city on the sea-coast, and there is no question about New York being that place. The question as to whether it should be extended from there up to Springfield, in Massachusetts, or some other point, was incidentally discussed, but the general fact that New York is the proper initial point is not, I think, seriously denied. The question as to the lines of railroad that should be employed to render this service leading out of New York City is another question, and as to that necessarily discretion must be vested in the Postmaster-General.

Mr. MAXEY. I ask the Senator from Kansas if the use of the words of the conference committee, that the Postmaster-General is to fairly distribute the service as far as practicable to different cities, is the slightest restriction on him; whether that will cause him to change his present system of distributing the main portion of this appropriation to the city of New York and routes from that city? In other words, can we get any benefit at all out of the $600,000 according to the wording of the amendment as reported by the committee of conference?

Mr. PLUMB. Under any form of words that may be employed the law gives certain discretion to the Postmaster-General. It is impossible to prescribe it with any reasonable certainty by any form of words that can be devised in the law. We discussed, however, with the Postmaster-General the question of the proper distribution of this money, and we believe that this result which I will mention will be obtained. We believe the time between New York City and San Francisco will be shortened practically two days; that, of course, the intermediate points will gain proportionately; that the region of country of which Saint Paul is the capital will receive a corresponding benefit; that the mail will be carried to Saint Louis on a faster schedule than at present, and that it will be carried from Saint Louis to Kansas City in such a way that the present time between New York and Kansas City will be shortened twelve hours; that that shortening of the time will also be at least that much gained by Denison, and consequently connecting points in Northern Texas; that the benefit of this service will be extended to New Orleans by some connection from the existing expedited line which is now what is called the Atlantic Coast Line, extending from New York by way of Baltimore, Washington, Richmond, Fredericksburgh, Weldon, and so on, to Savannah, we suppose; and that from some point on that line service will be extended by way of Atlanta to New Orleans, and that either from Atlanta or from some other point which will be most available for that purpose the line will be extended from Cincinnati in such a way that the South will have the benefit, not only of the Atlantic Coast Line but of connection with that line to New Orleans, and a connection between Cincinnati and that New Orleans line. That, as we believe, will be about the result to be obtained by the expenditure of this $600,000. Of course, as the cost of this service is to be determined by negotiation between the Department and the railroad companies, this cannot be precisely known, but this is what we expect, and what the committee have reason to believe will be accomplished.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I am not quite satisfied that the amount of money appropriated by this bill as now reported is going to be equally and equitably distributed. I believe that there should be a fair distribution of it. The merchants and the commercial men of the city of Baltimore, for instance, ought to have, as they help to pay the taxes, an equal distribution with other cities. Take a merchant in New York and a merchant in Baltimore, Baltimore being the nearest seaport to the southwest, what is the result? The Government pays for the transportation of the mail out of the city of New York in different directions, aiding that city to overcome the difference in distance of which other cities nearer to the producer should have the advantage. For instance, a train leaves New York, as I have said, to-night at seven o'clock, by the way of Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Washington, for the West. That train, I understand, is probably quicker than any other train that goes to the Southwest, and yet no encouragement is given it whatever. A train starts at the same hour, probably, from New York, but goes by another route, by none of these cities, by the lake route, entirely away from any of the commercial seaports, and $100,000 or thereabouts is given it for quick passage. Is that right? Is that just? Ought it to be?

I believe it would be far better and fairer for the whole country if there was nothing paid whatever, if the whole amount was stricken out, or a fair and equal distribution made among all the people, and not confine it to one special place. For instance, I have in my hand a report from the Department which shows that between New York and Springfield $17,674 is paid for a fast-mail train; again, from New York to Buffalo $40,000; from New York to Chicago $38,000, and so on. I might go on and show that the great bulk of it is for lines from New York and the entire Southwest is entirely neglected. I think it would be to the advantage of the whole country to-day if the entire amount was dropped, and not tax all the people to keep up commercial facilities for a part. New York is a large city entitled to a share, but because she is large and wealthy and powerful is that any reason why the smaller cities should be taxed for her benefit? Is that any reason why the two hundred or three hundred miles she is further off from Cincinnati or the Southwest should be overcome by the payment of money from the people's pockets? It is not right in principle, and it ought not to be tolerated.

I am not on this sub-committee, and I ask my colleague upon the Committee on Appropriations whether or not in the discussion with the Postmaster-General the subject came up generally, and whether or not he intimated or the committee had good reason to believe that a more just and equitable division of this $600,000 would be made?

Mr. PLUMB. The committee do believe that under the expenditure of this sum of $600,000 provided for in the bill as it now stands there will be very much less cause of complaint in the direction the Senator has indicated than heretofore, if that objection is not wholly removed. The seventeenth amendment——

Mr. HARRIS. Before the Senator leaves that point, I should like to inquire if he has reason to believe from the discussion with the conferees of the House that an agreement could be reached if the Senate conferees should propose to strike out that whole appropriation of $600,000, and obviate the whole question by striking it out? That would be equal to all sections.

Mr. PLUMB. I will say in reply to the Senator from Tennessee, that the Senate conferees tendered that proposition to the House conferees, and it was declined. When we doubted our ability to agree upon the amount and the distribution, we fell back upon that as perhaps our first choice; at all events, as something we were willing to do; but that was declined.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I ask the Senator whether or not it appeared that the Government was under obligations to continue this fast-mail service with these favored railroad companies longer than the present year?

Mr. PLUMB. Not at all.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. And whether it reaches into another year; in other words, whether the Government is under contract for any particular time?

Mr. PLUMB. The Government is under contract for no particular time, and can stop it to-morrow, can stop the whole service to-morrow.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Then I am inclined to believe it would be better to let the Senate vote on whether or not that whole amount ought not to be stricken out and let the mails of the whole country stand equally and without preference to any particular section. I am very much that way inclined. Unless the Senators who have been specially charged with this bill, with which I do not wish to interfere, believe it better not to do that, I think we had better try that. I shall be glad to hear from the gentlemen who have had the bill in charge on that point.

Mr. PLUMB. I want to call attention to the fact that the other amendments are formal except as to the franking privilege.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I understand if we vote down the conference committee's report it will be understood what it is upon, and it will go back to the conference committee with a full understanding in that respect.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President——

Mr. BUTLER. Will the Senator from Kansas yield for an adjournment?

Mr PLUMB. It is important that this report should be disposed of this evening one way or the other.

Mr. BUTLER. It is almost five o'clock.

Mr. PLUMB. The next important amendment, and the only one that remained to be considered, was that which the Senate put on this bill restoring the franking privilege. From that the Senate conferees recede.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the report of the committee of conference.

The report was concurred in, there being on a division—ayes 28, noes 21.

Mr. BUTLER. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at four o'clock and fifty-eight minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, April 27, 1882.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. F. D. POWER.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

DANGER SIGNALS.

Mr. CRAPO. Mr. Speaker, I ask by unanimous consent that the House Calendar be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 707) to amend section 4233 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, in relation to danger signals; and that it be passed as proposed to be amended.

The bill, as proposed to be amended, was read, as follows:

That three commissioned officers of the Navy, to be appointed by the Secretary of the Navy, one of whom is to be the chief executive officer of the board herein specified, and two officers from the Revenue Marine Service of the United States, to be appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury, be, and are hereby, created and constituted a board by the name of the marine signal board of the United States.

SEC. 2. That said board is hereby authorized to draft, prescribe, and adopt, subject to the approval of the President of the United States, a code and system of marine light and fog signals and regulations, and from time to time to improve and change the same.

SEC. 3. That upon the adoption and approval of a code and system of signals and regulations as aforesaid, the clauses marked "A," "B," and "C," respectively, in rule 15 of section 4233 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, shall thereupon and thereby be and become repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"(A) Steam and sail vessels under way shall sound a steam-whistle or fog-horn or ring a bell in execution of and conformity to such code and system of signals and regulations, and by means of such apparatus as said board may adopt.

"(B) Sail and steam vessels not under way shall ring a bell or sound a steam-whistle or fog-horn in execution of and conformity to such code and system of signals and regulations, and by means of such apparatus as said board may adopt."

SEC. 4. That any statute of the United States in conflict herewith be, and the same is hereby, repealed; and that this act shall take effect upon its passage.

Mr. CRAPO. One word of explanation to show the urgency and importance of the passage of this bill.

Mr. RANDALL. Reserving the right to object.

Mr. CRAPO. Allow me a word of explanation.

Mr. RANDALL. Certainly; we want to know primarily whether this bill has been referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. GUENTHER. Mr. Speaker, I will state to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that as chairman of the sub-committee of the Committee on Commerce, to which this bill was referred, I was instructed to report it back to the House as amended with a favorable recommendation. It was submitted to the Secretary of the Navy, and he, as well as the Chief of the Bureau of Navigation, heartily and unqualifiedly indorses it. This amended bill was also referred by the committee of the Senate to the Secretary of the Treasury, and he approved it in even stronger language. In addition to all this the President of the United States last week transmitted to the Senate a message, in which he calls attention to subject-matter; that is, to the prevention of collisions at sea, and urges the speedy passage of an adequate remedial measure.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask the bill be again read, as it was not distinctly heard in this part of the Hall.

Mr. RANDALL. Is there a report accompanying this bill? If there is, it had better be read.

Mr. CRAPO. I think I can state in a word enough to satisfy the House of the importance of passing this bill. The maritime powers of Europe, in connection with some of those of South America, have united in the adoption of an international code with reference to fog and danger signals at sea. That code is in conflict with the regulations of the United States statutes upon the same subject. The result of this is that if two vessels approach each other in a fog at sea, one an American and the other a foreign vessel, the American ship, as in duty bound, obeys the regulations contained in the United States statutes with reference to cautionary signals at sea, or otherwise would incur the penalties provided by the statutes. The foreign vessel follows the international code which has been adopted as I have stated by all the maritime powers of Europe. The result is that if a collision occurs and a question of liability is raised in the courts and adjudicated by a foreign admiralty court, the American vessel is found to be in fault simply because her commander follows the United States statute as in duty bound, and not the international code. Now this bill provides that we shall take steps to bring our code into harmony with the international code, not by adopting that directly but by appointing a board of officers to examine into the question and make a report to the President upon the subject. That is all this bill provides, and it is a matter which, as I have said, demands immediate consideration.

Mr. HOLMAN. Why not make this a permanent board?

Mr. CRAPO. It is, as the language of the first section of the bill indicates, a continuing board, but without additional compensation. It is simply a board authorized to examine into the question and report to the President their conclusions in reference to this system of danger signals.

Mr. HOLMAN. It would seem very appropriate that this should be a permanent board, so that the signals adopted by the other governments by general consent shall be followed by ours. I did not clearly understand this provision of the bill from the reading of it, as it was imperfectly heard here. I therefore ask that it may be read again, so that we may understand it.

The bill was again read.

Mr. CRAPO. It will be seen that this provides simply for a board of three commissioned officers of the Navy and two officers of the Revenue Marine to examine into the subject.

Mr. RANDALL. This seems to be, by the language of the bill, a permanent board, and perhaps it is proper; but I would like to ask the gentleman whether any provision is made for increased pay of those commissioned officers of the Navy who are to serve upon it?

Mr. CRAPO. There is no increased compensation at all in the bill.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I was not present when this subject came up, and desire to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts what committee reports this?

Mr. CRAPO. It comes from the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Is it the unanimous report of the committee?

Mr. CRAPO. It is the unanimous report of the committee. It is also recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Secretary of State. There is also a special message from the President before Congress in reference to the subject. I ask the passage of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CRAPO moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PORT OF NEW ORLEANS.

Mr. GIBSON. I ask unanimous consent to take from the House Calendar the bill (H. R. No. 570) to extend the limits of the port of New Orleans, and that it be put upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, subject to objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the port of New Orleans is hereby extended to embrace all that part of the left bank of the Mississippi River within the corporate limits of the city of New Orleans, and to include a frontage and area on the right bank of the Mississippi River as great as that hereby given to it on the left bank, so that the said port of New Orleans shall embrace an equal front and area on both sides of the Mississippi River.

SEC. 2. That it shall be lawful for the Secretary of the Treasury, under such rules and regulations as he shall prescribe, to permit goods and merchandise and all imported commodities to be unladen on the right bank of the Mississippi River at the port of New Orleans.

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill to extend the limits of the port of New Orleans."

Mr. GIBSON. This is the bill as amended by the committee. It makes no appropriation.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GIBSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ELECTRIC LIGHT AT HELL GATE.

Mr. RICHARDSON, of New York, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back with favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. No. 2407) making an appropriation for the erection of one or more electric lights at Hell Gate, New York; which, with the accompanying report, was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

REAR-ADMIRAL ROGER N. STEMBEL.

Mr. TALBOTT. I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 5387) providing for the pay of Rear-Admiral Roger N. Stembel, and that the same be put upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, subject to objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That Rear-Admiral Roger N. Stembel, United States Navy, be paid, out of any unexpended moneys in the Treasury, the pay and compensation of a rear-admiral on the retired list from and after June 5, 1874, that being the date of his promotion to the retired list as a rear-admiral.

Mr. RANDALL. Is that bill retroactive in its provision for this payment?

Mr. SPARKS. It provides for payment from the date of his present commission and is eminently just. This brave old officer entered the Navy over half a century ago; has faithfully discharged every duty. During the late war he was so terribly wounded that his recovery was regarded as almost a miracle. He is still suffering from the effects of his wound and can never hope for complete and final relief. There ought to be no objection to the passage of the bill.

Mr. TALBOTT. It fixes the pay only from the date of the commission. He has held the rank without pay, and this provides that his pay shall commence from the date of his promotion.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let the report in this case be printed in the RECORD, to show the ground of our action here to-day.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the memorial of Rear-Admiral R. N. Stembel praying to be allowed the pay of rear-admiral from the date of his promotion from the rank of commodore, having considered the same, respectfully report as follows:

Rear-Admiral Stembel entered the Navy of the United States as a midshipman March 27, 1832; and honorably, and with great credit to himself and country, passed through the various lesser grades of the service up to 1870, when he was promoted to and duly commissioned commodore. In 1871 he was ordered to and commanded, respectively, the north and south squadrons of the Pacific fleets; and subsequently, by order of the Navy Department, commanded the entire naval forces on the Pacific station; thus, as commodore, maintaining all the responsibilities and performing all the duties of a rear-admiral afloat.

Having arrived at the age of sixty-two years, under the compulsory retirement act of the Navy he was retired from active service with the rank and pay of commodore; and subsequently, on the 5th day of June, 1874, under the act of Congress approved July, 1866, he was promoted to and commissioned rear-admiral on the retired list; but which commission did not carry with it the pay of the grade to which, under the law, he was thus promoted.

The case of Admiral Stembel is peculiar and exceptional in this, that while for half a century he has most efficiently and gallantly filled all the grades in the Navy from midshipman to and including that of rear-admiral, without a single charge or breath of suspicion against him or his acts as an officer, but, on the contrary, has received the constant commendation of his superiors in command for meritorious conduct, he now finds himself a commissioned rear-admiral on the retired list, drawing only the retired pay of a commodore, while his comrades of the same service, whose sacrifices have none been greater and many less, and with the same rank as himself, drawing the retired pay of rear-admiral.

This, your committee think, is a hardship to him and an inconsistency in the service which demands correction.

An additional reason for granting relief in this case is that, on the 10th of May, 1862, Admiral Stembel was fearfully and almost mortally wounded while commanding the United States gunboat Cincinnati in an engagement with a fleet of confederate rams near Fort Pillow, on the Mississippi River, from the effects of which wound he was for many months confined to his apartments, subjected to heavy personal expense and intense suffering, and from which he is still a sufferer and at his time of life can have no hope of final recovery.

In the official report of the above action he was commended by the chief commander, the late Rear-Admiral C. H. Davis, United States Navy, as having specially distinguished himself by exceptional skill and gallantry displayed on that occasion, as he was also alike commended by the late Rear-Admiral A. H. Foote, United States Navy, as appears in extracts from letters accompanying his memorial.

In view of which your committee recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

Mr. TALBOTT. I ask that the bill be passed.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and, being engrossed, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. TALBOTT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SOLDIERS' MONUMENT AT PORTSMOUTH, OHIO.

Mr. NEAL. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table for present consideration the bill (S. No. 1598) to authorize the Secretary of War to donate to the Ladies' Soldiers' Monument Society of Portsmouth, Ohio, four condemned cannon. A bill identical with this has been unanimously reported by the Committee on Military Affairs of the House.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to donate to the Ladies' Soldiers' Monument Society of Portsmouth, Ohio, four condemned cast-iron cannon.

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, read three times, and passed.

Mr. NEAL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

THOMAS J. WHARTON.

Mr. HOOKER. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Private Calendar for present consideration the bill (H. R. No. 869) for the relief of Thomas J. Wharton.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the sum of $250 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the benefit of Thomas J. Wharton, of Jackson, Mississippi, as compensation for certain professional services rendered by said Wharton in the southern district of Mississippi, under appointment of the then district attorney of the United States for the southern district of Mississippi, in accordance with the statute in such case made and provided.

SEC. 2. That this act be in force from and after its passage.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does this bill come from a committee?

Mr. HOOKER. Yes, sir; it is reported by the Committee on Claims. It has been eight times reported favorably to the House.

There being no objection, the Committee of the Whole House was discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and it was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HOOKER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DISCRIMINATING DUTIES.

Mr. KELLEY. I am instructed by the Committee on Ways and Means to report back the bill (H. R. No. 4680) to repeal discriminating duties on tea and coffee, the products of the possessions of the Netherlands, with amendments by the Senate, and to move that the Senate amendments be concurred in.

The Senate amendments were read, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert:

"That section 2501 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, which reads as follows: 'There shall be levied, collected, and paid on all goods, wares, and merchandise of the growth or produce of the countries east of the Cape of Good Hope,

(except wool, raw cotton, and raw silk as reeled from the cocoon, or not further advanced than tram, thrown, or organzine,) when imported from places west of the Cape of Good Hope, a duty of 10 per cent. ad valorem in addition to the duties imposed on any such article when imported directly from the place or places of their growth or production," be, and the same is hereby, repealed, from and after the 1st day of January, 1883."

Strike out the preamble.

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill to repeal section 2501 of the Revised Statutes relating to discriminating duties on productions of countries east of the Cape of Good Hope."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of these amendments?

Mr. HUTCHINS. I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means whether the amendment which has been read has been made by the concurrence of the parties interested having large stocks of goods on hand.

Mr. KELLEY. I will give the history briefly of the matter. Under communications from the State Department the Committee on Ways and Means reported a bill to execute our treaty provisions. That bill went to the Senate, and after deliberation and consultation with parties in interest it was amended. The Committee on Ways and Means have fully considered the bill and unanimously recommend concurrence. But before reporting we took measures, through the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CANDLER] and others, to ascertain from parties holding large stocks of goods to be affected by this repeal as to the propriety of the act, and they all concur in saying that by postponing its effect to the time named in the bill no harm can arise to any one.

The amendments of the Senate were concurred in.

Mr. KELLEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

P. F. LONERGAN.

Mr. BUCKNER. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Private Calendar for present consideration the bill (H. R. No. 4704) for the relief of P. F. Lonergan.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I object.

HOUSE FOLDING-ROOM.

Mr. HAWK. I desire to submit a resolution of inquiry as to the House folding-room.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I object.

Mr. HAWK. I hope my colleague will not object to this. It is in the interest of humanity.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I have tried for the last six months to get recognition here, and have not been able to get it.

Mr. HAWK. This is a resolution concerning the employés in the House folding-room.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I am sorry to object, but I must insist on my objection.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the regular order.

LIFE-SAVING SERVICE.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. I desire to make a privileged report. I present a report of a committee of conference, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1049) to promote the efficiency of the Life-Saving Service, and to encourage the saving of life from shipwreck, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 2, to insert after the word "Carolina," on line 25 of page 2, (printer's No., 6141,) the words "one at or near Fort Morgan, on the Bay of Mobile."

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered—

1. To insert, on line 16 of page 2, after the word "Massachusetts," the words "at or near Brenton's Point or Beaver Tail, Rhode Island;" and agree to the same.

3. To insert, after the word "Florida," on line 27, page 2, the words "and three life-saving stations on the Atlantic coast of Florida, one near Key West, one near Jupiter Inlet, one at or near Cape Canaveral, and one on the Gulf coast west of Apalachicola River;" and agree to the same with amendments striking from line 27 the word "three" and inserting the word "two;" inserting the word "and" after the words "Key West," on line 28, and striking from line 29 the words "one at or near Cape Canaveral;" and the Senate agree to the same.

4. To insert, on line 32, page 2, after the word "recommend," the words "a life-saving station at or near Tybee Island, at the port of Savannah, Georgia, one near Brunswick, one near Doboy, and one on or near Cumberland Island or Fernandina, near the line of Georgia and Florida, each of said four stations to be located at such point as the General Superintendent of the Life-Saving Service may select; three life-saving stations on the coast of South Carolina, to be located by the General Superintendent, near the ports of Georgetown, Charleston, and Beaufort;" and agree to the same with amendments striking out all the words of said amendment down to the word "life-saving," on lines 37 and 38, and inserting the word "two;" inserting the words "at or" before the word "near," on line 39; inserting the word "and" before the word "Charleston," on line 40; and striking from line 40 the words "and Beaufort;" and the Senate agree to the same.

5. To strike from line 9, page 4, the words "one thousand eight" and insert the word "fifteen;" and agree to the same.

6. To strike from line 12, page 4, the words "two thousand" and insert the words "one thousand five hundred;" and agree to the same.

7. To strike from line 15, page 4, the words "two thousand five" and insert the word "eighteen;" and agree to the same.

8. To strike from line 18, page 4, the words "two thousand five" and insert the word "eighteen;" and agree to the same.

9. To strike from line 21, page 4, the words "two thousand" and insert the words "fifteen hundred;" and agree to the same.

10. To strike from line 24, page 4, the words "two thousand five" and insert the word "eighteen;" and agree to the same.

11. To strike from lines 27 and 28, page 5, the words "one thousand" and insert the words "and the coast of Georgia and South Carolina, twelve hundred;" and agree to the same.

12. To strike from lines 30 and 31, page 5, the words "one thousand eight" and insert the word "fifteen;" and agree to the same.

13. To strike from line 33, page 5, the words "two thousand five" and insert the word "eighteen;" and agree to the same.

14. To strike from line 36, page 5, the words "two thousand five" and insert the word "eighteen;" and agree to the same.

15. To strike from line 39, page 5, the words "two thousand five" and insert the word "eighteen;" and agree to the same.

16. To add, after the words "per annum," on line 6, page 5, the words "and the Secretary of the Treasury is also authorized to fix the pay of the men employed at the different stations in proportion to the services rendered: Provided, The same shall not exceed $50 per month;" and agree to the same with amendments inserting the words "appoint and" before the word "fix," in line 2, page 5; inserting the word "all" before the word "stations," in line 3, page 5; and striking out the words "in proportion to the services rendered," in line 8, page 6; and the Senate agree to the same.

17. To insert the following section after section 6, page 6:

"SEC. 7. That if any keeper or member of a crew of a life-saving or life-boat station shall be so disabled by reason of any wound or injury received or disease contracted in the Life-Saving Service in the line of duty as to unfit him for the performance of duty, such disability to be determined in such manner as shall be prescribed in the regulations of the service, he shall be continued upon the rolls of the service and entitled to receive his full pay during the continuance of such disability, not to exceed the period of one year, unless the General Superintendent shall recommend, upon a statement of facts, the extension of the period through a portion or the whole of another year, and said recommendation receive the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury as just and reasonable; but in no case shall said disabled keeper or member of a crew be continued upon the rolls or receive pay for a longer period than two years;" and agree to the same.

18. To insert after section 7, on page 6, the following section:

"SEC. 8. That if any keeper or member of a crew of a life-saving or life-boat station shall hereafter die by reason of perilous service or any wound or injury received or disease contracted in the Life-Saving Service in the line of duty, leaving a widow, or a child or children under sixteen years of age, such widow and child or children shall be entitled to receive in equal portions during a period of two years, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, the same amount, payable quarterly as far as practicable, that the husband or father would be entitled to receive as pay if he were alive and continued in the service: Provided, That if the widow shall remarry at any time during the said two years her portion of said amount shall cease to be paid to her from the date of her remarriage, but shall be added to the amount to be paid to the remaining beneficiaries under the provisions of this section, if there be any; and if any child shall arrive at the age of sixteen years during the said two years the payment of the portion of such child shall cease to be paid to such child from the date on which such age shall be attained, but shall be added to the amount to be paid to the remaining beneficiaries, if there be any;" and agree to the same.

19. To strike from line 1, page 7, the word "seven" and insert the word "nine;" and agree to the same.

20. To strike from line 1, page 8, the word "eight" and insert the word "ten;" and agree to the same; and after the word "of," line 1, page 8, insert the words "district superintendents, inspectors and;" and agree to the same.

21. To strike from line 1, page 9, the word "nine," and insert the word "eleven;" and agree to the same.

AMOS TOWNSEND,
S. S. COX,
JOHN W. CANDLER,
Managers on the part of the House.
O. D. CONGER,
WM. P. FRYE,
J. R. McPHERSON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. REAGAN. I want separate votes on the seventeenth and eighteenth amendments.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. I now move the adoption of the report.

Mr. DUNNELL. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DUNNELL. I do not know that I desire to insist upon the point of order, but I desire to call the attention of the House and of the gentleman having this bill in charge to some very novel features which appear in that report. From the reading of the report it would appear that entirely new sections had been inserted into the bill, and were not put in in lieu of what had been inserted by the Senate or in lieu of any matters in dispute between the House and the Senate. I do not understand that a committee of conference can insert new sections, unless they are inserted in lieu of some sections already in. There is a great deal of outright new legislation which has been brought into the bill by the committee of conference.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. I beg your pardon.

Mr. DUNNELL. It seems to me that the gentleman from Ohio should explain this matter very fully.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. I think I can explain it to the satisfaction of the gentleman.

Mr. DUNNELL. Section 6 seems to be an entirely new section.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. If the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] will possess his soul in patience until the accompanying statement from the committee on conference has been read, he will find that the bill as it passed the House was amended in the Senate by the addition of those two sections to which he objects, and those sections were properly subjects of conference. I ask the Clerk to read the accompanying statement from the committee on conference.

Mr. DUNNELL. That has been read.

Mr. COX, of New York. Not the statement. I will say to the gentleman that the statement explains the effect of the amendments. The sections to which the gentleman refers were put on by the Senate.

Mr. REAGAN. I do not wish it to be understood that any point of order is waived.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the accompanying statement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Detailed statement as to effect of amendments as agreed upon in conference report on H. R. No. 1049.

No. 1 adds one life-saving station at or near Brenton's Point or Beaver Tail, Rhode Island.

No. 2 strikes out the Senate addition of one life-saving station at or near Fort Morgan, Bay of Mobile.

No. 3 strikes out the Senate provision for one house of refuge at or near Cape Canaveral, Florida.

No. 4 strikes out the Senate provision for four life-saving stations at Tybee Island, Brunswick, Doboy, and Fernandina, respectively, near the line of Georgia and Florida, and one life-saving station at Beaufort, South Carolina.

Numbers 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 12, 13, 14, and 15 provide respectively for reductions in annual salaries of district superintendents, as follows: first district, from $1,800 to $1,500; second district, from $2,000 to $1,500; third district, from $2,500 to $1,800; fourth district, from $2,500 to $1,800; fifth district, from $2,000 to $1,500; sixth district, from $2,500 to $1,800; eighth district, from $1,800 to $1,500; ninth district, from $2,500 to $1,800; tenth district, from $2,500 to $1,800; eleventh district, from $2,500 to $1,800.

No. 11 increases the annual salary of the district superintendent of the seventh district from $1,000 to $1,200.

No. 16 places the appointment of keepers of all life-saving stations and houses of refuge with the Secretary of the Treasury, and authorizes him to fix the pay of station-keepers at a rate not exceeding $50 per month, leaving out the provision "in proportion to the services rendered."

No. 17 is an additional section placed on the bill by the Senate, which provides for the payment of one year's salary, under proper restrictions, to any person in the life-saving service who is disabled in the line of duty.

No. 18 is an additional section added to the bill by the Senate, which provides that in case of the death from injury received in the line of duty, the widow and children shall be paid two years' salary, quarterly, under proper safeguards.

Numbers 19 and 21 simply change the numbering of the sections.

No. 20 changes the number of the section, and provides that appointments of superintendents and inspectors, as well as others, shall be made with reference solely to fitness.

Mr. REAGAN. I must ask that the report of the committee on conference be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. A new policy is indicated in two of the amendments of a very important character, and one which has never been submitted to the consideration of the House. I must ask that it go to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. They are very simple and can easily be disposed of.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not understand fully the point made by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire that this report be considered in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Under what rule? This is a conference report.

Mr. REAGAN. I know it is, and I understand it must be adopted or rejected as a whole. I want two of the amendments considered thoroughly, which have never yet been considered by this House. I do not know the rule exactly upon the point, but I was under the impression that on objection being made the conference report had to go to the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think that a point of order would lie against a conference report so as to require it to be considered in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. RANDALL. It is important, however, in view of the statement the gentleman from Texas makes, that it should be sustained by the record or contradicted in some way. The gentleman from Texas states that there is in this conference report some matter which neither House of Congress inserted.

Mr. REAGAN. Oh, no.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. That is a mistake.

Mr. REAGAN. I said there were two amendments which were new measures of legislation, about pensioning these persons, which measures have never been considered by this House.

Mr. RANDALL. By this House?

Mr. REAGAN. They have never been considered by this House. If there is no other way to reach it I desire to ask the House not to adopt the report.

Mr. RANDALL. You must adopt it or reject it.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. I desire to move the previous question on the adoption of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TOWNSEND] is recognized in charge of the report; but the Chair will hear the gentleman from Texas on a point of order.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. I demand the previous question.

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman has not the floor for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order that the report must be first considered in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. REAGAN. That having been disposed of, I was proceeding to state my objection to the report——

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. I do not yield the floor for any such purpose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas was recognized to make a point of order; but beyond that the gentleman did not have the floor.

Mr. REAGAN. That is a curious way of doing things.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas was recognized to make a point of order.

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TOWNSEND] had the floor but made no motion. I made a point of order which was overruled, and then I was proceeding to state my reasons——

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman from Texas was not recognized except on a point of order. The gentleman cannot in that way take from the floor the one in charge of the report. The gentleman from Ohio had the floor and called for the reading of the accompanying statement. The Chair hopes that the gentleman from Ohio will yield to the gentleman from Texas to make his statement.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. I shall be glad to yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] at the proper time to make such arguments or suggestions as he may deem proper. But at this stage of the proceedings I move the adoption of the report, and on that motion call the previous question.

Mr. REAGAN. Does the gentleman propose to let me have the floor after the bill is passed? [Laughter.]

Mr. RANDALL. I ask for the reading of that portion of this report which in effect creates a civil pension list.

The SPEAKER. The report has been read.

Mr. COX, of New York. I do not want the statement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] to go out without correction to create a wrong impression in regard to these two amendments.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman from New York may correct me whenever I am wrong, and I will accept the correction and admit my mistake; but in this instance I do not happen to be wrong.

Mr. COX, of New York. I corrected the gentleman a moment ago privately; and I thought he understood this matter. These two sections were prepared by the committee of conference and were adopted by the Senate. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] wishes to address the House on this subject, and I have no doubt he will get an opportunity——

Mr. REAGAN. When?

Mr. COX, of New York. And so will my friend from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman from New York has no right to stand up here and say that he proposes to correct a false impression which I have made. I only ask that this part of the report may be read, because I am credibly informed that these amendments do inaugurate a civil-pension list.

Mr. COX, of New York. Now, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. RANDALL. The report will show whether I am correct; it is not necessary for us to take the word of the gentleman from New York or anybody else on this point.

Mr. COX, of New York. I do not propose to get into an irascible condition——

Mr. RANDALL. I am calm as a May morning.

Mr. COX, of New York. I would like my friend to be calm on a matter of this kind. I can explain it in three words. There may be a difference of opinion. I am glad to see my friend from Pennsylvania smiling.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will direct the Clerk to read the portion of the report indicated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert the following as new sections:

"SEC. 7. That if any keeper or member of a crew of a life-saving or life-boat station shall be so disabled by reason of any wound or injury received or disease contracted in the Life-Saving Service in the line of duty as to unfit him for the performance of duty, such disability to be determined in such manner as shall be prescribed in the regulations of the service, he shall be continued upon the rolls of the service and entitled to receive his full pay during the continuance of such disability, not to exceed the period of one year, unless the General Superintendent shall recommend upon a statement of facts the extension of the period through a portion or the whole of another year, and said recommendation receive the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury as just and reasonable; but in no case shall said disabled keeper or member of a crew be continued upon the rolls or receive pay for a longer period than two years.

"SEC. 8. That if any keeper or member of a crew of a life-saving or life-boat station shall hereafter die by reason of perilous service or any wound or injury received or disease contracted in the Life-Saving Service in the line of duty, leaving a widow, or a child or children under sixteen years of age, such widow and child or children shall be entitled to receive, in equal portions, during a period of two years, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, the same amount payable quarterly, as far as practicable, that the husband or father would be entitled to receive as pay if he were alive and continued in the service: Provided, That if the widow shall remarry at any time during the said two years her portion of said amount shall cease to be paid to her from the date of her remarriage, but shall be added to the amount to be paid to the remaining beneficiaries under the provisions of this section, if there be any; and if any child shall arrive at the age of sixteen years during the said two years the payment of the portion of such child shall cease to be paid to such child from the date on which such age shall be attained, but shall be added to the amount to be paid to the remaining beneficiaries, if there be any."

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I now withdraw the demand for the previous question, in order to give my friend from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] and other gentlemen who may desire it some little time for discussion. But before yielding, I wish to remark that these two sections were placed on the bill in the Senate with other amendments, and were in lieu of such a provision as was demanded from various parts of the country, a provision for pensioning persons disabled in this service and the families of those who may lose their lives in the service. It was thought wise to provide, as proposed in these two sections, that any one receiving permanent injury in the service should be entitled to have his pay continued for a period not exceeding two years, and that the family of any one losing his life in the service should be entitled under certain conditions, to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, to receive pay at the regular rates which would have been received by him for not more than two years.

The committee of conference believed these provisions wise, and thought they would be satisfactory to the House. They still believe that upon a fair representation of the matter to the House they will meet its approval.

I now yield to the gentleman from Texas for ten minutes.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I object to the adoption of the two sections which have been read because they are the inauguration of another class of pensioners, and because the principle upon which this is proposed to be done is not in my judgment justifiable under our system of government, or under any rule of right reason. We already have a large pension list. It includes in the first place those who have been wounded or disabled in the Army or Navy. This is in accordance with the ordinary custom of governments, and of course I have no objection to it. Those who have been disabled in the Army or Navy may rightly be pensioned by the Government upon a just principle of public policy. We have also another class of pensioners—retired officers of the Army or Navy, retired upon pay, not because they have been disabled in the service, but because they have reached a certain age after enjoying till that age the emoluments of a profitable office. This I think is wrong.

Now, it is proposed in this bill substantially to pension those who have been engaged in the Life-Saving Service. We have also before Congress, I believe, propositions to pension those engaged in the marine service, and as I am told by my friend from New York, [Mr. HITCHINS,] who sits near me, it is also proposed to pension members of the police force of the District of Columbia. Upon what principle can these things be justified? We give men positions of public employment; we provide a just and generally a liberal compensation for their services. Men are anxious to obtain this public employment because of its emoluments and perhaps its honors. Now when we have given persons the special advantage of profitable public employment is that to be made an argument for pensioning them upon the Government for the remainder of their lives? What higher claim, what better equity, have such persons than those who in the private walks of life are struggling to support themselves and their families? If in morals or reason there is a distinction, it is not in favor of the man who has had the benefit of public employment upon a liberal salary from the Government but is rather in favor of the distressed and the unfortunate in private life. In view of the numerous drafts upon the Treasury, in view of the burdens of taxation, it seems to me we should not recklessly create a new list of pensioners in violation of principle and of right, with no proper opportunity for the consideration of the question in the House.

It is inaugurating, as my friend suggests, a new policy on that subject. Besides, Mr. Speaker, there is a deeper and more important reason for not doing this. The whole theory of this Government is that there shall be no privileged class, that there shall be no special privileges granted to any particular class. Every time you create civil employments and give the e men in these civil employments emoluments which are to follow them by making provision for their future governmental support in case of disease or accident you go that far in the creation of a privileged class not based on any just public policy.

And in this case, sir, it discriminates in favor of the fortunate and against the unfortunate—not in favor of the unfortunate. You first give a man a civil employment. He seeks it anxiously to get its emoluments. If by accident he gets wounded or dies, this measure proposes to give a pension to him or to his family. Now, suppose the many railroad companies in this country, or the many navigation companies were required to pension the employés now in their service who get sick or die in that service, would any one contend that there was justice or reason in any such course? Yet here we are voting away the public money, of course gratifying to those who get it, but adopting a policy in reference to the Government which no man would assent to in reference to corporations or with reference to any private persons in the United States. I shall therefore, Mr. Speaker, ask the House to refuse to second the previous question, and to refuse to adopt this report of the committee of conference.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. I yield now to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. COX, of New York. Mr. Speaker, there is no man in this House who more cordially agrees with the gentleman from Texas than myself on most matters. I desire to agree with him now. I agree with him that it is unwise to fix on our Government a civil list. I am not disposed to add to the roll or roster of civil pensioners. I have voted and spoken against that system, with reason and almost passion, from the beginning. In bringing, sir, this bill before this House I took care to separate the pension clauses from it. The pension portion I had referred to the Committee on Pensions. I did this with a heartfelt wish to disembarrass gentlemen like my friend from Texas. Therefore this bill appeared here and went to the Senate with no pension or even a remote suggestion of a pension clause on it.

The sections to which my friend objects are not pension clauses by any means. They are an avoidance of a pension. It is a persuasive and honest contract with the devotee to life-saving.

In obedience to the general call of the people all over the country these clauses are sent to us from the Senate. Chambers of Commerce from Boston to San Francisco, including Philadelphia and other places, ask for these clauses of generosity. Legislatures of States, including Kentucky and Illinois, west and east, on the coast, on the Gulf, the Atlantic and Pacific, ask for these clauses of kindness. In obedience to this call the Senate supplements my bill with something better than my poor thought.

While cutting down the salaries of the superintendents, which we raised here, the Senate provided that in case of disability and in case of death there should be some temporary pay for men who risk or give their lives to this service. The Senate says to the surfman who hazards his life for others, "If you go into the wild surf to save others at the risk of your life, your wife may be a widow, but the Government will be ever so thoughtful and just to her and hers." It is an incentive and a contract. It is no civil list, no pension, no bounty, no gratuity. It is a contract.

Why, sir, it only takes so much from, or rather adds so much to the pay; one year or more, and not more than two years, of those disabled in the service, and in case of death two years' full pay, to go to the survivors, the widow and children. What can be more gentle, just, and reasonable? Gentlemen say this is a sort of pension. It is a sort of pension. It is thoughtful, pensée. Philologically and otherwise it is a thought. In so far as it goes it gives the beneficiaries of this bill some pay; but does it not avoid the other and odious question of a civil list for fancied service which my friend from Texas justly opposes? I would like to say that there have been only twenty-four persons disabled and dead in this service from the beginning; only twenty-five. One would think from the stir just made that some hundreds of thousands were engaged in the struggles in the surf to aid and save human life. Oh, no. Here is the list which Judge Folger, a true friend of this service, sent to Speaker KEIFER on the 13th of February last. (Executive Document No. 74.) It is a short but heroic record:

List of persons who have died "by reason of any wound or injury received or disease contracted in the line of duty in the Life-Saving Service since the origin of the service," so far as shown by the records of the Treasury Department.

[1] Drowned while attempting to rescue the crew of the wrecked Italian bark Nuova Ottavia, off coast of North Carolina.

[2] Died out on night patrol.

[3] Fell from aloft and instantly killed while assisting in saving property from Italian bark Papa Luigi C.

[4] Drowned while attempting to go to the assistance of survivors of crew of United States steamer Huron. By act of Congress approved May 25, 1878, Superintendent Guthrie's widow receives the same pension as the widows of deceased captains of the Navy.

[5] Perished in attempting to go the assistance of distressed schooner J. H. Magruder on reef off Point Aux Barques, Lake Huron.

[6] Drowned off Rogers City, Michigan, while making tour of stations in his district.

[7] Drowned off Rogers City, Michigan, with Superintendent Sawyer, while transporting him from station No. 8, tenth district.

[8] Perished while attempting to take ashore crew of stranded sloop C. E. Trumbull.

[9] Reported to have died from disease caused by cold and exposure while in the line of duty.

[10] Reported to have died from disease caused by cold and exposure while swimming to a boat during the gale and tidal wave of October 23, 1878.

Mr. DAWES. We have already reported a bill, and I ask the gentleman to allow the report to be read.

Mr. COX. It will be heard. I am glad to hear from a gentleman who represents my native river, the Muskingum.

Mr. DAWES. It was the judgment of a majority of the Committee on Invalid Pensions that relief should be granted the families. It was considered that the Life-Saving Service is the only civil service where life is necessarily risked to save life. In other civil service peril to person is encountered, but that constitutes no claim to pension such as that of the Life-Saving Service.

Mr. HAWK. The Committee on the Payment of Pensions, Bounty, and Back Pay have reported upon it adversely, but that report has not yet been printed.

Mr. COX, of New York. I take the reports of the two committees together and say that the reason why we should pass this measure is that there is no pension probable or possible. If one committee passes adversely on the pension bill and another for it, it is meet that we should make some provision not obnoxious to objection, and striking the golden mean.

Mr. DAWES. From the reading of the report which I have called for the House will see the necessity of some provision being made.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, this House may not be interested, but the good people of the country are, in the grateful and generous report of the honorable gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. LATHAM] from the Committee on Invalid Pensions. To that committee was referred a bill to relieve the widows of the gallant men who went down beneath the breakers on the North Carolina coast in attempting to save stranded Italian strangers.

May I ask to re-enforce my statement by the honorable gentleman's terse and touching report:

> That on the evening of March 1, 1876, between seven and eight o'clock, or soon after dark, the sea being rough and the surf and breakers high, heavy, and winding, the bark Nuova Ottavia stranded on the reef about four hundred yards south of life-saving station No. 4, on the coast of North Carolina, with her head northwest or before the wind.
> That the keeper and crew of station No. 4 (except Surfman John G. Chappell, whose place was supplied by George W. Wilson, a volunteer) immediately manned the boats and started to the rescue of the crew of the ill-fated vessel.
> That the keeper, John R. Gale, and Surfmen Spencer D. Gray, Lemuel Griggs, Malachi J. Brumsey, I. Mundin, Lewis White, and George W. Wilson (who volunteered his services in place of Surfman Chappell) lost their lives in the attempt. Only four of the Italian crew were saved.
> Captain John J. Guthrie, then superintendent district No. 6, United States Life-Saving Service, who in the following year lost his life off the same coast in attempting to afford assistance to the officers and men of the Huron, and whose widow has been pensioned by the Government, in his report to Captain Merryman, inspector of United States life-saving stations, uses this language: "In truth, all the tragic facts developed by this catastrophe are invested with a sublimity which I cannot portray with any written description, and do not wish to comment upon any of its causes beyond that of not taking the life-preservers on the persons of the lost who went in the life-boat, which seems a fatal mistake when so much danger must have been apprehended. The promptness, however, required under the circumstances probably overshadowed every forethought of personal security, and sad and lamentable as the results were, their noble efforts to rescue the shipwrecked shed a luster over the victims and credit on humanity."
>
> That the widows and children of those who were lost are in very needy circumstances.
>
> Your committee unanimously recommend the passage of the bill.

Yet, gentlemen fear a civil list of such heroes, and vote millions here for—what?—what?

Mr. CONVERSE. I should like to inquire whether the families of the soldiers who lose their lives in the Indian war now going on are pensioned?

Mr. COX, of New York. I do not intend to be drawn into a pension discussion. This bill is not a pension bill. We avoid it on purpose. We do not desire to make a precedent.

Why, sir, gentlemen who are so fastidious voted to pay the families of our own employés around this House something after death. Their widows and children now and then get our moneys to aid them in the immediate emergency. It is so as to members also. I do not expect to draw any precedent from that. I close members' mouths; only this.

Mr. ATKINS. We do not give the descendants of members or of employés any pay.

Mr. COX, of New York. We only pay them in case of death to the end of their term.

Mr. HOLMAN. I should like to ask the gentleman from New York if this civil-pension list is established where he proposes to stop?

Mr. COX, of New York. This is a mere temporary pay to or contract with those who risk their lives for others—a sort of increase of pay, not a pension. Oh, sir, we are about to appropriate a hundred millions of money to soldiers and sailors—we pay millions to pensioners who kill—but when we provide temporary pay for those who risk their lives to save, we are met with these objections. I hope to be patient in meeting such objections.

Mr. HOLMAN. Firemen may lose their lives also in the service here. Does the gentleman propose to pension them?

Mr. COX, of New York. No, sir. I propose only to pension those men who lose their lives in this humane service.

Mr. HOLMAN. But the gentleman should not restrict these provisions. If he wants to embrace one class why not take all? The employés, for instance, of the railway mail-service are sometimes killed in the service. Does the gentleman propose to pension them? And if so, where do you stop?

Mr. COX, of New York. I propose to stop right here with the Life-Saving Service, and so to frame it as to make no dangerous precedent.

Mr. HOLMAN. If this provision is extended to one class it would seem proper that you should extend it to all classes of service under the Government.

Mr. COX, of New York. There is nothing of the kind in contemplation, as the gentleman will see if he reads the bill. These men risk their lives in saving life. They are most exceptional heroes, as the instances I shall give testify.

Mr. HOLMAN. Plenty of men risk their lives.

Mr. COX, of New York. I desire to repeat here and now, in the presence of gentlemen who have voted for similar measures, that the House has adopted as a rule a method of paying the families of deceased employés from six months to one year's pay at the salary they were receiving at the time of their death, and also their medical expenses during their last illness, and funeral bills. Gentlemen vote such bills, do they not? Now, if we are to have a precedent for the pay proposed in this bill, here is one.

But the case I propose is larger than any of our precedents; this is sui generis. If the House would only understand that only twenty-four men, or rather their families, in all would be the beneficiaries of this act, there would not be so much hesitation in voting to adopt these two sections of the bill.

Mr. RANDALL. Will the gentleman from Ohio yield to me for a moment?

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York a question before he concludes.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to ask the gentleman from Ohio what length of time he yielded to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. I yielded to the gentleman from New York ten minutes.

Mr. COX, of New York. If I have not exhausted the time allowed me I will hear the question of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RANDALL. I have no objection to the gentleman from Massachusetts asking the question he desires to ask the gentleman from New York.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I merely wish to ask the gentleman from New York whether this provision does not go further than he contemplates. He says that it applies to only twenty-five men who have lost their lives since 1876. Now, it seems to me, under the general provision set out in the sections as read, that it will include all persons, not only those who lost their lives, but those who may contract disease in the line of service. That is, perhaps, a broad interpretation to give to it; but the language here would make this applicable to all persons employed in the Life-Saving Service just as the pension laws apply to persons in the military service; that is, that those persons who contract disease, the result of injury or exposure in the service, are entitled to pensions. In this case those persons will be construed as being in the line of duty who are upon the rolls and draw their pay. Now, that being the case, I submit to the gentleman from New York whether this would not cover the case not only of those men who, from the exposure to which they are subjected, may contract disease in the line of duty, but also cover a multitude of other cases where disease has been contracted in the service while not, perhaps, in the strict line of duty. Would it not apply to any case where a disease was contracted while in the service?

Mr. COX, of New York. I think not. This list of twenty-four men embraces those who lost their lives as well as those who were permanently disabled in the service. We seek to provide for those who are needy by reason of disability in this service. We seek to make an incentive to enter and an encouragement to continue in the service for a generous purpose. These clauses will do this.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. It would seem from the language here to go much further than the gentleman from New York intended.

Mr. HAWK. I will state, if the gentleman from New York will permit me, that this number, twenty-four, is strictly correct. Twenty-one of these men were drowned in the discharge of their duties, and three of them died from exposure. This is the record from the bureau.

Mr. COX, of New York. Now, Mr. Speaker, by leave of the House, may I not add to my statements some statements of the wonderful benefits of this service? I have referred to the loss of life on the North Carolina coast and the heroism of the surfmen there. May I make a picture of the case of the NUOVA OTTAVIA.

On the evening of March 1, 1875, the bark Nuova Ottavia, an Italian vessel, stranded soon after dark off Currituck Beach, North Carolina. The weather was cloudy, the air dark, the sea rough, the surf high, heavy, and winding. The keeper and crew of station No. 4, sixth district, saw the vessel. True, it was in the gloom, four hundred yards from shore, but they saw her as she lay aslant in the breakers. A number of her sails were unfurled. Those who saw her tell me she looked like a phantom. Alive to the peril of those on board there was instantly launched the surf-boat, with a haste so generous that the crew did not even stop to put on their cork life-belts. This error of a gallant ardor cost them their lives. What happened has a horrible brevity. The watching group on shore saw the boat go out through the breakers; the lantern is in her bows; it just touches with light the strong figures of her oarsmen. Ten minutes after she is invisible in the darkness and only the lantern is burning low down under the lee of the huge hull. It shows that she is alongside. Suddenly the lantern goes out. There is a frightful scream from the sea. In a few moments the alarmed group on shore see four oars come tumbling in at their feet in the foam; then the surf-boat, bottom up; and then, dark in the surf, the body of a man. This man was one of the life-saving crew.

As the boat came up alongside, the Italian sailors, crazed with excitement, had flung themselves into her in a mass. They capsized her. Nine of them were lost, and the entire crew of the surf-boat, seven in number, also instantly perished. The life-belts, which in their rush to the rescue the surf-boat crew had not paused to put on, would have saved them. They died through the excess of their zeal for humanity. They were all poor; they all left widows and small children; and to this hour these women and children are in utter penury. They do not ask gentlemen to put them on a civil list. Their protectors are enlisted in a better world. They ask to be in some way recognized as worthy of our generous thought.

PEAKED BAR CASE.

Another case I may refer to. It is that of the Peaked Hill Bar crew. It is one of the disasters of 1880. At four o'clock in the morning of November 30, in a darkness blurred with the coming snow and beaten by the northwest blasts, a group of wind-blown figures carrying a boat scrambled down the bluff, twenty-five feet high, which flanks the beach at Peaked Hill Bar, Cape Cod. This was the crew of life-saving station No. 7, (second district.) They were led by their keeper, Captain D. H. Atkins. He had hurried to the relief of a sloop, the C. E. Trumbull. She could be seen with the lights in her rigging, stranded on the outer bar, four hundred yards off, noisily filling the air with the flapping of her sails.

The sloop had six men on board. I need not speak of the ill-fame of this sinister bar which held them. They were in deadly peril. Hardly a moment after the stranding the alert patrol of the station discovers them. The night was all at once ablaze with his scarlet signals. Bounding to the station, he had aroused his comrades. No more lion-hearted men than these ever lived on the rough New England coast, and with heroic spirit they had rushed from the station along the bluff and come tumbling down the ragged bank with their boat, at the first cry that called them to the rescue. A moment, and their oars were propelling their boat, which was heading through over the dangerous swells of the sea. That sea was a series of cataracts and flumes. I know what they are, having been with these surfmen in some of their adventures. In the fierce rush of the chute and the roll of the wild waves, and held in this tempestuous mass of waters was the sloop, rolling convulsively, with a wall of boom and sail dipping perpetually into the sea. This boom and sail, held away by the strong wind, left a triangular space between them and the hull, the only place where the boat could approach the vessel with any degree of safety.

To increase this chance the brave keeper, Atkins, as his boat came seething near, sang out to those on board to cut the main sheet, so as to let the boom and sail swing still farther forward and increase the space into which the boat must enter. He was not obeyed, and as time allowed no delay he pushed up and took off four of those on board. The other two dallied, and as delay would imperil those already in the boat, the keeper gave the order to put to the shore and safely landed them. Then this hero of the icy beach once more grasped the steering-oar and gave the order for the return to save the other two. Once more the vessel was reached and the boat entered the hazardous space between the hull and the dipping spar and sail. A sea suddenly swept around the stern, washing the boat to one side; the boom at that moment dipped, rose with a rush, and as it rose, caught the boat under one of its cork fenders and threw it over. In one moment the gallant life savers were struggling for their lives in the gloom, in the rush of deafening and blinding waters, in the solitude, for as if by some baleful magic the sloop, from which some assistance might have been rendered them, was suddenly released by the bar and darkly drifted away. They clung to their capsized boat. Again and again the brute force of the waters tears them from the bottom. Their cork life-belts assist to sustain them, but do not shield them from the chill of the winter sea, and the last scene in this tragedy shows three of them gaining the beach with souls almost released from their bodies, and the others dying valiantly in a service which gentlemen would place below the service of one of our doorkeepers who may die here in his arduous labors.

Of those three men saved one remains crippled for life; the other two lingered long under their injuries before they fortunately could again be made whole. The gallant keeper, the man of a hundred wrecks and rescues, the model of fidelity, humanity, and courage along that coast, the tried and trusted master of that station for ten years, was among those that perished. He left a wife and two dependent children. His comrades who died with him, and the crippled survivor, were also poor and also had families depending on their lives.

HONORS TO THE HEROES.

Pensions for such men or for those they leave! Rather give to them and theirs what Rome in her heroic days gave to her heroes. No one questioned whether Horatius who kept the bridge in the "brave days of old," when the Volscians charged upon the city, should or could be paid for their patriotic devotion. What did Rome do for her hero?

They gave him of the corn-land,
That was of public right,
As much as two strong oxen
Could plow from morn to night.
And they made a molten image,
And set it up on high,
And there it stands unto this day
To witness if I lie.

Thus sung Macaulay in his lay of the Ancient Roman—whose feat of valor has no comparison with that which I would recognize in this service. It was the play of a child to keep "the bridge" compared with the heroic endeavors of these dauntless dead heroes whose families we are now asked to recognize.

IS THE MEASURE SECTIONAL?

But, Mr. Speaker, the bill which I had the honor to propose, and which is the supplement of other measures near to my heart and service here, has been attacked in the Senate. A Senator from Georgia broke through parliamentary rule and decorum to impeach my advocacy of this humane and generous bill. I see in the RECORD this colloquy:

Mr. FRYE. Is the Senator from Georgia aware that elsewhere (the rules of the Senate do not allow me to say where) a leading Democrat has charge of a bill and is endeavoring to make it a law with the salaries provided in this bill, it being really a pet measure of a leading Democrat?

Mr. BROWN. I will simply say if that is so I disapprove very much of the conduct of that leading Democrat.

It was a terrible trial to my patience to sit in the Senate, anxious for my bill, and hear this censorious disapproval. The bill, however, survives.

It was some compensation for me to hear my friend, Senator FRYE, who used to adorn this House, give the coup de grace to these patronizing tones of the Georgian Senator. He regards life-saving as a Democratic measure.

If there were any credit for this measure to a Democrat, "leading" or otherwise, I fear my party has lost more than I have by the attempt of some of its leaders to embarrass this humane system.

Why, sir, this bill was attacked ruthlessly and ignorantly in the Senate as a sectional measure. Is there any rule of decorum which forbids me from replying to these unjust allegations? As one responsible for the system I beg to respond to the Senatorial harangues.

THE LIFE-SAVING SERVICE NOT SECTIONAL.

The charge that sectionalism has been introduced into the Life-Saving Service rests solely upon the disproportionate distribution of stations in the North and South. As the author of the measure of 1878 I desire to repel the charge. These considerations should satisfy any candid mind that this disproportion is necessary:

1.—COAST.

The difference in the character and conformation of the coast. From the Saint Croix River, the northeastern boundary of the United States, as far as Boston, especially along the States of Maine and New Hampshire, the coast is exceedingly jagged and indented, full of rocky ridges, extending out into the sea and forming rugged capes, headlands, points, small islands, and reefs, involving peculiar dangers to mariners; though, on the other hand, these characteristics afford numerous harbors of refuge and places of shelter in tempestuous weather.

The coast of Massachusetts has two dangerous capes, Cape Ann and Cape Cod, the latter a long, barren peninsula of sand extending forty miles into the ocean, and then, bending abruptly upward, continues forty miles further, tales of the terrible shipwrecks upon which are related in almost every household in New England.

Below Cape Cod are Nantucket and Vineyard Sounds, which contain a complete net-work of exceedingly dangerous ledges, shoals, and rips.

The coast of Rhode Island partakes more of the nature of the coast of Maine. From Montauk Point, the eastern extremity of Long Island, to Cape Fear, near the dividing line of the Carolinas, a distance of six hundred miles, the coast has a remarkable and almost uniform feature, namely: an outlying narrow strip of sand, varying in width from a quarter of a mile to five miles, separated from the main land from one to six or seven miles by bays, sounds, lagoons, and other small bodies of water. This desolate strip is intersected by New York, Delaware, and Chesapeake Bays, the gateways to the great marts of New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Norfolk, and is broken up into narrow islands of various lengths by numerous inlets, opening communication, rarely navigable, between the ocean and the bays and sounds. Outside of this sandy stretch are sand-bars lying at a distance of from one to five hundred yards from the shore, which is also the case with Cape Cod, many of which shift their positions with almost every storm. The water over them is so shallow that vessels of any considerable size driven ashore fetch up on them and rarely reach the beach until broken to pieces. Between these bars and the shore is the surf, the power of which in storms speedily crushes and rends into fragments the stanchest vessels.

From Cape Hatteras almost to Florida the coast line tends to the westward, and is distant from the track of vessels not bound to or from the local ports embraced within these points, and below Cape Fear the shores are generally so bold that vessels strike well up on the beach, rendering escape from them comparatively easy.

The coast of Florida is also bold, and persons shipwrecked by stranding usually find little difficulty in getting ashore, but once on shore, as the region is mostly uninhabited, they are greatly exposed to the terrors of starvation and thirst. In the straits of Florida are many low coral reefs and islands, with outlying shoals, which render the passage intricate and dangerous, and wrecks upon them are of frequent occurrence, for the protection of life and property from which, however, in view of the distance from land, the methods and appliances of the Life-Saving Service are not at present adapted.

Along most of the Gulf coast the water is shoal for a great distance out, the soundings regular, and the coast line is generally low, marshy or sandy. Vessels often ground upon the shoals, but life is rarely imperiled except in hurricanes, when life-saving efforts from the shore would be of little use. A large portion of the coast of Texas, however, runs almost directly north and south and is exposed to the effects of the "northers," especially if the wind is a little quartering from the east, and here station operations are applicable. These "northers" are the storms most destructive to shipping in the Gulf, but, except on the western coast of Texas, they drive vessels out into the Gulf and not ashore. The western coast is already supplied with stations. It should be here recollected that the protection afforded by the Life-Saving Service is chiefly against loss of life and property from stranded vessels, and that the service is not equipped with the expensive wrecking steamers and their paraphernalia which are requisite to give relief to disabled vessels distant from the shore.

II.—CLIMATE.

It seems scarcely necessary to call attention to the difference in the dangers to shipping in the rigorous, tempestous, and wintry climate of the North and the mild, sunny, summer climate of the South. One naturally fixes the dividing line at Cape Hatteras, where the warm currents of air which follow the Gulf Stream from the Gulf mingle with the colder currents which sweep from the northern shore and from off the sea and from inland, producing at that point violent commotions and tempests, which have made the name of Hatteras terrible; and it is this region and the coast north of it that has required by far the greatest protection.

III.—SHIPPING.

The shipping exposed to marine disaster in the North far exceeds that so exposed in the South. The statistics of the number of entrances and clearances of vessels at Northern and Southern ports would amply show this if they were at hand; but a moment's thought is sufficient to prove it. All vessels going in and out of Boston must pass between Cape Ann and Cape Cod, and in the case of coasters along the shores of Maine and New Hampshire or those of Cape Cod.

All vessels going in and out of New York, the great commercial metropolis of America, except those navigating Long Island Sound, must pass between Long Island and New Jersey, and coasters must run along these shores; all vessels going in and out of Philadelphia must pass between Cape May and Cape Henlopen, and coasters along the shores of New Jersey, or those of Delaware, Maryland, and a portion of Virginia; and all vessels going in and out of Baltimore and Norfolk must pass between Cape Charles and Cape Henry, and coasters along the shores of Delaware, Maryland and Virginia, or those of North Carolina. It is not necessary to ascertain what percentage of our commerce is embraced in this statement. Below Hatteras, as before stated, all vessels except those bound to or from the local ports between Hatteras and Florida follow lines of travel distant from the coast.

In contrast, therefore, with the commerce of the ports which have been named is to be placed that of Charleston, Savannah, Mobile, New Orleans, and Galveston. It is not necessary to mention the ports of minor importance, such as Portland, Portsmouth, Newburyport, Gloucester, Newport, Providence, New London, New Haven, and other places in the North, and Wilmington, Georgetown, Beaufort, Fernandina, Jacksonville, Key West, Pensacola, and others in the South.

IV.—STATISTICS OF DISASTERS.

On page 244 of the annual report of the Life-Saving Service for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1880, will be found a list of places on the Atlantic and Gulf coasts where vessels have stranded during the last ten years. These statistics are not confined to the domain of the Life-Saving Service, but embrace all parts of the coast, whether within or without the scope of its operations. They are not gathered through the agents of the service, but through an independent source under the provisions of the act of June 20, 1874, which require collectors of customs and other customs officers to obtain wreck reports of the masters and owners of vessels which suffer disaster. This table shows exactly what might be expected in view of the foregoing considerations. It shows that the number of disasters to vessels by stranding are apportioned to the Atlantic States as follows:

Maine	315
New Hampshire	25
Massachusetts	529
Rhode Island	102
Connecticut	45
New York	208
New Jersey	247
Delaware	73
Maryland	65
Virginia	138
North Carolina	134
South Carolina	27
Georgia	19
Florida	88
Alabama	5
Louisiana	15
Texas	97
Total	2,132

If the division between the North and the South be made at Mason and Dixon's line, the total number of vessels stranded on the Northern coast is 1,471, and in the South 661, or 810 more in the North than in the South. But no complaint has been heard that the number of existing stations and those provided for in the bill are not sufficient as far south as the northern boundary of South Carolina. If, then, we make the division at this line, the total number of disasters north of it is found to be 1,875, against 251 south. New Jersey alone has 247, which is within 4 of the whole number south, while Massachusetts has more than twice the number.

DISTRIBUTION OF SERVICE.

Now, while these statistics are very useful and largely guide the officers of the service in considering the distribution of stations when recommending action by Congress, it would be folly to distribute the stations in exact proportion to them. For instance, on the coast of Maine, because of the numerous harbors and sheltering lees heretofore alluded to, and the fact that at many places where vessels strike they go well up on the land as they do in the South, making escape easy, there are but nine stations provided, counting those existing and those contemplated by the bill. For similar and other reasons Massachusetts, although embracing many more disasters than any other State, will have but twenty-one stations when those provided for in the bill are established. New Jersey has forty stations and it has been found necessary to establish two more. For reference here is a statement by districts on the Atlantic and Gulf coasts showing the number of vessels stranded in each district during the ten years ended June 30, 1880, the number of existing stations, and the number of additional stations proposed by the bill.

Districts.	States.	No. of vessels stranded.	Total in each district.	No. of stations.	No. of stations proposed.
First district	Maine	315	340	7	4
	New Hampshire	25
Second district	Massachusetts	529	529	15	6
Third district	Rhode Island	102	310	37	37
	New York	208
Fourth district	New Jersey	247	247	40	42
Fifth district	Delaware	73	202	11	6
	Maryland	65
	Virginia, (part)	64
Sixth district	Virginia, (part)	74	208	25	2
	North Carolina	134
Seventh district	Florida	88	88	5	6
Eighth district	Alabama	5	121	6	1
	Louisiana	15
	Texas	97
	Mississippi	4

Mr. Speaker, I have been thus particular in vindicating this bill because if it becomes a law it will require no more or other general legislation for years, except, perhaps, additional stations or houses of refuge and the annual appropriations.

As I am associated with this system, I desire to remove the ungenerous reproach that it is sectional.

The answer to these allegations may be found in the history of the service during the past twelve years. This I have given. Its history the past year is a splendid vindication.

LIFE SAVING THE LAST YEAR.

Two hundred and fifty disasters to vessels occurred within the scope of the Life-Saving Service during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1881. Eighteen hundred and seventy-eight persons were on board these vessels, and 1,854 of them were saved. Twenty-four were lost. In addition to the 1,854 saved from distressed vessels, 16 persons who were not on board of vessels were rescued from drowning by the crews of the service. Four hundred and seven shipwrecked persons were sheltered and cared for at stations, to whom 1,060 days' relief in the aggregate was furnished.

The value of the vessels involved in these disasters is estimated at $2,744,247, and their cargoes at $1,310,505; total value of property imperiled, $4,054,752. Of the total imperiled $2,828,680 was saved and $1,226,070 lost. There were sixty-six vessels totally lost.

In rendering assistance the surf-boat was used two hundred and fifteen times, making three hundred and seventy-six trips. The self-righting and self-bailing life-boat was called into service ten times, making thirteen trips. Seventy trips were made in smaller boats, which were used on fifty-four occasions. The life-car was used once and made three trips.

The breeches-buoy was used fifteen times and made one hundred and thirty-two passages. The wreck-gun was fired twenty-five times, being employed thirteen times. Two hundred and forty-eight persons were landed in the surf-boat, 19 in the life-boat, 20 in small boats, 6 by the life-car, and 98 by the breeches-buoy. Eleven persons were brought ashore by lines cast over vessels, and the surfmen rescued 14 more by dragging them out of the surf and undertow. A surfman swam to one man and rescued him; another was dragged out of the ice; one was taken from the water into which he had fallen, and five others were recovered who had gone overboard from boats and piers.

Vessels were worked off when stranded, repaired when damaged, piloted out of dangerous places, and assisted in various ways by station crews. This work was done by the crews generally alone, but sometimes they were assisted by or worked in conjunction with other wrecking agencies.

By the watchful vigilance of the life-saving crews, 45 vessels were warned of their approach to dangerous places, with the signals in the hands of the patrolmen, and thus saved from disaster.

This, sir, was last year's work; one year only. Does it not in its supreme benefaction rescue from detraction the attempt to place this service along with the business of taking life? Was there ever since God gave gentleness to the human heart and made our race thrill with heroic devotion to rescue and save so noble a system of heroism as this service illustrates?

CONCLUSION.

I have spoken here perhaps too much of this service. I fear to cloud its brightness by words merely iterative. But, sir, there are hearts beating with sympathy awaiting our action here of which the representatives of the people should know more. These hearts seek relief in their human sympathy, sometimes in poetic sensibility.

I have just had presented to me some verses of tenderest melody. May I be permitted to quote the words of the gifted wife of one of our own members, the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SPRINGER,] who sings of the Wreck upon the Strand with such sweetness and light as to make our path of duty both plain and beautiful:

How like our mortal life is to the sea!
Its tranquil hours, its storms, its mystery;
Its breaking waves, that ceaseless beat the shore
Like breaking hearts that hope till hope is o'er.
Its drifting sails, that meet upon the main
Like hearts that love an hour then part again.
Its hidden graves, o'er which the waters flow,
Hiding the skeletons that sleep below;
Its drifting sands, that kindly cover o'er
Like passing years, the wrecks that line the shore;
Its songs, that oft at eventide we hear
Like echoes from that world so far—so near!
Its haze, through which we see the distant land,
But most of all its wrecks upon the strand.

It is our consolation and delectation that amid the vicissitudes of the sea and of our life—of which the sea is an emblem—we are enabled to make its catastrophies harmless by the humane legislation of which this bill is an example for all time and to all nations. We bend over the stranded wreck, the Iris not of poetry and hope only, but by our code of gentle laws we send out upon the dark waves the angel of safety. We compensate for grief and danger by the heroism which the Government fosters and sustains by the grant of means under kind conditions to the end that the sanctity of human life may be enhanced and the world ameliorated and blessed.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask the reading of the proposition at issue before the House again, because in the confusion when it was read I was unable to hear clearly or fully understand its effect. Now, I admit that the proposition does appeal to the better feelings of humanity, more especially where men have been drowned or have otherwise lost their lives in this service. But, nevertheless, this general character of legislation perhaps involves the inauguration of a system of civil pensions. When once such a system is inaugurated, how easy it will be to extend this provision from two years to a longer time; or, in any case of disability, to a longer time than one year, or in case of minors for a longer period than sixteen years.

Now, if I am correctly informed, this question has been considered as a question of pensions and the creation of a civil pension list before one of the committees of this House, and has been reported or is about to be reported upon adversely. The gentleman from New York wants to make a distinction of terms between the general character of the bill, asserting in this instance that it is a gratuity, whereas in the instance I have suggested as having been adversely reported upon by the committee it is recognized as a pension list; it does create a quasi pension list; and for that reason I think we should approach the subject with the greatest caution.

This proposition was never considered in the House. It is true, as stated, perhaps, that this provision was added in the Senate; but when it came back to the House it was non-concurred in, if my recollection is correct, and if not the gentleman can correct me.

Mr. COX, of New York. The gentleman is correct. All of the amendments were formally non-concurred in.

Mr. RANDALL. That is my recollection, and the measure now stands before the House simply upon the language proposed by the Senate to be ingrafted upon statutes of the United States. Now, with reference to the families of these men who have lost their lives in the service I have every sympathy. But if the principle sought to be created here is a correct one a man on the police force in this city who loses his life or is disabled in the service should be pensioned; or the men of the revenue-marine service should be pensioned, and, in fact, the Commissioner has made a recommendation to that effect. And so with firemen, who may have lost their lives here, the same claim might be set up for pensions in their cases.

My sole object was to direct the attention of the House to the inauguration of the system upon which we are about to enter, so that if the majority shall decide to adopt it they shall do so with a full understanding of it and with their eyes open.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. RANDALL. I will yield to the gentleman the remainder of my time.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. It seems to me there is some confusion in the minds of gentlemen in regard to these provisions which have been added to the bill in the Senate. I find that one of the sections provides that any person injured in the service shall continue to draw his pay during one year, and if deemed advisable by the General Superintendent he may continue to draw it for two years. Now, that certainly is a reasonable proposition, and is not to be regarded in the light of a pension. It is in the nature of a temporary relief for a disability incurred in the public service of a peculiarly hazardous character.

As a rule no person engaged in business in this country employing men cuts off their wages if they are disabled in his service until it is determined whether they are permanently invalided or not. It seems to me, therefore, that there can be no objection to that provision.

The second provision, which is called a pension, is not in fact a pension, but an allowance of wages for two years to the widow or family of the person who may be killed or die from wounds or injuries received in the service. So far as this would tend to establish a civil pension list, I might be disposed to object to it.

But when you consider the nature of this service, when you consider that although it is a paid service it is after all essentially a volunteer service, one that existed on the coast of this country long before the Government took it in hand, and these men, although paid, are receiving simply a remuneration for so much time devoted to the service and nothing for the risk and danger attending it, it seems to me it is hardly fair to call a pension this allowance for two years, and discuss it from that point of view. It should rather be regarded as a part of the contract by which he engages in a service exposed to peculiar peril. For myself I shall oppose all civil pensions, but on a careful reading of these sections it seems to me they are not open to this objection, and make but a reasonable and fair allowance for the risk attending this most important and difficult public service. Let it be remembered the allowance in no case is to exceed two years' pay, which is no more than any just man will regard as a moderate pension for a family suddenly deprived of its means of support by the sacrifice of the life of its head in order to save the lives of those "who go down to sea in ships."

Mr. COX, of New York. And is intended as an incentive to induce men to enter this service.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. HILL.]

Mr. HILL. I hope the report of the committee of conference will be adopted. I believe that some members here lose sight of the fact that the men who are the most exposed in this service and the most likely to come under the operation of the provisions of this bill are the keepers and the surfmen.

If I understand it, the keepers will under this bill receive a compensation of $800 a year for their services, and the surfmen receive at the rate of $50 per month, or $600 a year. Therefore the allowance under this provision of the bill will amount to $1,200 in the case of surfmen, and of $1,600 in the case of the keepers for two years, those men being more exposed than any others in this service on the coast.

I know a little of the exposures and hardships of this service, and have seen a little of the work of these keepers and surfmen. We have a hundred and twenty miles of coast in New Jersey which these men have to look after. We know that during the storms of winter and in the darkness of night they are obliged to patrol the coast, to be subject to the greatest exposure, and when there is a wreck on the coast they must risk their lives in rescuing those persons who may be on the wreck.

I well remember a short time before the reorganization of the Life-Saving Service, near Squam Beach, a wreck came on shore, and there were very few men to be found who were willing to risk their lives in taking a life-boat out to the wreck to rescue those upon it. Volunteers were called for, and a number stepped forward and entered the boat; and some of them lost their lives on that occasion.

Standing by were the wives and children of these men, looking upon their husbands and fathers, and pleading with them not to risk their lives in that service. Amid it all one noble fellow said to his wife, "I have a duty to perform in the line of my service here and I must go." He went in the boat, and there upon the waters before her own eyes she saw her husband washed overboard and drowned, and his body came ashore among the dead who were washed from the vessel, the voice that had so recently spoken to them hushed in death.

I hold that men who risk their lives in that way for the help of others ought to be looked after by this great Government and by the people who are so much interested in having a perfect life-saving service on the coast. We know that during the last few years, since this service has been made more effective than it was in years gone by, there have been fewer wrecks and little loss of life. These men in the storm and darkest nights, bearing their red torches, signals of danger, patrol the coast giving warning to vessels to keep away, that they are too near the land.

The vigilance of the life-saving patrols, who are nightly guarding the beaches, detects vessels, either sailing too near the shore or standing directly into danger, and in such cases the patrolmen at once fire their red Caston signals, whose vivid flame warns the navigators of their peril, and enables them to wear ship or tack away in time. Thus the patrolman becomes a sort of perambulating beacon, flashing in aid of navigation upon occasion. There have been during the past year forty-five instances where vessels in jeopardy have received this species of warning, and been saved from total or partial wreck, the signal being well understood on the vessels, so perfect is the signal system. This is a class of assistance which deserves special mention, involving as it does all the benefits to commerce and humanity of the more serious operations while unaccompanied by damage or suffering.

They oftentimes are obliged to draw their heavy carriage or car with their apparatus through soft deep sand with ropes over their shoulders, in all weighing twelve hundred pounds, and sometimes have to go to a vessel three or four miles, some of the way waist-deep in the water, carrying their life-saving car, mortar, ropes, &c., and things necessary to get communication with a wreck. Sometimes these men are out sixteen and twenty hours with but little to eat or drink; they thus labor in the line of their duty for the saving of human life and property. At some of the stations on the coast they are allowed to hire horses, if any can be got near by, to hitch to their car and apparatus, and at some stations it is impossible to get them. The service will never be complete until the more exposed coasts are fully equipped with horses to take their loads of apparatus to the place of wreck. It can be readily seen how worn and exhausted and unfit for surf duty are men who have been compelled to draw those heavy burdens through the sand and water three or four miles. One of the provisions of this bill, as has been stated and referred to, and now before this House for adoption, reads as follows:

SEC. 7. That if any keeper or member of a crew of a life-saving or life-boat station shall be so disabled by reason of any wound or injury received or disease contracted in the Life-Saving Service in the line of duty as to unfit him for the performance of duty, such disability to be determined in such manner as shall be prescribed in the regulations of the service, he shall be continued upon the rolls of the service and entitled to receive his full pay during the continuance of such disability, not to exceed the period of one year, unless the General Superintendent shall recommend, upon a statement of facts, the extension of the period through a portion or the whole of another year, and said recommendation receive the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury as just and reasonable; but in no case shall said disabled keeper or member of a crew be continued upon the rolls or receive pay for a longer period than two years.

And also:

SEC. 8. That if any keeper or member of a crew of a life-saving or life-boat station shall hereafter die by reason of perilous service or any wound or injury received or disease contracted in the Life-Saving Service in the line of duty, leaving a widow, or a child or children under sixteen years of age, such widow and child or children shall be entitled to receive in equal portions during a period of two years, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, the same amount, payable quarterly as far as practicable, that the husband or father would be entitled to receive as pay if he were alive and continued in the service: Provided, That if the widow shall remarry at any time during the said two years her portion of said amount shall cease to be paid to her from the date of her remarriage, but shall be added to the amount to be paid to the remaining beneficiaries under the provisions of this section, if there be any; and if any child shall arrive at the age of sixteen years during the said two years the payment of the portion of such child shall cease to be paid to such child from the date on which such age shall be attained, but shall be added to the amount to be paid to the remaining beneficiaries, if there be any.

That, in my opinion, does not go far enough. If any class of persons are entitled to aid and care of the Government they are families of keepers and surfmen who may have lost their lives in the Government service, in the work of saving life on the United States coasts. The number of deaths in late years, through the efficiency of the Life-Saving Service, have been very few, and are likely to be fewer in the future, as this service is perfected, but when they do occur the Government ought to look after the families of those who die. December 16, I introduced a bill containing a clause to suit these cases, which reads as follows:

SEC. 7. That if any keeper or member of a crew of a life-saving or life-boat station has lost his life in the performance of his duty, or died by reason of any wound or injury received or disease contracted in the line of his duty in the Life-Saving Service, or shall hereafter lose his life or die by like reason, leaving a widow or a child or children, the widow and child or children of a keeper shall be entitled to receive the same pension as if the husband or father were a lieutenant in the naval service of the United States, and the widow and child or children of a member of a crew shall be entitled to receive the same pension as if the husband or father were a seaman in the naval service of the United States.

The committee saw fit to report another bill, and so the above section did not come up for action, and now this bill under consideration from the conference committee, I understand, cannot be amended. While I would have preferred to have the above bill passed, yet I shall vote for adopting the committee's report allowing two years' salary to families of deceased keepers or surfmen. Another provision in this bill under consideration allows keepers $800 per year and surfmen $50 a month or $600 per year. In the bill I introduced it allowed the surfmen $65 per month, which I think a proper amount. It reads as follows:

SEC. 5. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to cause to be paid to any of the keepers and members of the crews of the Life-Saving Service, upon the recommendation of the superintendent of the district in which such keepers and crews belong, concurred in by the inspecting officer of said district, and approved by the General Superintendent of the Life-Saving Service, one month's extra pay for such extraordinary and gallant services hereafter rendered at any shipwreck as in his judgment shall merit such consideration; the compensation for pay of the keepers to be at the rate of $800 per year, and the compensation for pay of the crews of experienced surfmen at life-saving and life-boat stations at the rate of $65 per month.

When we consider the hard work they perform, the great risk of life attending it, $65 is not too much for the service. I have been on the New Jersey coast at different points, seen many of these men, heard their tales of shipwrecks, know their experience as surfmen who would any time risk their own lives to save others. But few witness their bravery and know of the great risk they run of their own lives. Their present pay is $1.33 a day and find themselves; under this bill they will get $10 a month additional, not the pay of a page in this House for six and eight hours a day. I received not long since a letter from a gentleman of high standing connected with the Life-Saving Service, who writes as follows:

I trust you will pardon the liberty I take in presenting the subject of an increase of salary for our miserably paid Life-Saving Service, and in asking your co-operation and aid in securing legislation necessary to secure it. These men perform the most arduous and perilous service of any class of persons in Government employ, and when we consider that a day means twenty-four hours, and a week seven days, the pay received is entirely inadequate. Indeed, it will not support their families, and they are now serving only in the hope that the long-deferred promise of more liberal compensation will be speedily fulfilled. They can easily earn better pay in other less responsible pursuits; and, should they abandon the stations, years will be required to properly educate and train a class of inexperienced men in the peculiar duties required. New Jersey comprises one of the most exposed districts in the United States, and having been connected with the service six years and become acquainted with the three hundred and twelve men who have faithfully and creditably served the commercial world, and knowing their ability and trustworthiness, I should exceedingly regret to see them leave the service because a Government which annually appropriates millions to improve obscure streams and harbors fails to recognize their claim for a reasonable increase of the meager allowance they now receive; showing the views of one who lives among them and knows all about their work. I would be glad if the amount asked for in my bill could be paid, but as the committee decided against me I vote for the adoption of the conference committee's report. When this service was reorganized in 1871, it was my pleasure to give my voice and my vote to help perfect and make it more efficient. I have many constituents who are interested in having it sustained and perfected, and as a Representative of New Jersey I feel interested in its success. This service being largely located on the shores of New Jersey, we desire that it shall reflect credit upon the State as well as the whole country. The results of last year's operations of the Life-Saving Service in the United States, as seen in the report ending June 30, 1881, are very gratifying.

There were, according to the reports of the district officers, 250 disasters to vessels within the scope of the service during the year. On board these vessels there were 1,878 persons, of whom 1,854 were saved and 24 lost. Succor was afforded at the stations to 407 shipwrecked persons, to whom 1,060 days' relief in the aggregate was furnished. The estimated value of the vessels involved in these disasters was $2,744,247, and that of their cargoes $1,310,505, making the total value of the property imperiled $4,054,752. Of this amount $2,828,680 was saved and $1,226,072 lost. The number of disasters involving total loss of vessels was 66.

In one hundred and eighty-eight instances vessels were worked off when stranded, piloted out of dangerous places, repaired when damaged, or assisted in similar ways by station crews. In some of these cases the men worked in conjunction with other wrecking agencies, but generally by themselves and the sailors on board alone. In many instances both vessels and crews would have been lost without this aid.

The subjoined table gives a summary of results in the field of life-saving operations for the last ten years, the period since the introduction of the present system:

General summary of disasters which have occurred within the scope of life-saving operations, from November 1, 1871, (date of introduction of present system,) to close of fiscal year ending June 30, 1881:

Total number of disasters	1,347
Total value of vessels	$16,083,320
Total value of cargoes	$8,429,167
Total value of property saved	$14,958,895
Total value of property lost	$9,553,592
Total number of persons on vessels	12,259
Total number of persons saved	11,864
Total number of lives lost	395
Total number of persons succored	2,610
Total number of days' succor afforded	7,050

We give below a table of operations for the last ten years on the coast of New Jersey:

Statistics of disasters from November 1, 1871, to June 30, 1881.

Number of wrecks	283
Total value of vessels	$3,569,450
Total value of cargoes	$1,677,431
Total value of property	$5,246,881
Total value of property saved	$3,345,718
Total value of property lost	$1,901,163
Total number of lives imperiled	2,211
Total number of lives saved	2,177
Total number of lives lost	34
Number of shipwrecked persons sheltered at stations	600
Number of days' shelter afforded	1,736

The report for 1881 shows on the New Jersey coast forty wrecks, and not a loss of life. This is most gratifying, showing the results of the service and its complete efficiency. In striking contrast with the present state of affairs on Long Island and New Jersey coasts, I submit the following extract from the report of 1876, page 61:

Prior to the first attempts of the Government in 1848 for the preservation of life and property upon these shores, it can only be stated that the latter were so terribly calamitous as to be held in the utmost dread by ship-owners and mariners, and the names of Fire Island, Barnegat, and other localities were synonyms of horror. As has been shown, these early efforts must have been productive of considerable benefit, yet in the discussion in the House of Representatives which preceded the passage of the act "for the better preservation of life and property from vessels shipwrecked on the coasts of the United States," approved December 14, 1854, it was repeatedly asserted by Mr. Skelton, of New Jersey, and Mr. Chandler, of Pennsylvania, that the loss of life by shipwreck on the New Jersey and Long Island coasts was more than a thousand annually, and although there was a vigorous opposition to the bill this assertion was not questioned. The statement seems hardly credible, yet its unchallenged repetition proves that the annual loss of life was notoriously enormous.

Since 1871 accurate reports of all disasters occurring within the range of the operations of the service have been furnished the Department, from which the list above of disasters on New Jersey coast is taken.

The report further states:

The statistics of five years' operations must force upon the mind the striking consideration of the signal triumph gained by the service over the once invincible terrors of our sea board. Prior to 1850, as has been said, there is no record of the frightful mass of calamities, and we can only rely upon common tradition and upon unchallenged assertions made in public debate by dwellers on the shore, such as have been herein referred to. But from 1850 to 1870 we have a few data, and meager and imperfect though they are, they yet afford the basis for some comparison. We know, for example, that during these twenty years, 512 persons perished on the coast of New Jersey and Long Island alone, and though this sum is but a fragment of the fact, and the evidence is extant that the actual loss, though its number is unknown, was far greater, yet even this aggregate yields for that coast an average of over 25 persons lost per annum.

What, now, by the statistics given, has been the loss on the same coast since 1871? Only sixteen persons in five years! Against the average annual loss of 25.6 prior to 1871, the sum being but a fraction of the ghastly reality, the renovated service sets the record of 3.2 per annum, a decrease of 87½ per cent. In other words, where twenty-five persons were annually lost, and doubtless thrice that number, there are now three. Such a record as this has never been surpassed in the annals of efforts for the mitigation of marine disasters. It is the legitimate fruit of organization; and if ever the annual result shall be less proud, it will be because the Government fails to meet the demands made by the natural development of the service.

In 1881, report shows, as already stated, on the New Jersey coast forty wrecks, yet not the loss of a life. Certainly such a service with such results should receive every encouragement at the hands of Congress.

The sea-coast of New Jersey is one hundred and twenty miles in extent. Three-fourths of all passengers and freight from Europe to this country pass along this coast. It is said two-thirds of the United States revenue are collected in New York, which could not be collected unless the vessels in which the importations are made came to the port where the duties are paid, and nearly all have to pass along the New Jersey coast.

Millions of property and hundreds of lives have been saved by the New Jersey coast service since it has been in existence, while millions of the one and hundreds of the other have been lost through the neglect of the Government in the past to give the aid and assistance necessary to make the service a complete success.

It is our duty to protect life and property and leave nothing undone whereby we can make effectual and complete the life-saving service of our sea-coast. This matter is exciting a great deal of attention. All who cross the ocean and do business on the sea, the whole shipping interests of the country, have a deep interest in this matter. The large number of precious lives that are in constant danger, the vast amount of property that is liable to be destroyed on this coast as it approaches or leaves our two great commercial cities, New York and Philadelphia, demand that the service be made thoroughly efficient. Already it stands foremost among institutions of the kind in the world, and the nations of Europe are asking the aid of our Government in introducing upon their shores the American system, yet it has not reached the perfection its managers strive for and predict if Congress will only give the proper encouragement and the adequate means to do with.

This is a question that interests every one, to rescue lives and property, and the men in whose interests this bill is drawn ought to command the favor and sympathy of the members of this House. To understand this matter properly and what these men have to do the members ought to visit one of these life-saving stations, and also to be present in a storm and witness a wreck on the beach. We have before us an extract of a speech delivered by Senator Stockton, when in the United States Senate, which gives a vivid description of a storm and wreck on the New Jersey coast. I quote as follows:

I saw two ships come ashore within four miles of each other, one within a mile of the house I sojourned in on Squan Beach. I was there and saw the mortar fired. I saw the line seized. I was near enough to gaze into the faces of the anxious and suffering ones on board of that ship, women and children as well as men; I could have tossed a biscuit in the ship, and yet they might as well have been ten miles off. I saw the captain's wife put in this car, and helped draw her ashore and to take her safely out of it. And every living human being was saved from that ship. But down below, where the other ship was wrecked, there was no station. I was there and I saw the boldest and the bravest men the world ever saw get into a life-boat, notwithstanding the prayers and entreaties of their own families dependent on them for bread that they would not do so. I saw them start for that ship; I saw the boat overset, and I saw it strike one man of that brave little crew in the back and his lifeless body washed on shore, where wailed his desolate, heart-broken, and impoverished family. Some lives were saved on that occasion; the sea was not quite as high as it was above, but the back of the ship, as it is called, was broken, and many a life was lost, every one of which might have been saved if you had had the apparatus and a station there.

These life-cars are described by a writer as follows:

The life-car is a sort of boat formed of copper or iron and closed over above by a convex deck, with a sort of door or hatchway through it, by which the passengers to be conveyed in it to the shore are admitted. The car will hold from four to five persons. When the passengers are put in, the door, or rather cover, is shut down and bolted to its place, and the car is then drawn to the land, suspended by rings from a hawser which has previously been stretched from the ship to the shore.

The car is suspended from the hawser by means of short chains attached to the ends of it. These chains terminate in rings above, which rings ride upon the hawser, thus allowing the car to traverse to and fro from the vessel to the shore. The car is drawn along in making these passages, by means of lines attached to the two ends of it, one of which passes to the ship and the other to the shore. By means of these lines the empty car is first drawn out to the wreck by the passengers and crew, and then when loaded, it is drawn back to the land by the people assembled there.

Among the wrecks on the New Jersey coast was one described below, which occurred a few years ago, that excited much interest and tested the efficiency of the life-saving apparatus and the bravery and unselfish work of the keepers and surfmen of the Life-Saving Service:

It was in the middle of January and during a terrific snow-storm the ship Ayrshire, with about two hundred passengers, was driven upon the shore by the storm, and lay there stranded, the sea beating over her and a surf so heavy rolling in as made it impossible for any boat to reach her. It happened that one of the stations which we have described was near. The people on the shore assembled and brought out the apparatus. They fired the shot, taking aim so well that the line fell directly across the wreck. It was caught by the crew on board and the hawser hauled off. The car was then attached, and in a short time every one of the two hundred passengers, men, women, children, and even infants in their mothers' arms, was brought safely through the foaming surges and landed at the station. The car which performed this service was considered as fully entitled to an honorable discharge from active duty.

No money paid out of the United States Treasury was ever put for better use and more carefully and economically expended, and to my mind no appropriation has been made by the present Congress so just and for so good a purpose as that called for and appropriated in this bill; and the provision in the bill that provides for families of deceased keepers and surfmen is wise, humane, and just. I hope the proposition to grant them some little consideration will meet with a favorable response by the House, and that the report of the committee of conference will be adopted unanimously.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. I yield for a few moments to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. CANDLER.]

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Speaker, if members of the House will read these sections and reflect upon them for a single moment, I believe that the report of the committee of conference will be adopted unanimously. The proposition is not to grant a pension; it is simply to pay to men disabled in this service, or to the wives and children of those who lose their lives in the service, the wages the men would have received for not exceeding two years. The class of persons for whose benefit this provision is designed are those who are justly entitled to such provision. When a man loses his life in this service it is proposed that the Government grant to his widow and his fatherless children for two years the pay that the husband and father would have received had he lived and continued in the service. As a general thing these are men in the vigor of life, from twenty-five to forty years of age, with dependent families; and when they lose their lives, the fatherless children, too young to do anything for themselves, are left to the care and support of the mother. I ask gentlemen to look at the question just as it is—a proposition to pay, for the benefit of the widow and fatherless children, compensation for two years at the rate which their natural protector would have earned if his life had not been sacrificed in the service of the Government and for his fellow-men.

I listened with much interest to the remarks of the gentleman who immediately preceded me, [Mr. HILL.] No man in this House who was born by the sea and has seen a life-boat go out into the storm and darkness to rescue persons imperiled by shipwreck can hesitate to vote for and in the most earnest way to advocate the adoption of this report.

I represent a portion of the New England States, and I have presented to this House some of the strongest petitions that could possibly be sent from that section in favor of a provision of this kind. One of these petitions was from the Marine Society of Boston—a society which for almost one hundred years has been sustained by merchants and seafaring men for the support and aid of aged sea captains and their widows—men who comprehend and appreciate the perils of the deep and the heroism of the sailors that man a life-boat in a winter's storm on the Atlantic coast.

These petitions recommend a provision such as that now proposed, both as an act of humanity for the protection of life, and as a wise measure for the benefit of commerce, if it is necessary to consider it in that connection. They represent the sentiment of my section of the country. I advocate the adoption of this report, and hope it will be agreed to, as it should be, without division.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. DUNNELL,] who wishes to set himself right.

Mr. DUNNELL. Mr. Speaker, when the report of the committee of conference was read I was a little too hasty in raising an objection, because I had not heard the statement which accompanied the report. I desire now to say that I am heartily in favor of the report of the committee of conference. As a member of the Committee on Commerce for four years I became acquainted with this Life-Saving Service; and there is so much in it to win the sympathy and support of any man that I am willing now to vote for this slight pension, if you please to call it such, although it is not that in fact, but simply a just measure of compensation to the very brave and heroic class of men engaged in this Life-Saving Service.

The gentleman from New York has well said that we have precedents for this legislation in cases which, though not precisely like this, involve the same principle. When a member of this House dies we habitually vote to his family twelve or eighteen months' pay for services which he has never performed; and in various other instances we make compensation for service very much less meritorious than that provided for in this bill.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. I yield for a few minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. BREWER.]

Mr. ROBESON and Mr. HAWK obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD remarks upon the pending question. [See Appendix.]

Mr. BREWER. Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as the Life-Saving Service of the United States had its inception in my Congressional district; inasmuch as the State of New Jersey has more stations than any other State in the Union—forty-three in all—I feel that I would not be doing my duty to those brave boys on the Jersey shore if I refrained from adding my voice to those already raised in behalf of this bill to protect the men engaged in this perilous work, and, so far as it is possible for me to do, aid in making provision for the widows and orphans of such as may be destined to find in the line of their humane duty a watery grave.

When the promptings of a righteous and humane sympathy impel one to do a duty of this character, no sentimental feeling of economy should influence or have a feather's weight. To me my duty is plain. I shall vote for the bill under consideration and urge with all my heart in securing its enactment into a law. When a public sentiment exists as in this case, when the magnanimous and humane promptings of the people, as manifested by the press of the country on every side, favor any measure, I know we would fail to do our duty here as legislators, will fail to secure the approval of our own consciences and alike of our constituencies if we do not aid in every possible way the passage of this law.

Here is a service for the protection of human life—a system so perfected by the ingenuity of American inventive genius that all the nations of the earth approve alike of its worth and of its humanity. Inquiries pour in every day from other nations whose hearts have been moved by our example and whose admiration has been attracted by our successful appliances, so that it has become a system and a service of which every American is justly proud. We have a service here where fitness for the work and fidelity to the great trust imposed is the only passport. While at one time the existence of the service was in danger, through misconceptions of various kinds, now the man who would raise his voice against the service or against its management would display a most unblushing temerity.

However much we may disagree as to the expediency and mode of protecting human industry or human liberty on our shores, we are all agreed that the first duty we owe to our fellow-men is to protect human life. We all approve of this, and God gives it His benediction. Then, to these brave men employed in this service let us be just. To their widows and orphans, when they shall have laid down their lives for their fellow-men, let us throw about them the protecting hand and sheltering mantle of this truly great Government. It is said that republics are ungrateful, but I do not believe that in this instance, in such an instance, where the humane heart of a righteous public sentiment is made manifest through its representatives here assembled, this Republic will prove ungrateful to these poor, brave toilers and watchers of the sea.

In this service, by its unusual and indiscriminate charity, we have manifest the very genius of our Government. We have here in this broad land of varied climate and of equal laws an asylum for the oppressed of all lands. This is our pride and our boast. If they come fortunately and comfortably to our harbors and our ports we welcome them, protect them, and by aid of social custom and righteous laws strive to make them contented and happy. In this we do not fail. If they are driven on our shores weary, exhausted, and in despair, amid the swash and crash of breakers, tempest-tossed and terrorized, we save and succor them. In this we do not fail. By aid of these public servants we save the lives of thousands every year—our own brave sailors or citizens as well as those from foreign lands. These "toilers and watchers of the sea" are our pickets of mercy, patrolling our long coast, Atlantic and Pacific, as well as the dangerous shores of our great inland seas. They are the soldiers of the tempest; and wherever the battle for life is fought amid the rolling white-capped breakers on our shores there are they found in the midst of them doing battle for human life.

The distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] well said, when this bill was first before the House, "that no more sanctified bill had ever been presented to this House." Sanctified because it is just and humane in its scope and provisions; sanctified by the brave and manly lives given to this service in the performance of their duty; sanctified by this list of men dying that others might live.

No. 1.—List of persons who have died "by reason of any wound or injury received or disease contracted in the line of duty in the Life-Saving Service since the origin of the service," so far as shown by the records of the Treasury Department.
